“THE publication of similar Works on ENGLAND and WALES, forming portions of a great national undertaking intended to embrace TOPOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARIES of ENGLAND, WALES, IRELAND, and SCOTLAND, had in but a slight measure prepared the Proprietors for the difficulties which they have encountered in their recent Survey of IRELAND. The numerous County Histories, and local descriptions of Cities, Towns, and Districts of England and Wales, rendered the publication of their former Works, in comparison with the present, an easy task. The extreme paucity of such Works, in relation to Ireland, imposed the necessity of greater assiduity in the personal survey, and proportionately increased the expense. But if the labour was thus augmented, the generous encouragement the Proprietors received animated them to a continuance of their exertions, and enabled them to bring this portion of the undertaking to a close. To distinguish all to whom they are indebted for assistance in affording local information and facilitating their researches, would present a record of the names of nearly all the most intelligent Resident Gentlemen in Ireland: this fact, therefore, must be admitted as an apology for expressing, in a general acknowledgment, their gratitude for such disinterested services. They can with confidence assure their numerous Subscribers, that, in the discharge of their arduous duties, they have unremittingly endeavoured to present every fact of importance tending to illustrate the local history, or convey useful information respecting the present state of Ireland: fabulous tales and improbable traditions have generally been omitted; the chief aim being to give, in a condensed form, a faithful and impartial description of each place.” * * *

“The unsettled orthography of names rendered it somewhat difficult to select a standard of arrangement calculated to afford facility of reference. That mode of spelling was therefore adopted which, after careful examination and inquiry, appeared to be sanctioned by general usage; and where a name was found to be spelt in two or more ways, a reference has been given from one to the other. On this head, two points may require explanation, as a guide to reference:—The final l in the prefix Kill has been dropped when followed by a consonant, and retained when followed by a vowel. The ultimate of the prefix Bally (a corruption of Baile) is written variously, the letter i being sometimes substituted for y, but the latter is by far the more general; in respect to names compounded of this term, the non-discovery of a place under the head Bally will lead to the inference that it is given as Balli.

“It is necessary to state that all distances are given in Irish miles; glebes, and every other extent of lands, except when otherwise expressed, in Irish plantation acres: grants and sums of money, unless the standard be specified, may be generally regulated, as regards their amount, by the period to which they refer, in its relation to the year 1826, when the assimilation of the currency took place.”

These remarks formed part of the Preface to the First Edition of the DICTIONARY of IRELAND. In publishing a SECOND EDITION, the Proprietors have to observe that, as one means of increasing the value of the Work, they forwarded all the articles in it to the Clergy and other Resident Gentlemen in the Country, for correction, just before putting the New Edition to press: the mass of valuable information thus obtained, added to that derived from other sources, has, it is hoped, rendered the Work still more worthy of Public favour. The changes lately caused by the Church Temporalities' Act with respect to Bishoprics and Livings, and by the Municipal Corporations' Act with respect to Boroughs, have been recorded; the Tithe Compositions detailed in the former Edition have, in the present, been converted into Rent-charges; the Poor-law Union in which each place is situated, will be found stated in the headings of the articles; the areas of Parishes have been corrected, where necessary; and the population, according to the last Census, inserted throughout. Numerous Parliamentary Returns, also, have been consulted, affording much Statistical matter for the more important articles; and other improvements have been effected which it is impossible, and, even if possible, it would be tedious, to enumerate.

It may be well to inform the English Reader that, in IRELAND, though several dioceses have in many instances been united into one Bishopric, it is usual to speak of the dioceses as still distinct, as they are, indeed, in certain respects; thus, in the article on Belfast, the Living is stated to be in the diocese of Connor, though under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Down, Connor, and Dromore.

Three Tables, rendered necessary by the plan of the Book, are annexed.

ABBE

ABBEY, a parish, in the poor-law union of ENNISTYMON, barony of BURREN, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with the post-village of New Quay, 1442 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the road from Galway to Ennistymon, and on the shores of the harbour of New Quay or Murticlough, at one time called Burren, in the bay of Galway, derives its name from an ancient Cistercian abbey founded here, either by Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, in 1194, or by his son Donough Carbrae O'Brien, in the year 1200. This establishment, designated the abbey of Corcomroe, Corcomruadh, or De Petra fertilis, and called also Glanamagb, or "the Glen of the Monks," is said to have been a sumptuous edifice, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and dependent on or connected with the abbey of Suire, or Innislaunaght, in the county of Tipperary. It was afterwards made subject to the celebrated abbey of Furness, in Lancashire, and had a cell annexed to it in Kilsahany, in the adjoining barony of Corcomroe. The remains are extensive, forming an interesting object as seen from the road, and presenting evident traces of former splendour: a fine pointed arch, still tolerably perfect, is particularly admired for the beauty of its proportions; and there are some remains of the tomb of the King of Thomond, who was killed in a battle near this place, in 1267.

The PARISH extends along the southern shore of the bay, on the confines of the county of Galway, and comprises 4714½ statute acres. The greater portion is under tillage; the land along the coast produces good crops of wheat and potatoes, but that in the interior is hilly and unproductive, adapted only for grazing sheep. The system of agriculture has been greatly improved through the exertions of Burton Bindon, Esq., and Messrs. Hynes and Moran. The bed of the entire soil, and also the hills, are one uninterrupted mass of limestone; and two quarries, close to the village of Murticlough, are resorted to for stone for building: sea manure is found in abundance on the shore. The small port of New Quay, or Deepharbour, is situated about a quarter of a mile to the north of the village of Murticlough; a constant intercourse is kept up with Galway, on the opposite side of the bay, and a considerable trade in corn is carried on. The port affords great facilities for commerce, as vessels of large burthen can approach at any time of the tide. The coast is well adapted for bathing. The oyster bed called the Red Bank, to the east of Murticlough, and said to be one of the most extensive on the Irish coast, was established some years since by Mr. Bindon, and is now in great celebrity; it is stocked with young oysters, chiefly from Connemara, and more than 150 persons, chiefly women and children, are regularly employed. A tolerable trade is also carried on in sea-weed with the farmers of the interior, which has greatly increased since the construction of the line of road leading from the confines of the county of Galway into the interior and along the coast of the county of Clare. The harbour of New Quay is one of the several inlets of the bay of Galway; it lies to the south of Aughnish Point, and extends four miles up to Curranroe Bridge. The late Fishery Board built a small quay in the narrow part of the channel, at the village of New Quay (so called from the construction of this quay, about twenty years since), a little to the east of an older one, of which there are still some remains: vessels of 100 tons can come close up to it and deliver their cargoes. A court is held at Curranroe, or Curranrue, by a stipendiary and one or more resident magistrates, about once in six weeks, for the recovery of small debts: at New Quay is a constabulary police station.

Abbey is in the diocese of Kilfenora, and is a rectory, partly without provision for cure of souls: the tithes, with the exception of those of the townlands of Aughnish, Finvarra, Behagh, and Kilmacrane, which are annexed to the parish of Kilcorney, are impropriate in Piersce Creagh, Esq., and the rent-charge is £90. In the Roman Catholic divisions Abbey is the head of a district comprising also the parish of Oughtmanna; the chapel is situated in the village of Behagh. About half a mile to the west of Corcomroe, is an interesting ruin, built of huge wedge-formed stones, laid with the thin edge towards the thick, so as to present an exact oblong, or nearly so. On the summit of Rosala mountain is a well, dedicated to St. Patrick, springing from the solid rock, and producing water of the purest quality, supposed to be efficacious in the cure of sore eyes, head-ache, &c.: a lower spring is conveyed by pipes to the road side at the foot of the mountain.—See MURTICLOUGH.

ABBEY, a village, in that part of the parish of INBILONNAGH which is in the barony of IPFA and OFFA EAST, union of CLONMEL, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Clonmel; containing 998 inhabitants. It is situated on the roads leading to Ardinnan and to the river Suir: nearly adjoining are an extensive distillery, and Marfield, the seat of the principal proprietor of Clonmel.

ABBEYDORNEY, a village, in the parish of O'DORNEY, union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Tralee; containing 418 inhabitants. This place, which is situated at the intersection of the old and new roads from Tralee to Listowel, takes its name from the ancient abbey of Kirie Eleyson, or O'Dorney, founded here in 1154 by some person unknown, for Cistercian monks, who were brought from the abbey of Magio, in the county of Limerick; the abbot was a lord in parliament. The remains of it are still to be seen a little to the north of the village, but they retain few vestiges of its original character. The village, which consists mostly of thatched houses, is a constabulary police station; and a manorial court is held occasionally. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel, built here in 1826, at an expense of £600, is a spacious edifice fronted with stone, in the later English style, and embellished with a fine altar-piece and painting. Near the village is a flour-mill.—See O'DORNEY.

ABBEYFEALE, a parish, in the union of NEWCASTLE, barony of GLENQUIN, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (W. by S.) from Newcastle, on the mail-coach road from Limerick to Tralee; containing 5492 inhabitants, of whom 699 are in the village. This place obviously derives its name from a Cistercian abbey founded here, in 1188, by Brien O'Brien, and from its situation on the river Feale: the abbey, in 1209, became a cell to that of Monasternanagh, or Nenagh, in the barony of Publicbrien. The village, situated in a wild mountainous district, was once almost inaccessible; but since the construction of some new lines of road great alterations have taken place, much improvement in the condition of the people has resulted from the facilities thus afforded of taking their little produce to market, and the inhabitants are now industriously and profitably employed. Here are an hotel, and some respectable houses; but the greater number are thatched cabins. The village has a receiving-house in connexion with the post-offices of Tralee, Killarney, and Newcastle; and is a constabulary police station. Fairs are held on the 29th of June and Sept. 24th, chiefly for cattle, sheep, and pigs; and also on the first Tuesday in each month. The PARISH comprises 18,150 statute acres, of which 1620 are arable, 12,800 pasture, and above 3700 waste land and bog: a considerable portion of the waste, however, is gradually being brought into cultivation, and the system of agriculture is steadily improving. From long previous neglect, the lands in many parts have become marshy and cold, and in some places are covered to the depth of several feet with a loose turbary, which, in the total absence of timber, affords excellent fuel, and of which great quantities are sent to Newcastle, whence limestone is brought in return and burnt with coal of indifferent quality procured here for that purpose only. The farms have generally large dairies, and a considerable quantity of butter is forwarded to Cork and Limerick. On the great line of road from Limerick to Tralee is Wellesley bridge, a handsome structure, about two miles to the west of the village; and to the east is Goulburn bridge. The new road leading through the heart of the mountains from Abbeyfeale to Glín, a distance of 12 miles, was opened after the spring assizes of 1836, previously to which there was scarcely any possibility of access to this secluded district, which for that reason was, in the year 1822, selected as their head-quarters by the Rockites, who dated their proclamations "From our camp at Abbeyfeale." The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Crown; the rectory is inappropriate in Richard Ellis and Thomas G. Bateman, Esqrs. The tithe rent-charge is £240, payable to the impropritors; the clerical duties are performed by the curate of an adjoining parish, who is paid by subscription, aided by the Additional Curates' Fund Society. The church, a small edifice in the early English style, with a lofty square tower, was erected near the village in 1812, the late Board of First Fruits giving £800. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the old chapel, situated in the village, was erected on the site of the ancient monastery, a small portion of which was incorporated with it. A new chapel was built in 1846, on a site given by R. Ellis, Esq. On the bank of the river, a mile from the village, are the ruins of Purt, or Portenard, Castle, built by a branch of the Geraldine family, to command the pass of the Feale; it is strongly built, and occupies a bold situation. Four fairs are held at this place respectively on the 2nd May, 18th July, 13th Oct., and 15th December.

ABBEYGORMAGAN, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, partly in the barony of LEITRIM, but chiefly in that of LONGFORD, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Eyrecount, on the road to Loughrea; containing 2930 inhabitants. This place, called also Monaster O'Gormagan, or de Via Nova, derives its name from a monastery founded here for canons regular of the order of St. Augustine, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, by O'Gormagan, head of that sept: at the dissolution the monastery was granted by Henry VIII. to Ulick, first Earl of Clanricarde. The parish comprises 11,757½ statute acres, of which about one-third is arable. It is in the diocese of Clonfert; the rectory is partly appropriate to the see, the deanery, and the archdeaconry, and to the prebends of Fenore, Kilquaine and Kilteskil, in the cathedral church of St. Brandon, Clonfert, and partly united with the vicarage, which forms a portion of the union of Kiltormer. The tithe rent-charge is £164, of which £81 are payable to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions Abbeygormagan is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Killoran, in which there is a chapel: that for this parish is situated at Mullagh.

ABBEY-JERPOINT, a parish, in the barony of GOWRAN, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Thomastown; containing 375 inhabitants. This place is situated on the river Nore, and derives its name from an abbey established here, in 1180, by Donogh O'Donoghoe, King of Ossory, for monks of the Cistercian order, whom he removed from a distant part of Ossory. It was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and was amply endowed by the royal founder, who was interred here in 1185; its possessions were subsequently confirmed by John, Lord of Ireland. In 1202, Felix O'Dullany, Bishop of Ossory, was interred here: at his tomb many miracles are said to have been wrought; and the abbey became a favorite site of sepulture with all the great families in the surrounding country. The abbot was a lord in parliament, but in 1395 obtained exemption from attendance, on the plea that his house was subject to the abbey of Baltinglass, the abbot of which performed the parliamentary duties. The abbey continued to flourish till its dissolution in the 31st of Henry VIII., when it was surrendered into the king's hands by Oliver Grace, the last abbot; and its possessions were subsequently granted by Philip and Mary to James, Earl of Ormonde, and his heirs male, to be held in capite at an annual rent of £49. 3. 9. The ruins are very extensive, and display some fine specimens of the later Norman passing into the early English style of architecture, but are rapidly falling to decay; the most perfect portion is a well-proportioned square embattled tower. The parish comprises 1008 statute acres. It is in the diocese of Ossory, and is a vicarage and one of the several denominations, or reputed parishes, that constitute the union of Burchurch: the tithe rent-charge is £52. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is part of the district of Thomastown.

ABBEYKNOCKMOY, a parish, in the union of TUAM, partly in the barony of CLARE, but chiefly in that of TYAGUIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 7 miles (S. E.) from Tuam, on the road from Newtownbellew to Galway; containing 2866 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the abbey of Knockmoy, called by some writers Cnoc Muga, signifying in the Irish language "the Hill of Slaughter," and by others Monasterium de Colle Victorie. It was founded in 1189, by Cathol O'Connor, surnamed Croove-Dearg, or "the Red Hand." King of Connaught, in fulfilment of a vow made by him previously to a battle with the English forces under Almeric de St. Lawrence, in which he obtained the victory; and was occupied by Cistercian monks from the abbey of Boyle. In 1620, its site and extensive possessions were granted by James I. to Valentine Blake, Esq.; they are now the property of Francis Blake Forster, Esq., of Ashfield. The parish comprises 12,386½ statute acres, of which about 500 are bog. Near the summit of Knockroe hill is a subterraneous river, or stream, which, by an opening being made, now supplies the neighborhood with water: near the top of this hill, also, are several limestone caverns. There are large flour and oatmeal mills, called the Moyne mills. Moyne, a handsome mansion, is pleasantly situated in a fine demesne. Fairs are held on June 24th, Aug. 21st, and Nov. 1st. There is a constabulary police station at Brooklodge; and petty sessions are held at Dereen. The parish is in the diocese of Tuam, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the union of Kilereran: the tithe rent-charge is £165. In the Roman Catholic divisions Abbeyknockmoy is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Monivae, and containing a chapel in each, situated at Abbey and Rye Hill; the former is a neat edifice with a steeple, recently erected on an eminence. There are some very interesting remains of the ancient abbey, which show it to have been extensive in its dimensions and elegant in its design: several capitals of pillars, beautifully sculptured, lie scattered about the churchyard; the chancel is vaulted with stone, and on the north wall is the tomb of the founder, ornamented with some rude paintings in fresco, which, from inscriptions on the walls, still legible, appear to be the work of the 13th century; they are partly defaced, and are rapidly going to decay.

ABBEYLARAGH, a parish, in the union and barony of GRANARD, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (S. E.) from Granard, and 6½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Castlepollard, on the road from Granard to Dublin; containing 3084 inhabitants, of which number 194 are in the village. The monastery of Lerha, at this place, is said to have been founded by St. Patrick, who appointed St. Gnasacht its first abbot. It was refounded for monks of the Cistercian order, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, in 1205, by Lord Richard Tuit, who settled in this part soon after the first invasion of Ireland by the English, and, being killed by the fall of a tower at Athlone, was interred here in 1211. The parish is divided into two nearly equal parts by that of Granard, which intersects it from north to south: the eastern division is situated on Lough Kein-aile, and the western on Lough Gownagh; both together comprise 9150 statute acres. The lands are chiefly under tillage; the principal crops are wheat and oats; and there are large tracts of bog, and abundance of limestone. Among the gentlemen's seats are, Ferns-boro', situated in a finely planted demesne; and Kilrea, pleasantly seated on Lough Gownagh. The village, in 1841, contained 28 houses: here is a station of the constabulary police. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Westmeath and Messrs. Armstrong. The tithe rent-charge is £195, of which £82 are payable to the marquess, £34 to Messrs. Armstrong, and £79 to the vicar. The church, a neat plain edifice, was erected in 1839, and has accommodation for 100 persons; the cost, £554, was defrayed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Divine service is also performed twice in the week in two school-houses, respectively situated at the extremities of the parish. There are four acres of glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions, the western portion of Abbeylaragh is included in the union or district of Columbkil, and to the eastern is united the northern part of the parish of Granard; the chapel in the village is a large and well-built edifice. Of the ancient monastery, a fine arch supporting one side of the conventual church, several smaller arches (all of which, except one, are blocked up), and a winding staircase still entire, are the only remaining portions.

ABBEYLEIX, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, partly in the barony of FASSADING, county of KILKENNY, and partly in the baronies of MARYBOROUGH-WEST and CLARMAILLAGH, but chiefly in that of CULLINAGH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 7 miles (S. E.) from Maryborough, and 47½ miles (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 6719 inhabitants, of whom 1021 are in the town. This place, called also Cloynke Leix, or De Lege Dei, was the site of a monastery founded about the year 600, and refounded, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, in 1183, by Conogher or Corcheager O'More, who placed in it monks of the Cistercian order from Baltinglass, in the county of Wicklow, and was himself interred within its precincts. The town adjoining it, which took its name from the abbey, gradually rose to be the principal place in the territory of Leix, now Queen's county. In the 5th of Elizabeth, the abbey and some of its possessions were granted to Thomas, Earl of Ormonde; and the lands now form part of the estate of Viscount De Vesce. The town is situated on the mail road from Dublin, through Athy, to Cashel, and contains 131 houses: the late Lord De Vesce caused the old town to be entirely razed, and laid out the present on a more eligible site. There are two woollen manufactories; a large worsted mill and factory has been recently established near the town, for combing, weaving, and spinning yarn; and on the river Nore, which passes in the vicinity, is a boulding-mill. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on Jan. 26th, March 17th, May 5th, July 20th, Sept. 20th, and Nov. 4th. The market-house is a good building, erected by Lord De Vesce in 1836. Quarter-sessions are held in the town in June and December, and petty-sessions every Saturday; a court is also held by the seneschal of the manor; and here is a chief constabulary police station. The sessions-house is a commodious building, and there is a small well-regulated bridewell.

The parish comprises 13,545 statute acres, of which 12,845½ are in the Queen's county: there are about 400 acres of bog, and 300 of woodland; the soil is in general light and sandy, and the system of agriculture is improving. Limestone of very good quality abounds, and is quarried for building, and for burning into lime; there is also a white-freestone quarry, and excellent potters'-clay is found here. Near the town is Abbey Leix, the residence of Viscount De Vesce, a spacious mansion, pleasantly situated in a demesne of about 1135 statute acres, embellished with thriving plantations and with timber of stately growth. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the patronage of Viscount De Vesce, who is impropriator of the rectory. The tithe rent-charge is £380, 16s., of which £253, 17s. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church was built in 1830, at a cost of £2215, a loan from the late Board of First Fruits; and is a very handsome building, with a vaulted roof and an elegant spire: the old church, close to Lord De Vesce's mansion, is used only during summer evenings. The glebe-house was built in 1810, the Board contributing £400; the glebe comprises 5 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is partly in the diocese of Ossory, but chiefly in that of Leighlin; the Ossory portion being in the union or district of Ballyragget, and the other forming the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Ballyroan, and containing two chapels: that in Abbey-leix is a spacious structure, with a good school-house attached. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. An almshouse for poor widows is maintained by Lady De Vesce; and there are a dispensary, an infirmary, a savings' bank, and loan and clothing funds. The workhouse for the union, occupying a site of 5½ acres held at a rent of £6. 12. 8., was completed in 1842, at an expense of £5850, and is constructed for 500 paupers. The tomb of Malachi O'More, with an inscription, is in the gardens of Lord De Vesce, near the site of the old abbey. At Clonking are the remains of the ancient parish church; near the town are vestiges of a Danish fort, and in the parish are several raths.

ABBEYMAHON, a parish, in the union of Bandon, barony of IMANE and BARRYROE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Timoleague; containing 3261 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the north-west side of Courtmacsherry bay, on the south coast. It formerly constituted part of the parish of Lisleel, from which it was separated on the erection of an abbey by some Cistercian monks; the abbey stood close to the shore, and was endowed by Lord Barry with 18 ploughlands, but was not entirely completed at the general suppression of monasteries, when its possessions were granted to the Boyle family. The parish comprises 4482 statute acres: there is a considerable extent of bog, which supplies plenty of fuel. The ordinary mannares are the sand and sea-wrack afforded by the shore of the bay, in collecting which, during the season, numerous persons find employment. The living is a perpetual cure, in the diocese of Ross, and in the patronage of the Earl of Shannon, in whom the rectory is wholly impropriate, and who allows the curate £50 per annum. Divine service is performed in a private house licensed by the bishop. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district comprising also Lisleel, Kilsillagh, and Donoghmore, and containing chapels at Abbeymahon and Lisleel. The ruins of the abbey consist of the walls of the church, and a square tower mantled with ivy.

ABBEYSHRULE, or ABBEYSHRUEL, a parish, in the union of LONGFORD, barony of SHRULE, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (S. W.) from Colchill, on the road from Longford to Moyrore; containing 1283 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Inney, which divides it into two parts, connected by a stone bridge of ten arches. It derives its name from the monastery of Shrowl, or Shruel, founded here prior to the tenth century, and refounded for monks of the Cistercian order, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, by O'Ferrall, who completed it, according to Sir James Ware's conjecture, about the year 1150 or 1152. The monastery subsisted till the dissolution, when it was granted to James, Earl of Roscommon; and in 1569 it was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Robert Dillon, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. In the village is a large flour-mill; also a station of the constabulary police; and some good houses have been recently built on the townland of Abbeyshrule. A fair is held on the first Wednesday after Trinity. The Royal Canal passes through, and at a short distance is carried over the Inney by a handsome aqueduct. The parish comprises 2340½ statute acres, a portion of which is bog, but scarcely sufficient to supply the inhabitants with fuel: on the confines of the county is a quarry of black stone. It is in the diocese of Ardagh, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the union of Tashinny: the tithe rent-charge is £65, 15s. In the Roman Catholic divisions Abbeyshrule is part of the district of Carrickedmond, or Teighshinod; the chapel is situated in the village. Some remains of the ancient abbey yet exist; and there is a large square tower, to which is attached an extensive cemetery.

ABBEYSIDE, a village, and suburb of the borough of DUNGARVAN, in the union of DUNGARVAN, barony of DECIES-WITHOUT-DRUM, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER; containing 1859 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the remains of an ancient abbey, which is described in the article on DUNGARVAN; it is situated on an inlet of the bay, and is included within the electoral boundary of the borough. The Roman Catholic chapel for the district of East DUNGARVAN is situated here.

ABBEYSLUNAGH.—See INNISLONNAGH.

ABBEYSTRAND, a village, in the parish of TULLAGH, union of SKIBBEREEN, Eastern division of the barony of WEST CARBERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 164 inhabitants. It is situated on the southern coast, upon the western side of Baltimore harbour.

ABBEYSTREWRY, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, Eastern division of the barony of WEST CARBERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with part of the market and post town of Skibbereen, 6225 inhabitants. This parish is near the southern coast, on the road from Cork to Baltimore, and is intersected by the river Ilen. It contains 9396 statute acres; and is said to derive its name from a religious house, the ruins of which are situated close to the northern bank of the Ilen, one mile west from Skibbereen, but of the origin of which no particulars are on record. About one-third of the land is waste or bog, the former consisting of rocky elevations which in some parts afford tolerable pasturage; the bog is only of small extent, and peat is becoming somewhat scarce. Generally the system of agriculture is not much improved: the heavy old wooden plough is still used. The substratum is entirely of the schistus formation: there are quarries of excellent slate at Derrygoole, but not much worked; and throughout the parish is found clay-slate for building, and repairing the roads. There are numerous large and handsome residences. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, and in the patronage of J. S. Townsend, Esq., the impropriator of the rectory: the tithe rent-charge is £485, of which £184. 12. are payable to the impropriator, £18. 9. to the vicar (under an appropriation grant of Richard, Earl of Shannon), and the remainder to the lessees of the impropriator. The church, situated in the town of Skibbereen, is a large edifice in the early English style of architecture, with a lofty square tower at the east end: it was built on a new site in 1827, at an expense of £1200, of which £900 were given by the late Board of First Fruits; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £180 for its repair. The glebe-house, near the town, was built in 1824, by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the same Board, on a glebe of fifteen acres purchased by the Board and subject to a rent of £13. 7. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is united to Creagh and Tullagh, under the denomination of the union of Skibbereen: the chapel in that town is a spacious and handsome structure in the Grecian style, with an elegant altar; there is also a chapel in the parish of Tullagh.

—See SKIBBEREEN.

ABINGTON, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, partly in the barony of OWNEY-ARRA, county of TIPPERARY, and partly in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, but chiefly in that of OWNEY-BEG, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (E. by S.) from the city of Limerick; containing 8314 inhabitants. This place, anciently called Wothney or Woney, attained considerable importance at a very early period, and was celebrated for a Cistercian abbey founded, according to some, in 1189, and to others, in 1205, and provided with monks from the abbey of Savignac, in France, by Theobald Fitz-Walter, Lord of Carrick, and ancestor of the Butlers, earls of Ormonde, who was interred here in 1206. To this abbey King John made extensive grants of land in the kingdom of Limerick, with the advowsons of several parishes; and the abbot sat as a spiritual peer in the Irish house of lords. The abbey, with all its possessions, was granted by Elizabeth, in the 5th year of her reign, to Capt. Walshe, who erected a handsome house near the ancient buildings; but in the war of 1641 these estates were forfeited to the crown. Some small fragments of the abbey remain, situated near the present church; and also portions of the mansion of the Walshe family; but neither are adequate to afford any idea of their original character. The PARISH comprises about 30,400 statute acres, of which 10,984 are in the county of Tipperary, and the remainder in the county of Limerick. Towards its north-eastern boundary it includes a large portion of the Sliabh Phelim mountains, which rise to a considerable height, and in many parts afford pasturage for numerous herds of young cattle and for flocks of sheep. The fields are generally well fenced, and the lands in a good state of cultivation. There are some excellent meadows, mostly attached to the dairy farms; and the farm-houses are comfortable and of neat appearance. Fairs are held on May 29th and Aug. 31st; besides which, there are fairs at Murroe on April 29th and Oct. 27th. Petty-sessions are held every alternate Tuesday; and here is a station of the constabulary police. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Emly, with the rectory and vicarage of Tnough united by act of council in 1776, together forming the union of Abington, in the patronage of the Bishop of Cashel: the tithe rent-charge of Abington is £187. 10., and that of the entire benefice £675. The church is a neat small edifice, without tower or spire. The glebe-house, situated on a glebe of 20 acres, was built in 1804, at an expense of £1700. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also Clonkeen and a small portion of Doonee. The chapel at Murroe is a large and handsome edifice, built in 1811, and enlarged in 1836: there is an old chapel at Borroe.

ACHILL, a parish, in the union of WESTPORT, barony of BURRISHOOLE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 14 miles (W.) from Newport-Mayo; containing 6392 inhabitants. This district comprehends the islands of Achill and Achillbeg, and the peninsula of Corran Achill; comprising 51,521½ statute acres, whereof 35,283½ are in the island of Achill. The island of Achill, which is the largest, off the Irish coast, is situated in the Atlantic Ocean, and is separated from the main land by a narrow sound the southern part of which, at a place called Mollyranney, is fordable at low water. It is bounded on the north by Blacksod, and on the south by Clew bay, and is 16 miles in length and about 7 miles in breadth, forming a line of coast about 80 miles in circuit; the lands are chiefly the property of Sir Richard A. O'Donnell, Bart., but partly belong to the Marquess of Sligo. The western side is mostly a precipitous range of cliffs, but the eastern is in every part well sheltered. Achill Head, a bold promontory, is situated on the south-western extremity of the island, in lat. $53^{\circ} 58' 30''$ (N.), and lon. $10^{\circ} 12' 20''$ (W.); and at the northern extremity is Saddle Head, at the entrance of Blacksod bay. Between this and the smaller island of Achillbeg, which is described under its own head, is a channel called Achill Hole, where vessels drawing ten or twelve feet of water may ride in safety in all states of the weather. The peninsula of Coraan Achill, or the Reaping Hook of Achill, lies to the east of the island, and is connected with the main land by the narrow isthmus of Mollyraucy; a powerful tide runs in the sound, at the narrows called the Bull's Mouth.

The surface of Achill is very elevated, rising into eminences the highest of which is the hill of Slievemore, 2204 feet above the level of the sea; there is but little arable land, and this is chiefly in the valleys and near the shore. In addition to the mountain of Slievemore, are Menaun hill and Croaghau, on one of which is a precipice rising abruptly from the sea to the height of 2000 feet: the magnificence of the view from this eminence is unrivalled on the coast of Ireland. Till within the last 25 years there were no roads in this retired district. Of late, however, and especially since the Protestant mission, supported by zealous churchmen, was instituted in 1834, great improvements have taken place: a superior style of building has been introduced, and a better system of agriculture promoted. A regular ferry, with landing-places, has been established at the sound, which is about a mile across; there is an hotel for the accommodation of travellers; and a court of petty-sessions is held. An excellent hotel has also been opened at the Missionary settlement, where is a post-office; and the mail-car which runs from Newport every Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday, and back again on the other days, affords a cheap and expeditious conveyance to tourists wishing to visit this interesting district. Keel is a coast-guard station, as is likewise Dugort. The living is a rectory in the diocese of Tuam, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £70. There is no parish church; but divine service is performed at the Missionary settlement at Dugort twice every Sunday, in the English and Irish languages. In the Roman Catholic divisions, Achill forms a separate and distinct parish, and there are two chapels, one at Kildavnet and the other at Dookendilly. At the Missionary settlement is an orphan institution, where 100 children of the Roman Catholic persuasion are maintained, and educated in the Protestant faith; there is also an asylum for converted Roman Catholic priests of good character. Another branch of this establishment has lately been planted in the valley of Meelou, six miles distant from the present settlement, and where a church, minister's residence, and school-house have been erected. There are four National schools in the parish, and six schools supported by the Achill mission. A paper, called the Achill Missionary Register, is published monthly. There are remains of old churches, with burial-grounds attached, at Kildavnet and Slievemore; and at the former place are also remains of an ancient castle, which originally belonged to the well-known Grace O'Malley.

ACHILLBEG, an island, in the parish of Achill, union of WESTPORT, barony of BURRISHOLE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 32 miles (W.) from Newport-Mayo; containing 178 inhabitants. This island is situated on the western coast, and on the north side of the entrance of Clew bay; it is separated from the larger island of Achill by a narrow sound, which in some parts is fordable and almost dry at low water. The western shore is very wild, and, in consequence of the swells running to a great height, is unapproachable even in the calmest weather: the highest point is 360 feet above the level of the sea. The isle comprises 330½ statute acres, the property of Sir Richard A. O'Donnell, Bart.; a small portion of the land is arable, and the remainder is rocky pasture. A coast-guard station has been established here, and placed under the superintendence of an inspecting chief officer, resident at Dugort, in the island of Achill.

ACHONRY, a parish, in the union of SWINFORD, barony of LENEY, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Ballymote; containing 17,986 inhabitants. This place, anciently called Achad, Achad-Connair, and Achad-Chavin, was granted about 530, by the chief of the territory of Luigny, to St. Finian, Bishop of Clouard, who founded an abbey here, and placed over it his disciple St. Nathy, afterwards Bishop of Achonry. There are few events of historical importance: in 1798, the French invaders marched from Castlebar through Tubbercurry, near Achonry, where a slight skirmish took place. The parish is situated on the river Moy, and on the roads from Boyle to Ballina and from Sligo to Swinford; it comprises 60,896 statute acres, of which about 24,000 are arable and pasture land, and the remainder mountain and bog, much of which the peasantry are reclaiming. The land is generally good, and the system of husbandry is improving: there are quarries of excellent limestone and granite. Petty-sessions are held at Tubbercurry every Thursday. There are also weekly markets at that place and Bellaghy; and several fairs are held there and at Bellaghy and Curry, which see.

The DIOCESE is one of the sixteen constituting the ecclesiastical province of Armagh. It comprehends a large portion of the county of Sligo and part of that of Mayo, and extends about 35 miles in length and 27 in breadth, comprising by estimation a superficial area of 207,650 plantation acres, of which 113,950 are in Sligo, and 93,700 in Mayo. From about the commencement of the 17th century it was held with the see of Killybegs, as one bishopric, till 1833, when they were both annexed, under the provisions of the Church Temporalities Act (3rd of William IV.), to the see of Tuam. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, archdeacon, and the three prebendaries of Ballysodere, Killaraght, and Kilmovee; there are neither minor canons nor vicars choral. The cathedral, dedicated to St. Nathy, and called the cathedral church of St. Crummathy, Achonry, is parochial: it is kept in good repair by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; there is no economy fund. The diocese comprehends 25 parishes, of which three are consolidated rectories and vicarages, two appropriate rectories, and the remainder vicarages of which the rectories are inappropriate: the number of benefices is nine, all of which, with the dignities and prebends, are in the patronage of the Bishop of Tnam, except the deanery, which is in the gift of the Crown; there is one perpetual cure dependent on the deanery. The see lands comprise 11,794 acres, of which 8391 are profitable land; and the glebe lands of the benefices consist of 187½ Irish acres. The gross annual revenue of the diocese, payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, is on an average £1481. 6. 9.; and the entire rent-charges in the diocese, in lieu of tithes, amount to £5516 per annum, of which about £3412 are payable to the clergy, and the remainder to lay impropriators. In the Roman Catholic divisions the diocese includes also the parishes of Kilgarvan and Attymass (which in the Established church form part of the adjoining diocese of Killala); and, as originally founded, continues a distinct bishopric, suffragan to that of Tnam, and comprising 19 parochial unions or parishes.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, with the rectory and vicarage of Cloonoghil and the rectories of Killoran and Kilvarnet united, together constituting the corps of the deanery of Achonry. The tithe rent-charge is £485; and the gross revenue of the deanery, or union, is £720 per annum, out of which the dean allows a stipend of £75 to the perpetual curate of Tubbercurry. The church is a plain edifice with a tower and spire, and was built in 1823 by a loan of £1476 from the late Board of First Fruits. The deanery, or glebe-house, was built in 1816 by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1500 from the same Board; the glebe comprises 34 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms the benefice of the dean, and is divided into three portions, called the Upper, Middle, and Lower Divisions: the first is Curry, in which there are two chapels, one at that place and the other at Moylongh; the second is Cloonacool, in which also are two chapels, one there and the other at Tubbercurry; and the third is Mullinabrinny, which has one chapel. The ruins of the old church are situated near the present edifice: there are also ruins of the abbey of Court, founded by O'Hara for Franciscan friars of the third order; of an old church and burial-place at Kilcummen; and of an ancient fortified residence at Castlough. There is a large cromlech at Achonry, and at Ballincurry is a mineral spring.

ACLARE.—See ARDCLARE.

ACTON, a district parish, in the union of NEWRY, barony of LOWER ORIOR, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Tanderagee, on the old road from Newry to that place: the population is returned with Ballymore. The village was originally founded by Sir Toby Pointz, who, for his military services, obtained a grant of 500 acres of land, part of the forfeited estates of the O'Hanlons; he erected a bawn 100 feet square, a cottage of brick and lime for his own residence, and 24 cottages for so many English settlers, and called the place Acton, after his own native village in England. It now contains about 50 houses indifferently built, and has 210 inhabitants. Under the authority of an order of council, in 1789, nineteen townlands were severed from the parish of Ballymore, and erected into the parish of Acton, which comprises 4395 statute acres, and is intersected by the Newry canal. The improved system of agriculture has been extensively introduced; the lands are well drained and fenced, and the bogs have been all brought into cultivation by the proprietor, Colonel Close. The weaving of linen-cloth, diapers, checks, and calicoes, is extensively carried on by the small farmers and the cottiers in the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Ballymore in the cathedral church of St. Patrick, Armagh: the income arises from a fixed stipend of £50 per annum, payable by the patron, and an augmentation of £26 per annum from Primate Boulter's fund. The church, situated at Pointz-Pass, and built in 1788, is a neat edifice in the early English style. The glebe-house, about half a mile from the church, is a handsome residence, erected at the same period; the glebe comprises 21 acres of good land. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is in the district of Ballymore; the chapel is a small building, at Pointz-Pass. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians, situated respectively at Tannioke, and Carrickbrack or Tyrone's Ditches. The remains of a church built by Sir Toby Pointz in 1664, and under the chancel of which he lies interred, are situated in the midst of a wood, and have a very interesting appearance; a tablet is still preserved, with an inscription to his memory.

ADAMSTOWN, or MARNERIN, a parish, in the union of NEW ROSS, barony of BANTRY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (E.) from New Ross, on the road from that place, by way of Old Ross, to Enniscorthy; containing 2037 inhabitants. It comprises 8133½ statute acres: the surface is diversified with gentle elevations; the rounded top of Carrigmoisha, on the north, contrasting strikingly with the rocky summits of Carrigburne, in the adjoining parish of Newbawn, on the south. The soil, which is in general light, and not well adapted for meadow or pasture, is chiefly under tillage; the principal manure is limestone, brought from New Ross; and the system of agriculture has of late years been improving gradually. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, to which the parish of Newbawn has been united from time immemorial, together constituting the corps of the archdeaconry of Ferns, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £307. 19. 9., and of the entire benefice £578. 3. 3. There are two glebes, containing together 14½ acres. Of these, the original glebe, at the Cross of Adamstown, contains, with the adjoining burial-ground, 5 acres; and the modern glebe, at Templebelen, 9½ acres, held by lease under the Earl of Rathdowne, the principal landholder in the parish. On the latter are situated the church, glebe-house, and school. The church, towards whose erection the late Board of First Fruits gave £500, in 1805, and the Earl of Rathdowne £100, is a neat edifice with a square embattled tower, and was repaired, in 1836, by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, at an expense of £252. The glebe-house is a plain square building, erected by Archdeacon Barton in 1803, at a cost of £2200, towards which the Board gave £100. The school-house was built at the joint expense of the Earl of Rathdowne and Archdeacon Barton, the former of whom endowed it with £6 per annum, being the rent paid for the modern glebe. The parish is part of the Roman Catholic union or district of Newbawn; the chapel is a spacious and slightly edifice.

The Cross of Adamstown, where is a police station, is a small village which probably derives its name from the proximity of a large and rude stone cross, which stands in the original burial-ground there, and is supposed to be of great antiquity. Near this are the ruins of an ancient castle, built by Sir Nicholas Devereux and his wife Katrine Power, as appears from a curious Latin inscription, in black letter, on a stone tablet found in the castle, but now inserted, with a view to its preservation, in an inner wall of a neighbouring farmhouse. The date is obliterated; but Sir Nicholas was joined in commission, for the administration of martial law, with Lord Mountgarret, in 1558. The castle formerly consisted of a square tower, surrounded by a high quadrangular wall flanked with turrets at the angles; the centre tower alone remains. In the townland of Oldcourt are the remains of a rude fortification of considerable extent, called the Rathmore. There are also several small raths in the parish, of which the number is diminishing; of those that exist, two are remarkable from their not being of the usual circular form, but having four sides.

ADARE, a post-town and parish, in the union of RATHKEALE, partly in the barony of KENVY, and partly in the Eastern Division of that of UPPER CONNELL, but chiefly in the barony of COSHMA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (S. W.) from Limerick, and 102 miles (S. W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 4902 inhabitants, of whom 1095 are in the town. The early history of this place, the name of which signifies "the ford of the oaks," is involved in great obscurity. On the arrival of the English, in the reign of Henry II., it appears to have been distinguished as having a castle and a church. In the following century it became the property of the Fitzgeralds, of whom John, first Earl of Kildare, founded a monastery here in 1279, which he dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and amply endowed, for the redemption of Christian captives. This establishment, which is now called the BLACK ABBEY, and is situated in the town, continued to flourish till the dissolution, when, with the other religious houses subsequently founded here, it was granted by Elizabeth, in the 37th of her reign, to Sir Henry Wallop, Knt., to be held for ever in fealty, in free and common socage, at a yearly rent of £26.17.8., on condition of his maintaining two able horsemen on the premises. The remains consist of the tower, nave, and part of the choir, of the church, which were fitted up in 1811 for a Roman Catholic chapel by the Earl of Dunraven. The tower, which is embattled, is in a very perfect state, and is one of the most massive in the south of Ireland; the prevailing style of architecture is the early English, which has been tolerably well preserved in its restoration. There are some extensive ruins on the north side, probably the remains of the domestic buildings. Another ABBEY was founded here, the remains of which, situated within the demesne of Adare Castle, on the bank of the river, are highly interesting; they consist of the nave, choir, and south transept of the church, and, with the exception of the roof, are tolerably entire. From the intersection rises a beautiful slender square tower: in the choir are several stalls, niches, fonts, and stoups, of elegant design; and on the east side of the transept, in which also are niches and fonts, are two chantry chapels, or oratories; besides one on the west side. The cloisters are nearly in a perfect state, and round them are arranged the principal offices, the refectory, and various other domestic buildings; in the centre of the inclosure is a stately and venerable yew-tree, but inferior in growth to that at Muckross. The prevailing style of architecture is the later English, of which these remains display some very elegant details. A FRANCISCAN abbey, also, was founded on the south side of the river, by Thomas, seventh Earl of Kildare, who married Joan, daughter of the Earl of Desmond. The remains, situated close to the bridge, consist chiefly of the lofty and slender square tower, the nave, and part of the choir of the conventual church, fitted up by the Earl of Dunraven as the parochial church. The cloisters on the north side are perfect, having been restored by the earl (who has erected adjoining them a splendid mausoleum for his family); and in them, and over the doorway, are several shields with the arms of Kildare and Desmond alternately. The refectory, and part of the domestic buildings, have been restored, and appropriated as a school-house, by the Countess of Dunraven. The prevailing style of these remains is the later English, which has been carefully preserved throughout.

Some time prior to 1310 the town appears, from ancient records, to have been incorporated, as in that year a grant of murage and customs was made by Edward II. to "the bailiffs and good men of the town of Adare;" and in 1376 Edward III. issued a writ to the sheriff of the county and all officers connected with the subsidies, &c., prohibiting them under heavy penalties from demanding from the provost or commonalty of Adare any services or customs, until the town, which had been then recently burned and destroyed by the "Irish enemy," should be fully rebuilt and inhabited. The CASTLE was originally erected by the O'Donovans, was rebuilt by the second earl of Kildare in 1326, and enlarged and fortified by several of his successors. When Turlough O'Brien was ravaging this part of the country, he burned the castle, which was soon afterwards repaired by Thomas, Earl of Kildare. Gerald, a subsequent earl, having countenanced the second attempt of Perkin Warbeck, was accused of treasonable practices, and the castle and all his possessions were forfeited to the crown; but he was restored to his estate by favour of Henry, Prince of Wales, who made him his deputy-governor of Ireland. In 1519, the earl set out from this castle on his route to London, to meet the accusations of Cardinal Wolsey; and having vindicated his innocence was, on his return to Ireland, appointed lord-deputy, and ordered to secure the person of his nephew, the Earl of Desmond, who had departed from his allegiance by joining Francis I. of France, and was taking refuge in the castle of Askeaton. The lord-deputy, on his arrival at the castle of this place, finding that the earl had retired to his strongholds, returned to Dublin; for this neglect, in connexion with other charges, he was sent to the Tower of London, where he died in confinement; and on the rebellion of his son, better known by the appellation of Silken Thomas, the castle and the family estates again escheated to the crown. During the wars in the reign of Elizabeth, the castle was frequently attacked by the English forces without success; but in the summer of 1578 it was taken, after a siege of eleven days, and in the following year was garrisoned by a powerful body of English troops, under the command of Captain Carew. Sir John Desmond soon after assaulted it, but was repulsed with great loss by the garrison, and compelled to seek protection from his friend and kinsman, the Knight of Glin. In 1581 the castle was again besieged, by the Earls of Desmond and Kerry, with a numerous and powerful army, who succeeded in reducing the garrison, and put every man to the sword. Upon this occasion the English forces, under Col. Zouch, marched from Cork to the relief of the garrison, and arriving too late, they attacked the confederate earls, whom they defeated with considerable slaughter, and retook the castle. It was again besieged in 1600, when the garrison suffered greatly, being without food for many days, and obtaining a supply of water only by excavating a subterraneous passage to the bed of the river. In 1641 the castle was seized by the insurgents and held for some time, till they were at last driven out by the Earl of Castlehaven; in 1657 it was dismantled by Cromwell's orders. The remains are of considerable extent, and the walls of great strength; but notwithstanding the efforts of the noble proprietor to preserve this interesting relic of antiquity, it is rapidly falling into decay. This was the scene of much confusion and many atrocities during the prevalence of Whiteboyism in 1786, and of Defenderism in 1793; and under the system of the Rockites many persons were destroyed near the place, on the chapel of which were posted notices, signed, "John Rock, R. C. B., commander-in-chief of the army in Ireland."

The ancient town of Adare was situated on the eastern bank of the river Maigue, near the castle and the ancient parish church, which are now within the demesne of the Earl of Dunraven, and about half a mile distant from the present town, which is situated on the western bank of the river, over which is a fine bridge of fourteen arches. The bridge is quite level, and, though narrow, is generally admired; it was built by the fifth earl of Kildare, and is still in a good state of preservation. The river is here broad, and, from several artificial weirs, appears like a succession of lakes; but beyond the bridge it becomes very shallow. The present town has the appearance of an old village whose growth has been gradual: many of the houses are old and badly built; some have been taken down already, and others will be also removed as the leases fall in, under the improvements intended by Lord Dunraven, which have been commenced by the erection of an hotel, a post-office, and several substantial houses. The mail-coach from Limerick to Tralee passes through daily. A constabulary police force has been established here; petty-sessions are held fortnightly; and fairs are held on Jan. 20th, Feb. 21st, March 27th, April 27th, May 27th, Sept. 15th, Oct. 14th, and Dec. 15th, for the sale of farming stock and implements, which are well attended.

The PARISH comprises 11,993 statute acres. The land is every where fertile, and is under an improved system of cultivation: about two-fifths are in tillage, and the remainder is rich meadow and pasture; there is neither bog nor waste land. Black, grey, and porphyritic limestone of good quality abounds; the black is most esteemed for building, and the grey for agricultural purposes. The Maigue is navigable up to the town by means of a short canal; and there are two quays, one at the termination of the canal in the town, the other about a mile down the river, both constructed at the expense of Lord Dunraven. The surrounding scenery is finely diversified, and embellished with handsome seats and highly ornamented demesnes. The principal seat is Adare Castle, the property and residence of the Earl of Dunraven: of this noble edifice, the centre and the north wing only are completed; the style of architecture is that of the more enriched period of the later English, and when finished the mansion will be one of the most splendid in the country. It is built of hewn limestone found upon the estate, and is situated on the western bank of the river, in a very extensive and finely wooded demesne, commanding a beautiful view of the interesting remains of the ancient castle, and of the several abbeys. Near the house still stands the venerable ash-tree under which the family papers, with other things of value, were hastily hidden by Lord Dunraven's ancestor, on the approach of a party of marauders during the Revolution of 1688. Not far distant is Currah, the elegant residence of Sir Aubrey de Vere, Bart., standing in the centre of a wide, fertile, and undulating demesne, enriched with luxuriant woods and plantations, and embellished with a picturesque lake: the mansion is of hewn limestone, with a front of beautiful design commanding the lake; there are three entrances to the park, of which the lodge at that from Adare is the most handsome. Sir Aubrey is author of Julian the Apostate and other minor poems. The farmhouses in the parish, generally small, have gardens and orchards attached, and are mostly occupied by Palatines, originally German Protestants, who settled here about the year 1740, since which time they have greatly increased in numbers, but continue a distinct body.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Earl of Dunraven; the rectory, also, is inappropriate in the earl. The tithe rent-charge is £606. 4., of which £379. 16. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, which forms part of the Franciscan abbey, already noticed, was restored in 1811, by aid of a loan of £1000 from the late Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Dredidatsarna and Clounshire, and parts of two other parishes; the chapel is part of the ancient abbey of the Holy Trinity, previously noticed. The refectory of the Franciscan abbey, adjoining the church, was fitted up for a school by the Countess of Dunraven, in 1815: it is a spacious apartment lighted by fifteen windows, each of which is of a design different from the rest; and, in 1825, the countess built a good residence for the master and mistress, in the same style as the refectory, with a garden attached: the school is wholly supported by the countess. A fever hospital and dispensary, with a house adjoining for a physician, has been erected by his lordship, at his own expense, and is supported in the customary manner. Adare gives the titles of Baron and Viscount to the ancient Irish family of Quin, earls of Dunraven and Mountearl; the earl constantly resides here.

ADDERGOOLE, a parish, in the union of CASTLEBAR, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (S. by E.) from Crossmolina; containing 7379 inhabitants. This parish comprises 36,629½ statute acres, and is situated on Lough Conn, by which it is bounded on the north, and on the road from Crossmolina to Castlebar: it contains within its limits the greater portion of the stupendous mountain of Nephin, which rises to a height of 2639 feet above the level of the sea. The land generally is under an improved system of tillage; there are large tracts of bog and mountain, which have been reclaimed to a great extent; and limestone abounds. The house of Woodpark is beautifully situated on Lough Conn. A fair is held at Laherdane, on the 29th of June, and at Ballageen on the 24th of June. The parish is in the diocese of Killala: the rectory was till lately partly appropriate to the precentorship, and partly to the vicars choral, of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin; the vicarage forms part of the union of Crossmolina. The tithe rent-charge is £187. 10., of which £93. 15. are payable to the vicar. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is at Laherdane. There are some remains of an old abbey at Addergoole, and also at Boffin; and near Castle Hill are vestiges of an ancient castle.

ADERRIG.—See ARDERRIG.

ADNITH, or ATHNETT, a parish, in the poor-law union of THURLES, barony of ELIOGARTY, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Templemore; on the river Suir, and on the road from Thurles to Templemore and Rathdowney; containing 293 inhabitants. It comprises only 855 statute acres, and in the Down survey and county books is not noticed as a parish, but as a part of the parish of Rahelty, which was among the possessions of the abbey of Woney, in the county of Limerick. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and forms part of the union of Thurles; the rectory is inappropriate in the representatives of Edward Taylor, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £54, of which £29. 5. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions also, Adnith is in the union or district of Thurles.

ADREGOOLE, or ADDERGOOLE, a parish, in the poor-law union of TUAM, barony of DUNMORE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (W.) from Dunmore, on the river Clare, and on the road to Castlebar; containing 3321 inhabitants. It comprises 8441½ statute acres. A constabulary police force has been stationed here; and petty-sessions are held every alternate week. Adregoole is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and forms part of the union of Tuam; the rectory is appropriate partly to the deanery, and partly to the archdeaconry, of Tuam. The tithe rent-charge is £103. 1., of which £77. 6. are payable to the dean and archdeacon, and £25. 15. to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also that of Liskeevy; the chapel, a large slated building recently erected, is situated at Milltown.

AFFANE, a parish, in the union of LISMORE, barony of DECIES-WITHOUT-DRUM, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Lismore, on the road from Waterford, through Youghal, to Cork; containing 2115 inhabitants. This place, called anciently Arthmean, or Aghmean, was, in 1564, the scene of a battle between the Earls of Desmond and Ormonde, in which the Earl of Ormonde was defeated with the loss of 280 of his men. It is chiefly distinguished as containing Dromana, for a long time the chief seat of the Fitzgeralds of the Decies, who were descendants of James, the seventh earl of Desmond, and one of whom, in 1569, was created "Baron of Dromany and Viscount Desses," which titles became extinct at his decease. His nephew and second successor in the estate entertained at this place the celebrated Sir Walter Raleigh, who introduced here a fine species of cherry, which has continued to flourish in the neighbourhood to the present day, and is still in high estimation. The old castle having been burnt down in a period of hostility, the present mansion was erected on its site. The parish is bounded on the south-west by the river Blackwater, which is here navigable: it comprises 7773 statute acres; the land is in general fertile. Dromana House overhangs the Blackwater, which winds round the base of a precipitous ascent clothed with thriving plantations; its hanging-gardens present a picturesque and interesting feature. Belleville Park is also pleasantly situated amidst thriving plantations. Fairs are held on May 14th, Aug. 12th, and Nov. 22nd. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, to which the vicarage of Aghish was episcopally united in 1817, forming the union of Affane, in the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire, in whom the rectory is inappropriate. The tithe rent-charge of Affane is £276. 18., payable in moieties to the impropriator and the vicar; and the gross amount of vicarial tithe for the whole benefice is £258. 9. The church is a neat building, erected in 1819, at an expense of £700, towards which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £500. There is no glebe-house, and the glebe contains only 2 roods. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is one of the two which form the union of Modeligo; the chapel is at Boharavaughera. A school at Carrageen is aided by a legacy of £20 per annum from the late Mr. Magner.

AGHA, or AUGHA, a parish, in the barony of IDROONE EAST, union and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER; comprising part of the town of Leighlin-bridge, and containing 2027 inhabitants. This place is situated on the east side of the river Barrow, which is navigable to Waterford, and on the road from Carlow to Kilkenny. An abbey, called Achad-finglass, was founded here at a very early period by St. Fintan, and in 864, in which year it was plundered by the Danes, had risen into some note; its site is now unknown. The parish contains 4183½ statute acres, and is wholly under cultivation; the system of agriculture is improving. Limestone for burning is procured within its limits. Fairs for the sale of live stock are held on Easter-Monday, May 14th, Sept. 23rd, and Dec. 27th; and there are two at Orchard on Whit-Tuesday and Oct. 2nd. Agha is a vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, and forms part of the union of Dunleckney; the rectory is inappropriate in Col. Weldon. The tithe rent-charge is £311. 11., of which £207. 14. are payable to the impropriator. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Dunleckney, and partly in that of Old Leighlin: the chapel, situated at Newtown, is a handsome edifice lately erected.—See LEIGHLIN-BRIDGE.

AGHABOE, or AUGHABOE, a parish, in the unions of ROSCREA and ABBEYLEIX, partly in the barony of CLANDONAGH, but chiefly in that of CLARMALLACH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, on the road from Dublin to Roscrea; containing, with the post-town of Burros-in-Ossory, 6310 inhabitants. This place, originally called Achadh-Bho, signifying in the Irish language "the field of an ox," derived that name from the fertility of its soil and the luxuriance of its pastures. It was celebrated at a very early period as the residence of St. Canice, who, in the 6th century, founded a monastery here for the cultivation of literature and religious discipline; and so great was his reputation for learning and sanctity, that a town was soon formed around it for the reception of his numerous disciples. The town soon afterwards became the seat of a diocese, comprehending the district of Ossory; and the church of the monastery was made the cathedral of the see of Aghaboe. The place continued, under a succession of bishops, to retain its episcopal distinction till near the close of the 12th century, when Felix O'Duallan, the last bishop, was compelled by the submission of Donchad, Prince of Ossory, to Henry II., to remove the seat of his diocese to Kilkenny. The parish comprises 18,702½ statute acres. The rich and extensive vale in which it is seated lies between the mountains of Cullahill on the south-east, and the Slieve Bloom range on the north-west; the latter separates the Queen's from the King's county. The soil is generally fertile; and in a tract of about 40 acres behind the church, said to have been the site of the ancient town, and afterwards of the abbey gardens, it is remarkably rich: the system of agriculture is improving, and there is a considerable tract of bog, but not sufficient to provide fuel for the inhabitants. The substratum is limestone, of which there are several quarries; at Knoekaroe is found a brown slate; and at Carrig and Carrigen are some rocks of granite. Fairs are held at Burros eight times in the year, and petty-sessions every alternate week there and at Cullaborough.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the patronage of the Rev. George Carr; the rectory constitutes part of the corps of the deanery of St. Canice, Kilkenny, in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge is £591. 18. 6., of which £394. 12. are payable to the dean, and the remainder to the vicar. The parish church was erected in 1818, on part of the site of the old cathedral, for which purpose the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £500. Divine service is also performed in the court-house of Burros. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £1350 from the same Board, in 1820; there are two glebes in the parish, comprising together 185 acres, which belong to the vicarage. In the Roman Catholic divisions Aghaboe is the head of a district, which comprises also the parishes of Killeamagh and Boardwell, and parts of those of Kildellig and Cookerry, and which contains four chapels, situated at Fox Rock, Knoekaroe, Ballincolla, and Burros-in-Ossory. At the distance of a few yards from the parochial church are the remains of the Dominican abbey church; at Lisamore are the remains of an ancient church and burial-ground; and at Farran-Eglis and Knoekera, also, the remains of churches. To the north of the church is a large artificial mound, surrounded by a fosse, and encircled with a wall near the summit; while at Middlemore is an old fortification, called the "Rath of Lara," or "Moat of Monacoghlan;" besides several raths or mounds in various parts. At Gortnaclea is a square castle, and at Ballygeein are the remains of an ancient fortress.—See BURROS-IN-OSSORY.

AGHABOG, a parish, in the union of COOTENHILL, barony of DARTRY, county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER, 1 mile (E.S.E.) from Newbliss, on the road from Clones to Ballybay; containing 7530 inhabitants. It comprises 11,543½ statute acres, of which 222½ are covered with water; from 16 to 20 acres are woodland, about 243 bog, and the remainder nearly all arable and pasture land. The soil is a rich but shallow loam, on a deep, stiff, and retentive clay, which renders it wet unless drained, and manured with lime and marl, but it produces naturally an abundant herbage. The inhabitants are nearly all engaged in the linen manufacture. Within the limits of the parish are five lakes, of which that near Leysborough demesne is the largest. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £248. 7. The church is a plain edifice, built in 1775, for which purpose the Board of First Fruits gave £390. There is a glebe-house, with a glebe of 40 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the union of Killeevan; the chapel is a neat modern building, situated on the townland of Lathnamard. At Drumkeen is a Presbyterian meeting-house. James Woodwright, Esq., of Gola, bequeathed £10 per annum for the poor.

AGHABOLOGUE.—See AHBABOLOGUE.

AGHACREW, or AUGHACREW, a parish, in the union of TIPPERARY, barony of LOWER KILNEMANAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (N.N.E.) from Tipperary, on the new line of road from that place to Nenagh; containing 409 inhabitants. It comprises 1231 statute acres. It is in the diocese of Cashel, and the rectory is wholly appropriate to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: the tithe rent-charge is £30. 7. 9. There is no church; the Protestant inhabitants attend divine service at Toem, about three miles distant.

AGHACROSS.—See AHBACROSS.

AGHADA, or AHADA, a parish, in the union of MIDDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S.W. by W.) from Cloyne; containing 2635 inhabitants. This parish, which includes the small fishing-village of Whitegate, is situated on the south side of Cork harbour, and is intersected by the road from Cloyne to Carlisle Fort. It comprises 2459 statute acres, the soil of which is a loam two feet in depth, and of a naturally good quality, resting partly on slate, but generally on sandstone. The greater portion is under tillage, the quantity in pasture being very small; the principal produce is wheat and potatoes, of which good crops are raised, the facility of obtaining sea-sand and sea-wrack enabling the farmer to till to any extent. The modern system of husbandry, including the culture of turnips and mangel-wurzel, has been introduced, and hence will follow the fattening of sheep and cattle, hitherto adopted in but few or no instances. Clover is generally grown, and winter vetches have lately been cultivated by a few persons. On the shores are large boulders of limestone; and limestone, of good quality for burning, is obtained from quarries within two miles, none nearer being at present in operation. The village of Aghada occupies an elevated site, of 200 feet, and contains the parish church and Roman Catholic chapel. That of Whitegate is a small fishing-port, where several boats are employed in raising sand from the harbour to be used for manure; the houses are of a good class, the greater number being slated, and two stories high. It contains several shops for the supply of necessities; and straw-bonnets, the straw for which is imported, are manufactured in the village, where is a school for instructing females in this branch of industry. The plaiting of the crested dog's-tail, or "trancen" grass, found here, also occupies a few hands. Shoes, chiefly those for women's wear, are made in the parish; and at Whitegate and Farsade are considerable bakeries, and at the latter a flour-mill. On the north side of the parish, a neat small pier has been constructed by levy on the county; and a steam-boat from Cork or Cove calls there, at least every day.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne. It was united in the reign of Charles II. to the rectories and vicarages of Corkbeg, Rostellan, Inch, Kilteskin or Titeskin, and Garranekeneck, which, from the time of Bishop Crow, in the reign of Anne, were held in commendam by the Bishop of Cloyne, till the death of Dr. Brinkley in 1835, when they were disunited by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and made separate benefices in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge is £218. The church, a neat structure standing on an eminence above the harbour of Cove, was erected in 1817, by a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe-house adjoins it, and for its erection the same Board, in 1814, granted a loan of £1000, and gave £100; the glebe comprises 17 acres of excellent land. In the Roman Catholic divisions, the parish forms the head of a union or district, which comprises the parishes of Aghada, Rostellan, Corkbeg, Inch, and Garranekeneck, and contains three chapels. A school was built by the late John Roche, Esq., who, also, left six houses rent free for ever for six widows. In the village of Aghada are the ruins of the old church; and in the vicinity are a series of caves, generally small, but the first cave is large, and has a fine arched roof, from which hang beautiful stalactites.

AGHADE, a parish, in the union of CARLOW, barony of FORTN, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Tullow, on the river Slaney, and on the road from Tullow to Newtownbarry; containing 521 inhabitants. It comprises 1697½ statute acres, partly arable and partly pasture: a great portion of the latter is marshy, but might be improved by draining; the state of agriculture is very good. There are quarries of limestone, and of a fine species of granite for building. The living is an impropriate curacy endowed with two-thirds of the tithes, to which the vicarage of Ballon and the impropriate curacy of Ardrinstin are united; it is in the diocese of Leighlin, and patronage of the Bishop: the remainder of the tithes are impropriate in Lord Downes. The rent-charge of Aghade is £101. 5., of which £33. 15. are payable to the impropriator; and the entire tithes of the benefice, receivable by the incumbent from Aghade and Ballon, amount to £137. 10. The church, which is pleasantly situated on rising ground above a small stream, is a plain old building, for the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £591. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Ballon and Ratoe, or district of Gilbertstown. It contains two or three schools.

AGHADERG, or AGHADERRICK, a parish, in the union of BANBRIDGE, partly in the barony of LOWER, but chiefly in that of UPPER, IVEAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, on the road from Newry to Belfast; containing, with the towns of Loughbrickland and Scarvag, and part of that of Poyntz-Pass, 9240 inhabitants. A grant of lands here was made by Queen Elizabeth, in 1585, to Sir Marmaduke Whitchurch, who built a castle on the shore of Loughbrickland, which was dismantled by Cromwell's army, and remained in ruins till 1812, when it was taken down and a dwelling-house erected on its site. In 1690 William III. encamped here on his march to the Boyne: vestiges of the camp may still be traced, and Dutch coins are frequently found in the neighbourhood. The parish, according to the Ordnance survey, comprises 13,919 statute acres, of which 119½ are covered with water: of waste and bog there is one acre to every twenty of arable land, and the pasture land is in the proportion of one to every five acres in tillage. The soil is extremely fertile, and under a highly improved system of tillage: the bog is very valuable. Great quantities of clay-slate are raised for mending the roads and for building purposes; and slate-quarries have been worked, but are now discontinued. The Newry Canal, in its progress to Lough Neagh, forms the western limit of the parish and the county. There are two lakes: Loughbrickland, which feeds the summit level of the canal, is skirted on the west by the road from Dublin to Belfast; Longhask, near the western boundary of the parish, is rendered highly picturesque by the beautiful grounds and rich plantations of Union Lodge. The manufacture of linen is carried on to a considerable extent, many persons being employed at their own houses in weaving damask, diapers, drills, shirtings, and sheetings, for the Banbridge manufacturers.

The LIVING is now a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dromore, and in the patronage of the Bishop and of the Government, alternately; the rectory was, until lately, united, by charter of the 7th of James I., to the rectories of Seapatrick, Drumballyroney, and Tullylish, and part of those of Drumgooland and Magherally, together constituting the corps of the deanery of Dromore, in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge is £416. 15. The church is a large edifice in the early English style, erected in 1688; and a lofty square tower, surmounted by an octagonal spire of hewn stone, was some years ago added to it, for which the Board of First Fruits, in 1821, granted a loan of £500. The glebe-house is a handsome residence; the Board, in 1801, gave £100 towards its erection, and also purchased a glebe of 24 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is the benefice of the vicar-general; there are two chapels, one in Loughbrickland, a large and handsome edifice, and a smaller at Lisnagad. There are three places of worship for Presbyterians, one near the lake, another at Glascar, and a third at Scarvag; also a place of worship for Covenanters near Scarvag, and one for Primitive Methodists at Loughbrickland. Some remains of an ancient church exist in the townland of Drumsallagh; and about half a mile to the south-west of Loughbrickland are three upright stones, called "the Three Sisters of Greenan," apparently the remains of an ancient cromlech; they are situated on a gentle eminence, and near them is a fourth stone lying in a ditch. In 1826, a canoe formed out of a solid piece of oak was found in Meenagh bog; and in a small earth-work near it were several gold ornaments, earthen pots, and other relics of antiquity. At Drummillar is a vast cairn of loose stones, 60 feet high and 226 feet in circumference.—See LOUGHBRIKLAND and SCARVAGE.

AGHADOE, a parish, in the union of KILLARNEY, barony of MAGONINNY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with part of the town of Killarney, 3734 inhabitants. This place was formerly the head of a see, merged from time immemorial into that of Ardfer, which, with Limerick, now forms the bishopric of Limerick, Ardfer, and Aghadoe. The annals of Innisfallen state that a son of O'Donoghue was buried in an abbey founded here by him, which was standing in 1231. The only present traces of the ancient dignity of Aghadoe are, the ruins of its cathedral, and the archdeaconry of Aghadoe, of which it still forms the corps. The parish is situated chiefly on the road from Killarney to Milltown and Tralee, and partly on that from Killarney to Cork; it comprehends within its limits the island of Innisfallen, and part of the lakes of Killarney, and comprises 19,888 statute acres. The lands consist of a ridge of shaly rock bounding and overlooking the great Lower Lake; and of a flat spreading towards the north into a wide expanse of wet bog, with shoals of gravel. On the expiration of the lease of the manor, held under its proprietor, the late Lord Headley, in 1826, his lordship took the estate under his own management. The farms, previously consisting of small portions of land held under middlemen by cottier tenants, were surveyed; were improved upon an arrangement adapted to the mutual benefit of landlord and tenant; and let on leases of 21 years in portions varying from 100 to 200 acres, with stipulated allowances for building comfortable farmhouses, making fences and drains, and drawing the requisite quantities of lime for the improvement of the soil. Several miles of new road were constructed, and extensive plantations made, solely at his lordship's expense. The hovels formerly occupied by the cottier tenants have been superseded by good houses built of stone and roofed with slate; attached to each are an orchard and garden, and the whole face of the district presents an appearance of improvement. The present Lord Headley has a pattern farm of considerable extent adjoining his demesne, and occupies a splendid villa in the Italian style, commanding an interesting and extensive view over the great Lower Lake of Killarney; the approach is by a small but elegant bridge across a ravine, leading from the entrance gate and lodge, which are both in a corresponding style of architecture. The plantations of Aghadoe House comprise about 100 acres, extending along the hill overlooking the lake. [For Lord Headley's other improvements see the articles on Castleisland and Glenbegh.] Grenn, the seat of John O'Connell, Esq., is pleasantly situated on the river Laune, near its outlet from the lake just mentioned; this river is considered capable of being made navigable to Castlemaine bay. Prospect Hall, the seat of the Hon. T. Browne, brother of the Earl of Kenmare, commands a fine view of the lake and its numerous islands. Near the town of Killarney, but within the limits of this parish, are extensive flour-mills worked by the small river Dinagh.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Ardfer and Aghadoe; forming the corps of the archdeaconry of Aghadoe, in the patronage of the Bishop; and partly inappropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore, and H. Herbert, Esq., of Muckross. The title rent-charge, including that of "the five plough-lands of Killarney," is £414. 3. 6., of which £335. 8. 6. are payable to the archdeacon; and of the remainder, £41. 5. are payable to the lessee of Lord Donoughmore, and £37. 10. to H. Herbert, Esq., as abbot of Innisfallen. The glebe comprises 32 acres. The church was recently erected on a site west of the ancient cathedral, at an expense of £740, of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners gave £90, the remainder being raised by subscription; the late Lord Headley, besides the building-ground, contributed £100, and expended nearly a like sum in gates and mason-work, with which he inclosed the churchyard. A tower was more recently added, at the cost of £250, whereof £150 were from Lady Headley, and £100 from the Venerable Archdeacon Foster, who also put up a bell: the archdeacon has likewise built a handsome and roomy cottage as a residence for the clergyman whom he has appointed to the duties. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the unions or districts of Killarney, Killorglin, and Glenfesk: the chapel for the portion in the district of Killarney is at Fossa, to the north of the lake, adjoining the plantations of Lord Headley; and at Barraduff is a chapel for that part of the parish which is in the district of Glenfesk. In the town of Killarney, within this parish, is a convent for nuns of the order of the Presentation, in which is a school for girls, who are gratuitously instructed by the ladies of the convent, and to the support of which the Earl of Kenmare contributes £100 per annum. The venerable remains of the cathedral are situated on the summit of a range of low hills sloping gradually towards the northern shore of the great Lower Lake. Near them are the ruins of an ancient round tower, of which about 20 feet are yet standing; and at a short distance are those of an old castle, usually called "the Pulpit."

AGHADOWN.—See AUGHADOWN.

AGHADOWNY, or AGHADONY, a parish, in the union and half-barony of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (8 by W.) from Coleraine, on the road from that place to Dungannon; containing 7884 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north-east by the river Bann, is 10½ miles in length from north-west to south-east, and 4½ miles in breadth from north-east to south-west; and, with the extra-parochial grange or liberty of Agivey, which is locally within its limits, and has since the Reformation been attached to it, comprises 18,115½ statute acres, of which 1727½ are in Agivey; 119½ are covered with water. Its western extremity is mountainous and barren, but eastward, towards the river, the soil is fertile; the arable lands are generally in a high state of cultivation, particularly in the neighbourhood of the valley where the Agivey and Aghadown waters meet. Previously to the year 1828, no wheat was grown in the parish; but since that period the system of agriculture has been greatly improved, and the cultivation of mangel-wurzel and turnips has been introduced, and attended with complete success. There are considerable tracts of bog, but they will soon be exhausted by the large quantities annually consumed in the bleach-grounds; and in the western or mountainous parts are large tracts of land which, from the depth of the soil, might easily be brought into cultivation. Ironstone is found in several places, and is more particularly plentiful in the townland of Bovagh. The greater portion of the parish formed part of the lands granted in 1609, by James I., to the Irish Society, and is now held under the Ironmongers' Company, of London, by whom, on the expiration of the present leases, the lands will be let, as far as may be practicable, on the English principle.

Previously to 1730 the parish was for the most part uninclosed and uncultivated; but three streams of water which intersect it soon attracted the attention of some spirited individuals engaged in the LINEN trade, which at that time was coming into notice, and had obtained the sanction of some legislative enactments for its encouragement and support. Of these persons, the first that settled here with a view to the introduction of that trade were, Mr. J. Orr, of Ballybrittan, and Mr. J. Blair, of Ballydivitt, who, in 1744, established some bleach-grounds; since that time the number has increased, and there are at present not less than eleven in the parish, of which ten are in full operation. The quantity of linen bleached and finished here, in a recent year, amounted to 126,000 pieces, almost exclusively for the English market; they were chiefly purchased in the brown state in the markets of Coleraine, Ballymoney, Strabane, and Londonderry. The goods are generally known in England as "Coleraines," by which name all linens of a similar kind, wherever made, are now called, from the early celebrity which that town acquired for linens of a certain width and quality. In addition to the bleaching and finishing, Messrs. A. and G. Barklie have introduced the manufacture of linens, and have already 800 looms employed. Coarse kinds of earthenware, bricks, and water-pipes, are also manufactured in considerable quantities; and when the navigation of the river Bann is opened, there is every probability that this place will increase in importance.

THE LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, constituting the corps of the prebend of Aghadowry in the cathedral of that see, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £375. The church, situated in a fertile vale near the centre of the parish, and repaired in 1760, is a small neat edifice with a handsome tower, formerly surmounted by a lofty octagonal spire, erected at the expense of the late Earl of Bristol (when Bishop of Derry), but which was destroyed by lightning in 1820; the tower, being but slightly injured, was afterwards embattled, and crowned with pinnacles. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £183 for the repair of the church. The Board of First Fruits granted £100 towards the erection of a glebe-house, in 1789; and in 1794 the present house, called Blackheath, was built by Sir Harvey Bruce, Bart., as a glebe-house for the parish. It is a handsome residence; over the mantel-piece in the drawing-room is an elegant piece of sculpture representing Socrates discovering his pupil Alcibiades in the haunts of dissipation, which was brought from Italy by Lord Bristol, and presented to Sir H. Bruce. The glebe lands comprise 403 statute acres, exclusively of 121 acres in Agivey. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Killowen, or Coleraine, and contains a small chapel at Mullaghinch. There are places of worship for Presbyterians of the General Assembly, and for Covenanters. A religious establishment was founded here, in the 7th century, by St. Goeacus, as a cell to the priory or abbey founded by him at Agivey; the latter became a grange to the abbey of St. Mary-de-la-Fonta, or Mecasquin, in 1172. A very splendid lachrymatory or double patera of pure gold, of exquisite workmanship and in good preservation, was found at Mullaghinch in 1832. In the townland of Crevilla is a large Druidical altar, called by the country people the "Grey Stane;" and on the mountains above Rushbrook is a copious chalybeate spring, powerfully impregnated with iron and sulphur held in solution by carbonic acid gas.

AGHADRUNSEEL, FERMANAGH.—See CLONES.

AGHAGALLEN, or AUGHAGALLON, a parish, in the union of LURGAN, Upper half-barony of MASSAREENE, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (N.W. by N.) from Moira, on the road from that place to Antrim; containing 3862 inhabitants. It is bounded on the west by Lough Neagh, and comprises 7885 statute acres, of which 2415 acres are in the lough. The land is chiefly under an improved system of tillage; there are about 300 acres of bog, a considerable portion of which is waste, but might be rendered useful by keeping Lough Neagh at the summer level. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in weaving linen and cotton, and some in spinning. The parish is intersected by the Lagan canal from Lough Neagh to Belfast. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, and is part of the union of Aghalee; the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Hertford. The tithe rent-charge is £124. 17. 6, of which £19. 17. 6. are payable to the proprietor, and the remainder to the vicar. The church has long been in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions Aghagallen is the head of a union or district, called sometimes the union of Ballinderry, which comprises the parishes of Aghagallen and Ballinderry, and contains two chapels, one in each parish.

AGHAGOWER.—See AUGHAGOWER.

AGHALEE, or AGHANALEE, a parish, in the union of LURGAN, Upper half-barony of MASSAREENE, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 1 mile (N. by W.) from Moira, on the road from that place to Antrim; containing 1450 inhabitants, of whom 143 are in the village. This place obtained the name of Soldiers'-town from its having had, during the war in 1641, a barrack in the village, in which were quartered two troops of horse and foot belonging to the royal army. The parish is bounded on the west by that of Aghagallen, and comprises 2499½ statute acres: the land is fertile and in a very high state of cultivation; there is neither bog nor waste. Limestone abounds, but no quarries are at present wrought. Many of the working class are employed at their own houses in weaving linen and cotton for the manufacturers of Belfast. The parish is in the diocese of Dromore: the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Hertford; the vicarage forms the head of the union of Aghalee. The tithe rent-charge is £75. 12., of which £16. 7. are payable to the proprietor, and the remainder to the vicar: the vicarial tithe rent-charge of the whole union is £238. 10. The church of the union, situated here, is a small plain edifice, built in the reign of Charles II., and in substantial repair. The glebe-house, about half a mile from the church, was built in 1825; and the glebe contains 13½ statute acres, valued at £12. 8. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions Aghalee forms part of the district of Moira. A finely wrought and flexible piece of gold, shaped like a gorget, was found near this place a few years since.

AGHALOO.—See AUGHALOO.

AGHALURCHER, a parish, in the union of CLOGHER and LISNASKEA, partly in the barony of CLOGHER, county of TYRONE, but chiefly in that of MAGHERASTEPHENA, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, on the road from Cavan to Enniskillen; containing, with the towns of Maguire's-Bridge and Lisnaskea, 16,740 inhabitants. This parish is situated on Lough Erne, and is 17 miles in length (extending from the island of Cor-dillar, near Crumcastle, to Ballaghough, within two miles of Clogher), and 5 miles in breadth. It comprises 47,015½ statute acres, including 3157½ covered with water; 4708½ are in Tyrone, and 42,307½ in Fermanagh. About one-fourth is pasturable mountain and bog. The system of agriculture is greatly improved, and the crops and stock are usually productive and of good quality; the peasantry, in addition to their agricultural pursuits, are employed in spinning and weaving, and are generally industrious and in comfortable circumstances. Limestone and limestone-gravel abound, and there are some good quarries of freestone and of mill-stone; Slushill quarry is considered one of the best in the north of Ireland, and produces freestone of excellent quality. Coal has been discovered on the Colebrooke estate. The only river of note is Maguire's or Colebrooke river, which runs nearly the whole length of the parish; it is navigable, and abounds with pike, perch, trout, and eels. There are several bridges over this river; one of them at Maguire's-Bridge (which is a flourishing market-town); and another at Ballindanahill, between that place and Lough Erne, a substantial structure of seven large arches, on the great line of road. Lough Erne, in which are seven islands included within this parish, abounds with salmon, pike, eels, perch, and bream; it is navigable from Belleek, and affords a facility of supplying the barracks of Belturbet with turf from this place. Colebrooke is the splendid residence of Sir Arthur Brooke, Bart.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £623. 5. The church, situated at Cooltrane, is a handsome edifice surmounted by an elegant spire; it was enlarged in 1843, by subscription, aided by a grant from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and is capable of containing between 500 and 600 persons. There are chapels of ease at Lisnaskea and Mullagad, and two chapels licensed for divine service at Maguire's-Bridge and Kiltennon. The greater part of the glebe lands are in the parish of Galloon: they consist of 458 statute acres, whereof two-thirds are arable, and one-third is moor and bog; some of these lands are within two miles of Clogher, and from five to six miles distant from the church. There are places of worship for Presbyterians and Primitive Wesleyan Methodists at Maguire's-Bridge; the former is in connexion with the General Assembly. Within two miles of Lisnaskea are the venerable ruins of the ancient church of Agbalurcher, said to have been built towards the close of the 9th century, and dedicated to St. Ronan. Some remains of an old castle exist on the townland of Aheter, within a mile of Five-mile-town, on the Colebrooke estate: here the insurgents are said to have sustained a siege in the last rebellion of the Maguires. There are also two old castles in Largy deer-park, and one in the town of Brookboro', in the parish of Aughavea; all of which formerly belonged to the Maguire family; and on Naan, an island in Lough Erne, are the remains of a very extensive castle, which in remote times was a formidable stronghold, surrounded on all sides by water of the lake more than a mile in breadth. There are numerous sulphureous and chalybeate springs in the parish.—See MAGUIRE'S-BRIDGE and LISNASKEA.

AGHAMACART.—See AUGHAMACART.

AGHANAGH.—See AUGHANAGH.

AGHANCON, a parish, in the union of ROSCREA, partly in the barony of CLONLISK, but chiefly in that of BALLYBRITT, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (N.) from Roscrea, on the road from Parsonstown to Mountrath; containing 1310 inhabitants. It comprises 5544 statute acres: the land is mostly poor, but the state of agriculture is much improved; there is some bog, and gristone used for building is found. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10. The church is a neat edifice in good repair; it was built in 1786, at the joint expense of Dr. Pery, Bishop of Limerick, and Jonathan Darby, Esq., with the aid of a gift of £360 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built by a former incumbent, and was much improved and enlarged at the expense of the Rev. R. M. Kennedy, the late incumbent; the glebe comprises 15 acres. The ruins of Ballybrit Castle yet exist; and on the townland of Garryhill is a mineral spring.

AGHANLOO, AGHANLOE, or AUGHANLOO, a parish, in the union of NEWTOWN-LIMAVADY, barony of KENNAUGHT, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Newtown-Limavady; containing 1841 inhabitants. It comprises 8251½ statute acres, of which 50½ are under water. On the plantation of Ulster in the reign of James I., the lands of this parish and several others were allotted to the Haberdashers' Company, of London, who selected this as the head of their territory, and built a bawn and castle for its defence, in 1619; the castle was called Bally Castle, or "the Castle of the Town," and was placed under the custody of Sir Robert M'Leelan, who had a garrison of 80 able men with proper arms for its protection. In the war of 1641 the castle was besieged by the insurgents, headed by Capt. O. Hagan, but was bravely defended by Capt. Philips, its governor, till May in the following year, when it was relieved by the united Derry and Strabane troops, under the command of Col. Mervyn, and the assailants put to flight; but in the contentions which afterwards ensued it was destroyed, and it has ever since been in ruins. The lands are of variable quality: in the district bordering on the Roe the soil is fertile, being principally composed of gravel, with a mixture of clay, and yields abundant crops of wheat, oats, &c.; towards the mountains it is a stiff marl, with a substratum of white limestone, and produces excellent crops of flax and oats. The mountain of Beneyevnagh, consisting entirely of basalt, and rising to the height of 1260 feet above the level of Lough Foyle, which washes its base, affords excellent pasturage, and is cultivated on the western side nearly to its summit. Limestone abounds, and is found ranging immediately under the basalt throughout the whole length of the parish. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £236. 5. The church, a small neat edifice in the early English style, was erected in 1826, by a grant of £830 from the Board of First Fruits; it has a lofty square tower crowned with pinnacles, and is situated about a quarter of a mile to the south of the ruins of the old church. The glebe-house, built about 1789, and nearly adjoining the church, is a handsome residence; the glebe comprises 34a. 3r. 13p. statute measure. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included partly in the district of Magilligan, and partly in that of Newtown-Limavady. A portion of the south wall of the old church is still remaining; the structure was destroyed by the insurgents in 1641, and was rebuilt from the produce of forfeited impropriations, by order of William III. The Rev. G. V. Sampson, author of a Map and Memoir of the County of Derry, was rector of this parish, and his statistical survey is dated from the glebe of Aghanloo.

AGHARA.—See AHARA.

AGHARNEY.—See AHARNEY.

AGHAVALLIN, or AGHAVALAH, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of IRRAGHTYCONNOR, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Tarbert; containing, with the town of Ballylongford, 6606 inhabitants. This place anciently belonged to the O'Connors of Kerry, whose principal seat, Castle Carrig-a-foile, signifying in the Irish language "the rock of the chasm," was situated on the south-west side of the inlet between the main land and the small island of Carrigue, which is encircled by the river Shannon. This castle was defended on the land side by a double wall flanked with circular and square bastions, which are still remaining; and was fortified against Queen Elizabeth by O'Connor, who placed in it a garrison under the command of Julio, an Italian officer. The castle, with the entire barony excepting only one estate, was forfeited by the O'Connors of Kerry, in 1666, and conferred by the act of settlement upon the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin. The PARISH is situated on the Shannon, within a mile and a half of the high road from Tralee to Limerick, and comprises 16,743 statute acres. About one-third is good arable land, rather more than one-third of a coarser quality, and the remainder mountain pasture and bog. Limestone for manure is brought from Askeaton by turf-boats returning from Limerick; and sea manure is also extensively used. A species of brown stone of good quality is quarried for building. A steam-boat passes daily from Kilrush to Tarbert and Limerick, and vessels of 20 tons enter the creek for potatoes and turf, in which a considerable traffic is carried on. Dredging for oysters off the island of Carrigue, and fishing, also employ several persons in the season. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardferd and Aghadoe, and forms part of the union of Listowel; the rectory is impropriate in Anthony Stoughton, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £228. 9., of which £114. 4. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church having been condemned, will perhaps be rebuilt by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of the district of Ballylongford, also called Tarbert, which comprises the parishes of Aghavallin and Kilnaughten: a chapel has been erected at Asdee, as a chapel of ease to that at Ballylongford; and there is also a chapel at Tarbert, in the parish of Kilnaughten.—See BALLYLONGFORD and CARRIGUE.

AGHAVEA.—See AUGHAVEA.

AGHAVILLER.—See AUGHAVILLER.

AGHAVOWER, or AGHAMORE, a parish, in the union of SWINFORD, barony of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (N.) from Ballyhaunis, on the road from that place to Swinford; containing 767½ inhabitants. St. Patrick is said to have erected a monastery here, for his disciple St. Loarn. The parish comprises 22,820 acres. The surface is varied with several small lakes; the lands are chiefly under tillage; there is a considerable quantity of bog; also a quarry of black marble. Fairs are held at Ballinacostello on June 3rd, Aug. 5th, Oct. 19th, and Dec. 18th. The parish is in the diocese of Tuam, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the union of Kiltullagh: the tithe rent-charge is £118. 13. 8. The church is in ruins, but the cemetery is still used. In the Roman Catholic divisions Aghavower is in the district of Kooek; the chapel is an old thatched building. At Cloonfallagh is a mineral spring.

AGHER, a parish, partly in the barony of LOWER DECKE, but chiefly in that of UPPER DECKE, union of TRIM, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. S. W.) from Summerhill; containing 386 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Summerhill to Edenderry, and on that from the latter town to Dunhoyme; and comprises 206½ statute acres. Its surface gently undulates, and the soil consists of loam of different qualities: about one-third of the land is under tillage; and the remainder, with the exception of 100 acres of bog, half of which is cut away and partly planted, is good grazing land. There are quarries of limestone. The Royal Canal passes near the southern extremity of the parish. Agher House occupies a beautiful situation in a demesne of about 650 statute acres, containing some fine timber: the gardens are extensive and well laid out; and the neat appearance of the cottages on the estate manifests the proprietor's regard for the comforts of the peasantry. The living is a rectory, with the rectories of Drumlargan and Gallowan united, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge of Agher is £60. The church is a neat edifice, erected in 1804, at an expense of nearly £600, raised by voluntary contributions and a parochial rate; it contains a window painted by Gervaise, representing Paul preaching at Athens, from the cartoons of Raphael, which window was formerly in the private chapel at Dangan, in the adjoining parish, when that place was the seat of the Wellesley family. There is a glebe-house, built in 1812, at a cost of £800; with a glebe of 12½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Laracor, or Summerhill; the chapel is situated on the townland of Agher, on ground given by the family of Winter. Here is also a dispensary.

AGHERN, or AHERN, a parish, in the union of FERMOY, barony of KINNATALOON, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E.) from Rathcormac; containing 1198 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Bride, over which is a bridge of three arches of stone; and on the road from Rathcormac to Castle-martyr, and the direct road from Cork to Tallow. A castle was erected here in 1399, by one of the Fitzgeralds, to command the pass of the river, on which was an ancient ford, at that time of great importance; this fortress was of considerable strength, and was powerfully garrisoned by the Earl of Desmond against the forces of Elizabeth. At no great distance were the castles of Duseen and Conna, both founded by the Fitzgeralds for the defence of other passes of the Bride, and of which there are some picturesque remains. The parish comprises 3489 statute acres, of which about 2855 are arable and pasture; 425 are coarse land and bog, but capable of being improved; and 200 consist of waste and mountain. The soil is in general fertile, particularly in the Vale of the Bride, where the substratum is limestone; the land is principally under tillage, and the system of agriculture rapidly improving. Ahera House is pleasantly situated near the ruins of the ancient castle, and the grounds comprise some interesting and beautiful scenery. There is a constabulary police station; and petty-sessions are held on the first Thursday in each month. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne; the rectory united from time immemorial to that of Ballynoe, and in the patronage of the Crown; and the vicarage episcopally united for many years to the entire rectory of Britway, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of Aghern is £278. 4., which is equally divided between the rector and the vicar; and the gross rent-charge of the union, payable to the incumbent, amounts to £342. 13. The church, situated near the bridge, at the extremity of the parish, is a neat edifice built in 1816, at an expense of £800, of which £500 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits. The Board also granted a gift and loan, each of £300, for the erection of a glebe-house, in 1822; the glebe comprises seven acres of profitable land. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Knockmoure, also called Ballynoe.

AGHERTON, or BALLYAGHERAN, a parish, in the union and liberties of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N.N.W.) from Coleraine; containing, with the town of Portstewart, 2318 inhabitants. This parish occupies the whole of the promontory between the Bann and the Atlantic, comprising 3896½ statute acres. With the exception of about 320 acres, the whole is arable; there is a small portion of uninclosed land, of which part is light, sandy, and chiefly a rabbit-warren, and part affords excellent pasture. The cultivation of wheat was introduced by Mr. Orr, in 1829, and great quantities are now annually raised. Similar success has attended the cultivation of barley, potatoes, mangel-wurzel, and turnips; and the agriculture of the parish is at present in a very flourishing state. Iron-ore is found in large quantities, and might be worked to advantage; but no works have yet been established. There are several gentlemen's seats in the parish, and some villas and handsome bathing-lodges at Portstewart, a pleasant and well-attended watering-place. A small manufacture of linen and linen-yarn is carried on, and many of the inhabitants are employed in the fisheries, particularly in the salmon-fishery on the river Bann. Of late, great quantities of salmon have been taken along the whole coast, by means of a newly invented net; and the sea fishery is continued for a long time after that on the river is by law compelled to cease. The Bann, which is the only outlet from Lough Neagh, discharges itself into the Atlantic at the western point of the parish; it appears to have changed its course, and now passes close under the point of Down Hill, the celebrated mansion erected by the Earl of Bristol, when Bishop of Derry.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, forming the corps of the treasurership in the cathedral of St. Saviour, Connor, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £180. The church, a small edifice, was erected in 1826, at an expense of £960, of which £100 were raised by subscription, £800 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits, and £60 were given by John Cromie, Esq., who also paid the interest on £700 of the loan until the debt was cancelled in 1833. Divine service is likewise performed by the curate every Sunday in the school-house at Portstewart. The glebe-house, a handsome residence close adjoining the church, was built in 1806, the Board granting £250 and a loan of £500; the glebe comprises 20 acres of profitable land. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Coleraine. There are places of worship for Presbyterians and Wesleyan Methodists, the former in connexion with the General Assembly. Mark Kerr O'Neill, Esq., in 1814, bequeathed £40 per annum to the poor. Some remains of the ancient castle of Mac Quillan exist on the glebe land, not far from the church. Near them are the gabled walls of the old church, still tolerably entire; and in the adjoining field is an extensive cave, formed of uncemented walls covered with flat stones, and which is one of the largest and most perfect yet known in this part of the country: there are several other caves in the parish. In the townland of Carnauee is a very fine triangular fort, called Craig-an-Ariff; it is defended by fosses and breastworks, and is the only fort so constructed in this part of Ireland: within the inclosure are two cairns or tumuli. Dr. Adam Clarke, whose father kept a school for several years in the old parish church, received the rudiments of his education here; and in the latter part of his life spent much of his time in the summer at Portstewart, where, during his stay in 1830, he built a handsome house, and erected in the gardens of Mr. Cromie a curious astronomical and geographical dial, which is still preserved there.—See PORTSTEWART.

AGHIART, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, barony of KILLIAN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 12 miles (E.S.E.) from Tuam, on the road from that place to Ballinasloe: the population is returned with the parish of Ballinakilly. It comprises 3203 statute acres, as appotted under the tithe act; the soil is fertile, the land generally in a good state of cultivation, and the bogs are all reclaimable. The parish is in the diocese of Tuam, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the union of Moylough: the tithe rent-charge, which includes that of Ballinakilly, amounts to £111. 7. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions Aghiar is the head of a district, sometimes called the union of Mount-Bellew, which comprises the parishes of Aghiar, Killascoe, and Moylough, and contains three chapels, situated respectively at Mount-Bellew, Menlo, and Moylough; the first is a handsome slated edifice, erected at the sole expense of C. D. Bellew, Esq.

AGHINAGH.—See AHINAGH.

AGHNAMEADLE, a parish, in the union of NAGH, barony of UPPER OMDON, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S.) from Moneygall, on the road from Limerick to Dublin; containing, with the village of Toomavara, 3893 inhabitants. This place was formerly the residence of the O'Egan family, and there are still considerable portions of the old Court of Aghnameadle remaining. The parish is bounded on the east by King's county, and comprises 10,322 statute acres. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £276. 18. The church is a small edifice, erected in 1833, at a cost of £900, the gift of the late Board of First Fruits. Glebe land, comprising five acres, was obtained in 1839; and a glebe-house has been built by the Rev. T. Knox, incumbent, at his own expense (upwards of £1000), leaving a charge on his successor of £554. In the Roman Catholic divisions Aghnameadle is the head of a district, which comprises also the parish of Ballymackey and is called the union of Toomavara, and in which are two chapels; one at Toomavara, a large building, and one at Ballymackey. There are remains of Blanc Castle, and of the old church, near which is an oratory apparently of great antiquity; and at Ballinlough is a chalybeate spring.—See TOOMAVARA.

AGHNAMOLT.—See ANNAMOLT.

AGHNAMULLEN.—See AUGHNAMULLEN.

AGHOLD, AGHOWLE, or AGH-VAIL, a parish, in the union and barony of SHILLELAGH, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Tullow; containing 2764 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the south-western boundary of the county, comprises 8139½ statute acres. The state of agriculture is improving; there is a considerable quantity of mountain land and bog. A constabulary police station has been established here; and petty-sessions are held at Coolkenno every alternate Monday. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Leighlin; constituting the corps of the prebend of Aghold in the cathedral church of St. Lazerian, Leighlin; and episcopally united, in 1714, to the impropriate curacies of Mullinacuff, Creccrin, and Liscoleman, which parishes were all till lately in the union of Aghold, in the patronage of the Bishop. Mullinacuff, however, has been separated from the union, and now forms a district parish of itself. The tithe rent-charge of Aghold is £348. 2.; and the gross rent-charge of the union, payable to the incumbent, is £420, from which are to be deducted £21 benefice tax, and a like sum, instalment for glebe-house, annually payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church was erected in 1716, and enlarged by aid of a loan of £350 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1814. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1350 from the same Board; the glebe comprises 12 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is included in the district of Clonmore; the chapel is at Kilquiggan.

AGHULTIE, county CORK.—See BALLYHOOLEY.

AGIVEY, a grange, or an extra-parochial district, locally in the parish of AGHADOWY, union and half-barony of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Coleraine; containing 950 inhabitants. This place appears to have been the site of a religious establishment, by some called a priory and by others an abbey, the foundation of which, about the beginning of the seventh century, is attributed to St. Goaricus, who afterwards founded a cell at Agha-Dubthaigh, now Aghadowy. The establishment subsequently became dependent on the abbey of St. Mary-de-la-Fonta, or Mecasquin, which was founded in the year 1172, and to which this district became a grange. There are still some slight remains of the religious house, with an extensive cemetery in which are some tombs of the ancient family of the Cannings, ancestors of the present Lord Garvagh. The liberty is situated on the western bank of the river Bann, and on the road from Newtown-Limavady to Ballymoney, which is continued over the river by a light and handsome bridge of wood, of 6 arches 203 feet in span, erected in 1834 at the joint expense of the counties of Londonderry and Antrim. It comprises 1727½ statute acres, and forms part of the estates of the Ironmongers' Company, of London. The land is fertile, but, being divided into small holdings in the occupation of tenants without capital to expend on its improvement, has been greatly neglected, and no regular system of agriculture has been adopted; there is a small tract of bog, which is now nearly worked out for fuel. Potters'-clay of good quality is found here in great abundance; and a considerable manufacture of coarse earthenware, bricks, and water-pipes, is carried on for the supply of the neighbourhood. Ironstone is found near the Aghadowy water, and there are also some indications of coal. A fair is held on Nov. 12th, under a charter granted to the monks of Coleraine at a very early period, and is chiefly for the sale of cattle and pigs. There is neither a church nor any other place of worship in the district; the inhabitants attend divine service at Aghadowy.

AGLISH, a parish, in the union of MACROOM, barony of EAST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (W. by S.) from Cork; containing 2579 inhabitants. It is situated on the south bank of the river Lee, between it and the Bride, which winds pleasantly on its southern border; and contains 6771 statute acres, of which about 5000 are arable, 1481 pasture, and the remainder woodland, waste, bog, and water. The land is generally fertile, and the state of agriculture is improving; irrigation is practised very advantageously on the grass lands. On the south side of the parish lies an extensive marsh, reclaimable at a small expense, and of which, in the summer of 1844, a 'part was reclaimed by drains, and by deepening the Bride. In the village of Farrenavara are a petty-sessions' court-house, and a station of the constabulary police. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is partly impropriate in Lieut.-Col. Mair, and partly appropriate to the prebend of Kilbrogan in the cathedral of St. Finbarr, Cork. The tithe rent-charge is £465, of which £190 are payable to the impropriator, £35 to the prebendary, and £310 to the vicar. The church is in ruins, and until it can be rebuilt, divine service is performed in a house licensed by the bishop. There is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the union or district of Ovens; the chapel is a large old plain building.

AGLISH, a parish, in the poor-law union of KILLARNEY, barony of MAGONINHY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Milltown; on the north-east side of the river Laune, and on the road from Killarney to Milltown; containing 1939 inhabitants. It comprises 4837 statute acres: the greater part of the land is of the best quality and under tillage, and the system of agriculture has been much improved within the last few years; there are about 100 acres of bog. At Barleymount is a quarry of excellent building stone, from which the stone was taken for Lord Headley's mansion at Aghadoe. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardferit and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Earl of Cork, in whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £117. 13. 9., one-half of which is payable to the impropriator, and the other to the vicar. The church is a neat structure, with an octagon tower on a square base; it was built in 1823, at an expense of £700, defrayed by the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built about the same time, the Board having granted £337 and a loan of £142: the glebe comprises 147. 3r. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Fieries; the old chapel is disused, and a chapel was built within the last twenty-five years at Ballyhar, on the border of this parish, but within the limits of the parish of Kilcredane. Immediately adjoining the church are the remains of the ancient structure, completely mantled with ivy, and forming an interesting appendage.

AGLISH, or AGLISHMARTIN, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of IVERK, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (W.) from Waterford; on the river Suir, and on the road from Waterford to Carrick-on-Suir; containing 440 inhabitants. It comprises 1343 statute acres; and the living, at the time of its recent suppression, was a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £72. 14., payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is neither church nor glebe-house; the glebe consists of two acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Aglish is part of the district of Moncoin.

AGLISH, county of MAYO.—See CASTLEBAR.

AGLISH, a parish, in the union of DUNGARVAN, barony of DECIES-WITHIN-DRUM, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (W.) from Dungarvan; containing 3783 inhabitants, of whom 458 are in the village. This parish is situated on the river Blackwater, by which it is bounded on the west; and comprises 6856 statute acres. Part of it is mountains, but towards the river the soil is generally fertile. It is in the diocese of Lismore, and is a vicarage, forming part of the union of Aflane; the rectory is impropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The tithe rent-charge is £360, of which £240 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. There is a chapel at Villierstown independent of the vicarage, founded and endowed by John, Earl of Grandison; the living is a donative, in the patronage of H. V. Stuart, Esq. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parish of Whitechurch and part of the parish of Ardmore, and contains three chapels, situated respectively at Aglish, Ballynamileach, and Slievegrine; also a friary chapel.

AGLISHCLOGHANE, or ENGLISH, a parish, in the union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of LOWER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (N. E.) from Burris-o-kane, on the road from Roscrea to Portumna; containing 1938 inhabitants. It comprises 5898 statute acres. The system of agriculture is improving, and a considerable portion of moor land, formerly waste, has been reclaimed and brought into cultivation: there is still an abundance of bog. Limestone of superior quality abounds, and is quarried for building. The living consists of a rectory, vicarage, and perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Killaloe: the vicarage, with cure of souls, forms the corps of the archdeaconry of Killaloe, with which are held, without cure, the rectories of Aglishcloghane, Lorrha, and Dorrha, episcopally united in 1785, and by act of council in 1804, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the perpetual curacy is in the patronage of the Archdeacon. The tithe rent-charge of Aglishcloghane is £121. 3., and of the entire union £760. 1. The church of the union is at Lorrha, where is also the glebe-house of the archdeaconry; and there are two glebes, comprising together about 43 acres, situated respectively near the sites of the old churches. The church of the perpetual curacy, a neat building erected in 1815, by a gift of £800 from the Board of First Fruits, is situated near the ruins of the old church, in the churchyard of which is an ash-tree of large dimensions. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the same Board, in 1816; the glebe comprises 13 acres, and the stipend of the perpetual curate is £100 per annum, paid by the archdeacon. This is one of the three parishes which constitute the Roman Catholic district of Burris-o-kane; the chapel is in the village of English.

AGLISHCORMICK, or LISCORMUCK, a parish, in the union of TIPPERARY, partly in the barony of COONAGH, but principally in that of CLANWILLIAM, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 2½ miles (W. S. W.) from Pallasgreine, on the road to Bruff; containing 738 inhabitants. It comprises 1715 statute acres: the land is in general of good quality. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, and forms part of the corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of St. Alibens, Emly, in the patronage of the Bishop of Cashel. The tithe rent-charge is £103. 17.: there is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Kiltely, or Liscely.

AGLISHDRINAGH, or AGLISHDRIDEEN, a parish, within the union of MALLOW, barony of ORRERY and KILMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Charleville, on the road from that place to Buttevant; containing 1026 inhabitants. It comprises 3310 statute acres: the land under tillage is in general of good quality, but a large portion of the parish consists of hilly pasture. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop : the tithe rent-charge is £160. There is now neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is one of the six parishes that constitute the union of Ballyhea, or Newtown. There are some vestiges of the ancient parish church.

AGLISHMARTIN.—See AGLISH.

AGLISHVENAN.—See BALLYMACART.

AHABOLLOGUE, or AGHABOLLOGUE, a parish, in the union of MACROOM, barony of EAST MUSKERRY, West riding of the county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Macroom; containing 6001 inhabitants. It comprises 18,733 statute acres; the surface is very uneven, and the soil various. On part of its eastern boundary, near the Dripsy, the land is very productive, and under a better system of cultivation than the rest of the parish. The greater part is capable of vast improvement; but, generally, the state of agriculture is still very backward, though it has been advancing within the last few years, principally by the more extended adoption of under-draining, irrigation, and the rearing of green crops. The inhabitants are employed exclusively in the business of husbandry. In the northern and western parts of the parish are several lofty hills, whereof Burrin, Knocknagoun, and Knock-rour are the highest. The glen of Mullinassig is a beautiful and romantic spot; its sides are richly adorned with wood and ivy-covered rocks; and at the bottom runs a small mountain stream, forming at the upper end a fine cascade, and expanding below into a charming lake. Several handsome houses, standing in rich and well-planted demesnes, are scattered over the parish, and the greater number of the owners are resident. There is no village.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £562. 10. A neat church has lately been built, by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, on the site of a former one; and a chapel of ease has been erected by subscription for the accommodation of those residing near the western boundary of the parish. Adjoining the churchyard is the ancient glebe, of 5 acres: another glebe, of 30 acres, purchased at Ahavrin, by the late Board of First Fruits, is subject to an annual rent. On the latter have been recently erected a glebe-house and its offices, and a garden has been formed, by the rector, the Rev. William Welland; the grounds, which have much natural beauty, have been improved by planting, and the whole constitutes a handsome residence. In the Roman Catholic divisions, the south-east part of the parish is united to Magourney, and the north-west portion to Aghinagh. In the former district are two chapels, one in Ahabollogue, and the other in Magourney, both large and handsome edifices, lately improved, and almost rebuilt, by the Rev. Mr. Mahony, P.P.; a chapel for the northern district has been built within the last three years, by the Rev. Mr. O'Kearney, P.P. The parochial school, for boys and girls, stands on the glebe adjoining the church, and is endowed by the rector with the entire plot of glebe. Near the church is a celebrated well, dedicated to St. Olan; and in the churchyard is a square stone, surmounted by another called St. Olan's cap, and inscribed with a number of Ogham characters.

AHACROSS, or AGHACROSS, a parish, in the union of FERMOY, barony of CORDONS and CLONGIBBONS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Mitchelstown; containing 104 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the confines of the county of Limerick, and near the road from Kildorrery to Mitchelstown, comprises only 355 statute acres, and consists chiefly of mountainous pasture. Fairs are held on Jan. 20th and Oct. 3rd, principally for cattle. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, and forms part of the union of Clenore, from which it is detached by the intervention of several other parishes: the tithe rent-charge is £22. 14. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ahacross is in the district of Kildorrery.

AHADRUMSEE.—See CLONES.

AHAMPLISH, a parish, in the union of SLIGO, barony of LOWER CARRIGE, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 9 miles (N. N. W.) from Sligo; containing, with the villages of Ballintemple and Grange, 8720 inhabitants. It is situated on the north-west coast, near the entrance to the bay of Sligo, and on the road from Sligo to Ballyshannon; and comprises 16,419½ statute acres. The surface was till lately naked and unadorned, having only one small wood on the lands of Grellagh, near the river Bunduff, the estate of Viscount Palmerston, who is proprietor of the greater part of the parish: many trees, however, have been planted within the last few years. The mountain of Benbulbin, which rises 1697 feet above the sea, extends in a direction from east to west, and separates this parish from Drumcliffe. Much improvement in the mode of tillage has taken place of late, but the system of husbandry is comparatively still deficient, and the farming implements are of rather an inferior kind: limestone and turf are plentiful. A great extent of bog has been reclaimed by Lord Palmerston, who has also planted large breadths of sandy banks with bent. Other improvements, made exclusively by the direction and at the expense of that nobleman, are noticed under the head of Mullaghmore. There is a salmon fishery in the river Bunduff; and at Mullaghmore several boats were formerly employed in taking turbot, cod, and other kinds of fish, which abound on this part of the coast. There are some corn-mills in the parish. Seven fairs for live stock are held at Grange; and a fair is held on Feb. 1st at Clifanny, which has also a post-office under Sligo. Grange is both a coast-guard and a constabulary police station. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in Lord Palmerston. The tithe rent-charge is £166. 3, divided in moieties between the improprator and the incumbent. The church is a plain edifice built in 1813, for which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £700, and Lord Palmerston contributed £100; it contains a marble monument to the Soden family, with an inscription recording the death of James Soden, in 1705, at the age of 109 years: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £119 for the repair of the edifice. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are two chapels, situated at Grange and Clifanny, and built at the sole expense of Lord Palmerston.

AHAPHOND, a village, in the parish of KILLEHENY, county of LISTOWEL, barony of IRAGHTICONNOR, union of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER; containing 281 inhabitants.

AHARA, otherwise AGHARA, a parish, in the union of LONGFORD, barony of ABBEYSHRUEL, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Ballymahon, on the road from that place to Mullingar; containing 1036 inhabitants. It comprises 2595 statute acres: the land is principally under tillage, but there is a large tract of bog. Petty-sessions are held every alternate week. The parish is in the diocese of Ardagh, and is part of the union of Kilglass, to which the vicarage is attached; the rectory is inappropriate in the Fox family. The tithe rent-charge is £81. 11., of which £28 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the glebe comprises 37 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ahara is also united to Kilglass. The remains of the church are still visible at Ahara, and there are also ruins of the ancient castle of Arandra.

AHARNEY, or AGHARNEY, also called LISDOWNEY, a parish, in the union of KILKENNY, partly in the barony of CLARMALLAGH, QUEEN'S county, but chiefly in that of GALMOY, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Durrow, on the road to Kilkenny; containing 2586 inhabitants. It comprises 6940 statute acres, and is nearly equally divided between tillage and pasturage; there is plenty of limestone, used both for building and burning. At Ballyconra is an extensive flour-mill, capable of manufacturing 40,000 barrels annually; and there is another at the bridge of Ballyragget. The house of Ballyconra, situated in a fine demesne on the banks of the Nore, is the ancient seat of the family of Butler, earls of Kilkenny. A manor court is held at Clontubrid once a month, the jurisdiction of which extends over part of this parish. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, the former united to the rectory of Attanagh, and the latter forming part of the vicarial union of Attanagh: the tithe rent-charge is £255, of which £170 are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district called the union of Lisdowney, comprising the parishes of Aharney, Sheffin, Balleen, Coolcasshin, and parts of Rathbeagh and Grange, and containing three chapels; that of Lisdowney was built by subscription. The parochial church is in ruins; within the demesne of Ballyconra, where is the burial-place of the family of Butler, are other remains; and on the opposite side of the river is a Danish fort.

AHASCRAGH, a post-town and parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, partly in the baronies of KILCONNELL and CLONMACNOON, but chiefly in that of KILLIAN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 30 miles (E. N. E.) from Galway, and 78 miles (W.) from Dublin, on the road from Ballinasloe to Castlebar; containing 5380 inhabitants, of whom 775 are in the town, which contains about 120 houses. It is situated in a fine corn country; and there is a mill, belonging to Mr. Bell, manufacturing 25,000 barrels of oatmeal annually, solely for the English market. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday, Wednesday after Trinity, Aug. 25th, and Nov. 24th. Petty-sessions are held fortnightly, and here is a station of the constabulary police. The parish comprises 17,342 statute acres: there are quarries of excellent limestone, also a large tract of bog. Castle French, the seat of Lord French, and part of the demesne of Clonbrock, the seat of Lord Clonbrock, are within the parish. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Elphin, and in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £242. 6. The church is a neat building, erected in 1814, at an expense of £1500, of which £1000 were granted on loan by the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built in 1810, at a cost of £923, and the same Board gave £100 towards defraying the expense; the glebe comprises 24 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a large building, with a burial-ground annexed. Under the patronage of Sir Ross Mahon and of Lord Clonbrock, a charitable loan society was established in 1833.

AHINAGH, or AGHINAGH, a parish, in the union of MACROOM, barony of EAST MUSKERAY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Macroom; containing 2699 inhabitants. This parish, anciently called Omai, contains the village of Carrigadrohid, through which the mail-coach from Cork to Tralee passes. It comprises 9420 statute acres: the land is generally good, and is well sheltered, particularly towards its southern boundary; about four-fifths are under a profitable system of cultivation; the remainder is rough pasture and bog. There are stone-quarries, which are worked for building. The river Lee is crossed at the village of Carrigadrohid by an old bridge built by order of Cromwell, which connects the parish with the pretty modern village of Killinardish. The banks of the river are here adorned with several elegant houses. Oakgrove is a modern mansion, situated in a richly ornamented demesne containing some of the finest oaks in the country; Coolata is a pretty villa in the midst of picturesque grounds tastefully planted; and contiguous to the church is the glebe-house, a handsome edifice. Besides the woods of Oakgrove, there are flourishing plantations of young timber at Carrigadrohid and Umery, the former very extensive.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £553. 14. The church is a small plain edifice with a square tower, erected in 1791, and for which the Board of First Fruits gave £500. The glebe-house was built in 1814, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1500 from the same Board; the glebe comprises 25½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions, one-half of this parish is comprised within the district of Abalobogue, which has a chapel at Rushen; the other is united to Macroom, for which there is a chapel at Caum. The principal remains of antiquity are the ruined castles of Carrigadrohid and Mashanaglass; the former, according to some writers, built by a branch of the MacCarthy family, and by others ascribed to the family of O'Leary; it is a massive structure situated on a rock in the river Lee, with some modern additions, including an entrance opened from the bridge. The owner of the lands of Carrigadrohid has a patent for a fair, which is now held in a field in the parish of Cannaway. The castle of Mashanaglass is a lofty square tower of gloomy aspect, built by the Mac Swineys. Smith, in his History of Cork, mentions a letter addressed by James I. to the Lord-deputy Sydney, directing him to accept the surrender of the lands of Owen Mac Swiney, otherwise "Hoggy of Mashanaglass." A little to the north of this ruin is Glen Laum, "the crooked glen," now called Umery, through which the mail-coach road is carried; it is inclosed by precipitous rocky heights covered with valuable plantations. On the glebe are the remains of a cromlech; and several single stones, called "Gollanes," are standing in the parish. Rath or Danish forts are numerous, and there are some artificial caves.

AHOGHILL, a parish, in the union of BALLYMENA, partly in the barony of LOWER ANTRIM, partly in that of UPPER TOOMBS, but chiefly in the barony of LOWER TOOMBS, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Portlone, containing 8876 inhabitants, of whom 477 are in the village. The district around this place appears, from the numerous remains of forts and the great number of tumuli and human bones found, to have been the scene of much early warfare. During the war of 1688, also, the ford of the river Bann at Portlone, an adjoining parish, was regarded as a very important pass between the counties of Antrim and Derry; and Sir J. Magill and Capt. Edmonston were, in 1689, despatched to defend it against the Irish army on their march towards the Bann, in order to enter the county of Derry. In 1760, when the French under Throt made a descent on Carrickfergus, the inhabitants of this place rose in a body for the defence of the country: a well-appointed force marched to Belfast, numerous parties proceeded to Carrickfergus, while others patrolled the country nightly; and these irregular levies had a powerful effect in repelling the invaders. About the year 1771, an organised system of outrage pervaded the whole of this parish, in common with other parts of the county: the persons who thus combined, called themselves "Steel Men," or "Hearts of Steel," and executed their revenge by hounding cattle and perpetrating other outrages; they attacked the house of Paul M'Larnon, Esq., who, in defending himself, was shot. In 1778, a corps was raised by John Dickey, Esq., of Cullybackey, in the parish of Craigs, and called the Cullyhackey Volunteers; a similar corps was embodied the following year by T. Hill, Esq., of Drama, and called the Portlone Volunteers, to which was afterwards added a second corps by Mr. Simpson; and a corps, called the Ahoghill Volunteers, was raised by Alexander M'Manus, Esq., of Mount Davys.

The PARISH anciently styled Maghrahogh, a name of which the derivation is unknown, is situated near the river Bann, which flows out of Lough Neagh in a direction from south to north; and is intersected by the river Maine, which flows into that lough in a direction from north to south. Including Portlone and Craigs, which were lately detached from Ahoghill and formed into distinct parishes, the parish comprised 35,419 statute acres, whereof 145 $\frac{1}{2}$ were covered with water: exclusively of Portlone and Craigs, the area is only 12,167 acres. The system of agriculture is very indifferent; there is a considerable quantity of waste land, with some extensive bogs which might be drained. The scenery, however, in some parts good: the surface is hilly; and many of the eminences being planted, the valley through which the Maine flows is rendered beautiful and interesting. The village is neatly built, and has been much improved within the last three years by Major Rowan: the neighbourhood is enlivened with several gentlemen's seats. The castle of Galgorm, a seat of the Earl of Mountcashel, is a handsome square embattled edifice, erected in the 17th century by the celebrated Dr. Colville; the rooms are wainscoted with Irish oak from the woods of Lurg and Grange. The mansion of Mount Davys, situated in a picturesque demesne on the west bank of the Maine water, derives its appellation from a family which formerly possessed it, and which was conspicuous in the 17th and 18th centuries among the burgesses of Carrickfergus: the name of Davys is found repeatedly in the lists of sheriffs, mayors, and members of parliament for that borough from 1612 to 1743. The linen trade in its several branches affords employment to the greater number of the inhabitants: there are bleach-works on the Braid river and river Maine; and a good monthly market was till lately held in the village, for the sale of linens, on the Friday before the Ballymoney market. Fairs for cattle and pigs are held on June 4th, Aug. 26th, and Dec. 5th. The manorial court of Fortescue, anciently Straboy, has jurisdiction extending to debts not exceeding £5 late currency; and the manorial court of Connor is held monthly, for the recovery of debts under £2 late currency. Two courts-leet are held in the year, and petty-sessions every third Friday. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £310. The church is an ancient edifice; the walls have within the last few years been raised, and covered with a new roof. The glebe-house was built in 1814, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1500 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 136 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is the head of a district, comprising also Portlone, and containing two chapels, one about half a mile from the village, and the other at Aughnahoy. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly at Ahoghill, and a Moravian meeting-house at Gracehill. John Guy, in 1813, bequeathed £12 per annum to the Moravian establishment, which sum is now, by the death of his adopted heir, augmented to £45. There are some remains of Rory Oge Mac Quillan's castle of Straboy, and some artificial caves at Cardonagh; also numerous raths in the parish.

ALISH.—See RATHRYNAN.

ALLAGH, an island, in the parish of TOLLAGHOBIGLEY, union of DUNFANAGHY, barony of KILMACRENNAN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER. It is situated at the entrance of Gweedore bay, on the north-west coast, and comprises four statute acres.

ALLEN, Isle of.—See RATHERNON.

ALLIHIES, a village, in the parish of KILNAMANAGH, union of BANTRY, barony of BERKE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 196 inhabitants. It is situated near Conlough bay, within the peninsula that separates Bere haven and Bantry bay; and is chiefly occupied by the miners employed in the Allihies copper-mines, which are extensive, and have been constantly worked since 1813. The annual produce is from 6000 to 7000 tons, valued at £9 per ton; they are worked by steam and water, and employ from 1200 to 1500 persons: the ore is conveyed in hookers for shipment to Swansea.

ALL SAINTS, a parish, in the union of LONDONDERRY, barony of RAPOHE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (W.) from Londonderry; on Lough Swilly, and on the road from Londonderry to Letterkenny; containing 4280 inhabitants. It consists of several townlands, formerly in the parish of Taughboyne, from which they were separated, and formed into a distinct parish, comprising 9673½ statute acres, of which 102 are covered with water. The land is generally good, and in a profitable state of cultivation; the system of agriculture is improving; the bog affords a valuable supply of fuel, and there are some quarries of stone for building. Castle Forward is the property of the Earl of Wicklow. Petty-sessions are held on the first Friday in every month. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Incumbent of Taughboyne; the income is £105, arising from £70 paid by the patron, £23 from Boulter's fund, and 10 acres of glebe land. The glebe-house was built in 1825, by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits. The church, a neat small edifice, built prior to 1734, was formerly a chapel of ease to the church of Taughboyne. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, called the union of Lagan, and comprising also the parishes of Taughboyne, Killea, and Raymochy; there are three chapels, situated respectively at Newtown-Conyngham in All Saints, Drumoghill in Raymochy, and St. Johnston in Taughboyne. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians. The interest of £200, bequeathed by a respectable farmer named McCrab is annually divided among the poor, in clothes.

ALL SAINTS, an island, in the parish of CASHEL, union of LONGFORD, barony of RATHCLINE, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER. This island, which is situated in Lough Ree, comprises 291 statute acres, divided into several farms, and contains eight houses.—See CASHEL.

ALMORITIA, BALLYMORIN, or MORANSTOWN, a parish, in the union of MULLINGAR, barony of RATHCONRATH, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (N. E.) from Ballymore, on a line of road from Mullingar to Athlone; containing 700 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2204½ statute acres, and is principally under an improving system of tillage: there is but an inconsiderable portion of bog; limestone of very good quality abounds, and is quarried chiefly for building. The Royal Canal passes within four miles of the parish, affording great advantages to this district, which is wholly agricultural. Of the principal seats, Glencara is surrounded with flourishing plantations. On a stream which runs from Loughen, or, as it is sometimes called, Mount Dalton, lake, through the parish, into the river Inney, is a large flour-mill. The living is a rectory in the diocese of Meath, to which that of Piercetown was united episcopally in 1791, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £52. 10., and of the entire benefice £123. 15. The church was rebuilt in 1815, for which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £600. The glebe-house was built in 1821, the Board having granted a loan of £600 and a gift of £200. The glebe of Almoritia comprises 28 acres, and there is a glebe of 12 acres at Piercetown. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Rathconrath, also called Miltown.

ALTEDESERT, a district parish, in the union of COOKSTOWN, barony of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles from the parish church of Pomeroy. This district was formed, in 1841, of portions of the parishes of Pomeroy and Desertcreat. It comprises about 8000 statute acres, mostly mountain and moor, but a large quantity of land is in cultivation, producing excellent oats, and there is some pasture; the surface is throughout hilly, the scenery bold and wild, and the soil light and gravelly. Pyrites, slate, and copper are found in the district, but are not wrought, though an attempt was made some time since to work the copper-ore. There are four mills, of which two are used for grinding corn, one for milling cloth, and one for dressing linen-cloth. Two small mountain streams run on each side of the village; and within a mile is a mansion, occupying the summit of a commanding hill, which, with its extensive plantations and lakes, forms a pleasing object. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Incumbents of Desertcreat and Pomeroy, alternately. The church is a small structure, erected in 1841, at an expense of £500, collected in small sums by the minister, the Rev. John Wade, aided by handsome donations from the Lord Primate and Robert William Lowry, Esq.: it will accommodate 160 persons. The Presbyterians have a place of worship; and a parochial and an infant school have been established, the latter supported by the Lowry family. About half a mile from the village are the ruins of an old bawn or fortress; and in the mountains is another fortress, in a decayed state, erected in the early days of British rule, and still called the Barracks. This latter, and a small portion of ground, were, some years since, claimed by the Ordnance authorities, for the sovereign; but on the shew of resistance by the present proprietor, the claim was given up.

AMBROSETOWN, a parish, in the union of WEXFORD, barony of BARGY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (S. by W.) from Taghmon; containing 690 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2197 statute acres; it is partly under tillage and partly in pasture, and contains an entirely exhausted bog, a portion of which has been reclaimed and is now under cultivation, while the remainder is grazed. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and forms part of the union of Duncormuck; the tithe rent-charge is £103. 17. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ambrosetown is partly within the district of Rathangan, or Duncormuck, but chiefly in that of Carrig.

ANACLOAN, or ANNAGHLONE, a parish, in the union of BANBRIDGE, barony of UPPER IVEAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Banbridge, on the river Bann, and on the road from Banbridge to Castlewellsan; containing 3423 inhabitants. It comprises 6544½ statute acres: the lands are fertile and in a high state of cultivation; there is no waste, and only about 200 acres of bog, which is daily becoming more scarce and valuable. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £141. 3. The church is a neat small edifice in good repair. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £200 and a loan of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1818; the glebe comprises 123 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also that of Drumballyrone, and containing a chapel in each parish. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. Near the church is Tanvally fort, one of the largest and most perfect in this part of the country, and within sight of which are many others of smaller dimensions.

ANADORN, a village, in the parish of LOUGHIN Island, union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of KINELARTY, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N.) from Clough. This place, with an extensive surrounding district, formerly belonged to the ancient and powerful family of the McCartans, who had a castle here, situated on an eminence, or mound, now called Castle-hill; but McCartan having joined in the rebellion of the Earl of Tyrone, his estates became forfeited to the crown. The village is on the road from Ballinabinch and Hillsborough to Downpatrick: it appears to have been much neglected, but has been of late purchased by Col. Forde, who has commenced a series of improvements. Fairs are held on May 14th and Nov. 8th.—See LOUGHIN ISLAND.

ANAHILT, or ANNAHILT, a parish, in the union of LISBURN, partly in the barony of KINELARTY, but chiefly in that of LOWER IVEAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (S. E.) from Hillsborough; containing 3551 inhabitants. This parish is intersected by numerous roads, the principal of which are those leading respectively from Hillsborough and Dromore, and from Lisburn, to Downpatrick, and from Belfast and Lisburn to Rathfriland. It comprises 6777½ statute acres, of which 6069 are in Lower Iveagh, and 708½ in Kinelarty; and is principally arable and pasture land, but mostly under tillage. The lands are in a state of excellent cultivation: under-draining is well understood and extensively practised. In the townland of Cluntogh is a fine slate-quarry. The inhabitants combine with agricultural pursuits the weaving of linen and cotton for the manufacturers of the neighbouring towns, and the women and girls are employed in spinning. Anahilt has a sub-post office connected with Hillsborough. Among the principal seats is Larchfield, a handsome mansion and extensive demesne. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dromore, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £275. 9. The church was built in 1741, at the sole expense of the Rev. T. Smith, then rector of the parish; the tower was added by the Marquess of Downshire, in 1768. The glebe-house, standing in a large lawn well planted, and commanding a good view of Ballinabinch and the surrounding country, was built, in 1793, by the Rev. J. Doubourdieu, then rector, at an expense of £845. 16.; it is a handsome building, on which a considerable sum has been lately expended by the Rev. Edward Kent, the incumbent: the glebe comprises 100 statute acres, contiguous to the church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Magheradroll, also called Dunmore. There is a place of worship near Hillsborough for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly; also one at Lough-Aghery. A free school of about 150 boys and 100 girls was founded in 1796, by Thos. Jamieson, Esq., who bequeathed £1000 for its support; it is further endowed with four acres of land given by the Marquess of Downshire, who also contributed towards defraying the expense of building the school-houses. Robert Sharland, Esq., a native of Barnstaple, Devon, who died on the 6th of May, 1833, bequeathed from £2000 to £3000 in trust to the clergy of the parish and the proprietor of one or two townlands, for the erection of ten almshouses for ten aged men and ten aged women, and a house for the housekeeper, to each of whom he assigned £5 per annum: the buildings were commenced in the spring of 1835. The burial-ground about the church occupies the site of an ancient fort, the innermost of four inclosures, the whole extending over about nine acres, and sloping to the east in a regular glacis. There are also numerous forts on the Hill, all within view of each other; and several relics of antiquity have been discovered here.

ANBALLY, a village, in the parish of KILMOYLAN, union of TUAM, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 7 miles (S.) from Tuam, on the road to Galway; containing 229 inhabitants. Here are the ruins of an ancient castle in excellent preservation, which, during winter, are completely surrounded by water from the turlough in the immediate vicinity.

ANDREWS', ST., a parish, in the union of NEW-TOWN-ARDES, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the village of Ballyhalbert, 2656 inhabitants. This parish, together with Ballywater and Innishargy, which are now ecclesiastically united to it, formed part of the possessions of a Benedictine monastery founded as a cell to the abbey of St. Mary, at Lonley, in Normandy, by John de Courcey, who died in 1210; and which, though designated, in the charter of foundation, the abbey of St. Andrew de Stokes, is more generally known by the appellation of the Black Abbey. It was seized by the king as an alien priory in 1395, and was granted to the Archbishop of Armagh, who annexed it to his see; after the dissolution it fell into the hands of the O'Neils. On the rebellion of O'Neil it escheated to the crown, and was bestowed upon Sir James Hamilton, who assigned it to Sir Hugh Montgomery, Lord of the Ardes; in 1639 it was finally awarded to the Archbishop of Armagh. The parish comprises 4012 statute acres. The land is fertile, and for the most part in a high state of cultivation; but the fences are in bad condition, and in many places the system of draining is very inefficient. A large quantity of bog has been reclaimed, which is now under cultivation and produces good crops. There are several gentlemen's seats, the principal of which are, Spring Vale, Echlinville, Glastry, and the Roddens, all handsome and spacious mansions ornamented with thriving plantations. Off the coast, on the east, are two islets, called respectively Green Island and Bur or Burrial, the former connected with the shore by a strand which is dry at low water, and the latter remarkable as being the most eastern point of land in Ireland. There are some yawls and fishing-smacks belonging to these islands; and about a mile to the north of Green Island is John's port, a small harbour for fishing-boats, sheltered by a rock called the Plough. On this coast is also a creek named Cloughy Bay, having a bottom of clean sand; it has several fishing-boats and wharves, and a coast-guard station has been established there, which is one of the twelve forming the district of Donaghadee.

At the commencement of the last century, the churches of Ballyhalbert, Ballywalter, and Innishargy, were in ruins; and, in the 2nd of Anne, an act was obtained for uniting the parishes, and erecting a church in the centre of the union. The living is denominated the vicarage of St. Andrew's, or the union of Ballywalter, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Lord Primate: the tithe rent-charge is £900, of which £600 are payable to the primate as rector, and £300 to the vicar. The church, in Innishargy, is a spacious structure, erected in the year 1704. The glebe-house, a handsome residence close to the town of Kirkcubbin, and about 2½ miles from the church, was built in 1780, at a cost of £800, and has been greatly improved by the Rev. F. Lascelles, the incumbent, at an expense of nearly £400: the glebe comprises 31 acres, valued at £77. 10. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions this union forms part of the district of Upper Ardes, also called Portaferry. There are, a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly at Glaslary, one at Ballyhamlin in connexion with the Remonstrant Synod, and one for Independents. The sum of £50 per annum, payable out of the estate of Ballyatwood, was bequeathed by the Countess of Clanbrassil for clothing the poor on that estate. At Cloughy are the extensive ruins of a commandery of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, founded in 1189, by Hugh de Lacie, and called Castlehuoy; not far from which are the ruins of Slane church. Kirkstown castle, a heavy pile of building, erected in the reign of James I., is in tolerable repair, and the tower in excellent preservation.

ANEY, or KNOCKANEY, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of SMALL COUNTRY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (E.) from Bruff; containing 4939 inhabitants, of which 407 are in the village. This place, which is situated on the river Commogue, and bounded on the north by Lough Gur, appears to have been distinguished at a very early period of Irish history. Its parish church and a monastery, or college, are said, by ecclesiastical writers, to have been founded about the time of St. Patrick; but the earliest authentic notice of the place occurs in 941, when a convent for nuns of the order of St. Augustine was founded, but by whom is not recorded. This establishment, which was situated on Lough Gur, and called Monasteri-Canilligh Juxta Aney, was destroyed in the Danish irruption; but was refounded, in 1283, by a branch of the Fitzgibbon family, and appears to have subsisted till the dissolution: some small fragments of the building are remaining. In 1226, a preceptory was founded here, which subsequently became the property of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem; and, in 1349, a friary for Eremites of the order of St. Augustine was instituted by John Fitzgerald, or, as he was sometimes called, Fitz-Robert: this, after the dissolution, was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Edward, John, and Mary Absley. Aney was equally celebrated for its numerous stately CASTLES. The most important was a spacious and very strong fortress, erected in 1248 by John Fitzgerald, sometimes called John of Callan, on the western bank of the river Commogue, and in which the founder died in 1296: only some very inconsiderable fragments remain. In the fourteenth century the same powerful family erected two strong castles on the shores of Lough

Gur, called respectively Doon and the Black castle, to defend the two entrances to Knockadoon, a lofty eminence nearly surrounded by the lake, and by most writers considered as an island. The present castle of Doon, supposed to have been erected on the site of the original by Sir George Boucher, in the reign of James I., is very perfect; but the Black castle is a heap of ruins. A smaller castle was built in the village, soon after the erection of those on Lough Gur, probably by the family of O'Grady, who also built a very extensive castle at Kilballyowen: the former is, with the exception of the roof, in a perfect state; and the latter has been incorporated with the modern dwelling-house, and contains four rooms in excellent order.

Though the neighbourhood is fertile, and the inhabitants in general opulent, yet the village, which is the property of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, and of the Earls of Alborough and Kenmare, is in a state of neglect and ruin. The parish comprises 9248 statute acres: the land is remarkably productive, particularly round Kilballyowen; about one-fifth is under tillage, more than three-fifths are meadow and pasture, and there is a small tract of very valuable bog. The great fertility of the soil seems to have obviated the necessity of paying much attention to the improvement of agriculture, which throughout the district is generally disregarded. The surface is adorned with plantations: the principal seat is Kilballyowen, the residence of De Courcy O'Grady, who retains the ancient title of The O'Grady of Kilballyowen; it is a handsome modern building in a richly planted demesne. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, with the vicarages of Ballynard, Ballynamona, Long or Knocklong, Kilfrush, Ballinlough, and Hospital, constituting the union of Aney, in the patronage of the Crown on account of the legal incapacity of the Earl of Kenmare; the rectory is inappropriate in E. Deane Freeman, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of Aney is £645, of which £430 are payable to the improprator, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire vicarial tithes of the benefice amount to £561. 0. 3. The church is a neat edifice, with a handsome octagonal spire of hewn stone, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £183 for its repair. The glebe-house, nearly adjoining the church, but not habitable for a family, is built on a glebe of 4½ acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the chapel in the village of Aney has been rebuilt, and was consecrated on the 9th of October, 1836; there is another at St. Patrick's Well. Lough Gur, the only lake of importance in the county, is about four miles in circumference, and bounds the parish for nearly three miles; it has two beautiful small islands, and is of very picturesque and romantic character. On one of the islands are the remains of ancient fortifications; and midway between Knockadoon and Knockfennel is the other, about three quarters of an acre in extent, which was strongly fortified, and where some walls are still nearly in a perfect state. Not far from the Black castle are the interesting ruins of the New Church, so called from its being founded by the Countess of Bath, when resident at Doon Castle. It was also endowed by her with £20 per annum for the support of a chaplain; but the property having descended to the Count de Salis, and the church not being registered in the diocesan records, that nobleman discontinued the appointment of a chaplain, and the church has fallen into ruins. The plate presented to this church by the Countess of Bath is now used in the parish church of Aney. At St. Patrick's Well are some remains of a church, with an extensive burial-ground; and near Elton are some fragments of another, in a churchyard. Not far distant are the picturesque ruins of Baggotstown Castle, built by one of the Baggot family in the reign of Charles I., and forming, with its lofty gables and chimneys, a singular object when viewed from a distance. On the hill of Knockadoon, just over the lake, are some rude traces of an ancient fortress.

ANHID, or ATHNETT, a parish, in the union of RATHKEALE, barony of COSMA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Croom; containing 493 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the western bank of the river Maigue, and on the road from Charleville to Limerick, by way of Croom, comprises 981 statute acres. The land is very fertile; about one-half of it is under tillage, and the remainder is good meadow and pasture. A new line of road has been made from Croom to Charleville, which is intersected by the direct mail-coach road from Cork to Limerick. Athnett is a prebend in the cathedral of St. Mary, Limerick, which has, from time immemorial, been annexed to the bishopric, and gives to the bishop a seat in the chapter: the tithe rent-charge is £29. There is neither church nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions Anhid forms part of the district of Croom.

ANNADUFF, or ANNAGHUFF, a parish, in the union of MOBIL, partly in the barony of MOBIL, and partly in that of LEITRIM, county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the post-town of Drumsna, 6162 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Dublin to Sligo, and on the river Shannon, which here forms the beautiful and picturesque loughs of Bodarig and Boffin. An abbey was founded in 766; but there are no further accounts of it, and the only vestiges are a few curious stones worked into the window in the south gable of the ancient parish church, the ruins of which are in the present churchyard. In the reign of James II. a skirmish took place here between the partisans of that monarch and the troops of William III., at a ford over the Shannon, near Derry-carne; and the spot is still called James's Heap. The parish comprises 10,970½ statute acres; it is principally under an improving system of tillage. There is a tract of bog, affording a good supply of fuel; limestone of inferior quality is quarried, and freestone is found in the vicinity of Drumod. Iron-ore also exists in various parts, particularly near Drumod. The principal seats are, Mount-Campbell, the handsome residence of the late Admiral Sir Josias Rowley, Bart.; Derry-carne, surrounded by a well-planted demesne, and picturesquely situated between the two loughs; and a residence near Drumsna, commanding extensive views of the Shannon and adjacent country. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £196. 19. The church is a neat edifice in the later English style, with a square tower crowned with minarets; it was built in 1820, by aid of a loan from the Board of First Fruits of £800. There is a chapel of ease at Drumsna, erected at the expense of Francis Nisbett, Esq. The glebe-house is a good residence, and the glebe comprises 318 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is at Aughamore, and divine service is also performed in a school-house.—See DRUMOD and DRUMENA.

ANNAGASSON, a village, in the parish of DRUMCAR, union and barony of ARDES, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 8 miles (S.) from Dundalk; containing 193 inhabitants. This place is situated on a pleasant beach forming part of Dundalk bay; it comprises 43 houses, which are neatly built, and has some extensive mills. The river Drumcar abounds with salmon and trout, and is here crossed by a substantial bridge. There is a beautiful drive along the sea-side to Dundalk, and to Clogher Head, where regattas are annually held; and the view of the bay and the sea, with steam-boats and other craft daily passing and repassing, give an air of cheerfulness to the place. The principal import is coal for the supply of the neighbourhood. Fairs are held on March 17th, May 7th, July 22nd, and Nov. 8th.—See DRUMCAR.

ANNAGELIFFE, a parish, in the union of CAVAN, barony of UPPER LOUGHTEE, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 1 mile (N.E. by E.) from Cavan, on the road from that place to Virginia; containing 3808 inhabitants. It comprises 8260½ statute acres. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, forming part of the union of Urney; the rectory is partly appropriate to the deanery, and partly inappropriate in Mr. Walsh and Mr. Everard. The tithe rent-charge is £163. 7. 9., of which £116. 16. are payable to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Urney, or, as it is more commonly called, Cavan; the chapel is a large building, situated at Stragolla.

ANNAGH, or BELTUBRET, a parish, in the unions of CAVAN and COOTEHILL, partly in the barony of LOWER LOUGHTEE, but chiefly in that of TULLAGHGARVEY, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, on the road from Ballyconnell to Cavan; containing, with the greater part of the market and post town of Belturbet, 13,071 inhabitants. It comprises 19,145½ statute acres, of which 12,340 are in Tullaghgarvey; about 16,000 are arable and pasture, 2000 bog and waste, 300 woodland, and 200 common. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of Lord Farnham: the tithe rent-charge is £288. 3. 5. The church is a handsome edifice, for the repairs and enlargement of which the Board of First Fruits granted £2600, in 1812 and 1814; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners more recently granted £112 for its further repair. The glebe-house was purchased by aid of a loan of £844, in 1810, from the same Board; the glebe comprises 524 acres. This parish is divided into the two Roman Catholic districts of Annagh West and Annagh East, or Killougher; the former containing a chapel at Drumalee, and the latter one at Red Hill. There are two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, one of which belongs to the Primitive class. The ruins of the old church yet exist.—See BELTUBRET.

ANNAGH, or ST. ANNA, a parish, partly in the barony of CORRAGUINY, but chiefly in that of TAUGHENACKMY, union of TRALEE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 6½ miles (W.S.W.) from Tralee; containing, with the village of Blennerville, 3659 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the bay of Tralee, and on the high road from Tralee to Dingle, extends for some miles between a chain of mountains and the sea, and comprises 13,735 statute acres, about 11,000 of which consist of rough mountain pasture, and the remainder of arable land. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ardferit and Aghadoe, and forms part of the union of Ballynahaglish: the tithe rent-charge is £249. 4. 7. The church, situated in Blennerville, is a neat structure with a square tower; it was built in 1818, by a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. About half a mile distant from it are the ruins of the old church, with the burial-ground, in which is a stone bearing a rude effigy of an armed horseman. In the Roman Catholic divisions Annagh is included in the unions of Tralee and Ballymacelligott; the chapel is at Curragheen, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the west of Blennerville. At Curragheen is a school under the Trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity.—See BLENNERVILLE.

ANNAGH, a parish, in the unions of SWINFORD and CASTLEREA, barony of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, on the road from Castlebar to Frenchpark; containing, with the post-village of Ballyhaunis, 7904 inhabitants. This place was chiefly distinguished for a cell of, it is generally supposed, Franciscan friars, though by some writers the cell is said to have been founded by Walter de Burgh for brethren of the order of St. Augustine, under the abbey of Cong, and to have been the burial-place of Walter, Lord Mac William Oughter, who was interred here in 1440. The parish comprises 20,315 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres; it is principally under tillage, and there is a sufficient quantity of bog. Annagh is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and forms part of the union of Kiltullagh: the tithe rent-charge is £146. 5. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are chapels at Ballyhaunis and Tulraha, and the old monastery at the former place is still occupied by friars of the order of St. Augustine.

ANNAGH, an island, in the parish of KILCOMMON, union of WESTPORT, barony of ERRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 23 miles (S. by E.) from Belmullet. This island is situated in the bay of Tullaghane, on the western coast, and near the entrance of the sound of Achill; it is separated from the main land of Ballycroby by a narrow sound to which it gives name, and comprises 627 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The greater portion of the land is mountainous, but affords very good pasture; and there is a salmon and herring fishery.

ANNAGH ISLANDS, in the parish of KILGERREY, union of WESTPORT, barony of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 10 miles (W. S. W.) from Westport. They are situated in the bay of Westport; Annagh East comprising 45 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres; Annagh Middle, 11 $\frac{1}{2}$; and Annagh West, 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres.

ANNAGHDOWN, or ENAGHDUNE, a parish, in the union of GALWAY, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Galway, on the road to Headford; containing 7108 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the west by Lough Corrib, and comprises 23,729 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. It was formerly the seat of an independent bishopric, of which some notice will be found in the account of the see of Tuam, with which it has for centuries been incorporated.

St. Brendan of Clonfert built a nunnery here under the invocation of the Blessed Virgin, for his sister Briga, which, in 1195, was confirmed by Pope Celestine III., together with the town of Kelgel, to nuns of the Arroasian order: at the suppression it was granted to the Earl of Clanricarde. An abbey, dedicated to St. Mary, and called the Abbey of St. Mary de portu patrum, was founded at an early period for White Præmonstratensian canons; and here was also a Franciscan friary, the head of a custody, to which the monasteries of Connaught and Ulster were subordinate. There was another religious house, called the College of St. Brendan, in which four priests or vicars were supported; and at Kilconagh, in the vicinity, was an abbey which Tipraid, Prince of Hy Fiacria, granted to St. Colomb, who placed over it St. Cuannan, from whom it derived its name. Within the parish are a few seats. There is a constabulary police station; and near Cregg Castle is a large flour-mill. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, to which those of Killascoe and Laccagh are episcopally united, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in John Kirwan, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of Annaghdown is £415. 7. 9., of which one-fourth is payable to the proprietor, and the remainder to the incumbent; the entire union produces a vicarial rent-charge of £506. 12. The church is a small neat building, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £500, in 1798. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £350 and a loan of £450, in 1818, from the same Board; the glebe of Annaghdown comprises 20 acres, and there is a glebe in Killascoe of 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres, valued at £6 per annum. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is at Corondola, and divine service is also regularly performed in a school-house at Woodpark.

ANNAGHGOWLA, an island, in the parish of KILLADOG, union of DOYLE, barony of TYRAGHRILL, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It is situated in Lough Arrow, and comprises 34 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres.

ANNAGHILONE.—See ANACLOAN.

ANNAHILT.—See ANAHILT.

ANNAMOE, a village, in the parish of DERRALLOSSORY, union of RATHRUM, barony of BALLINACOR, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Newtown-Mount-Kennedy. This small village is situated in a sequestered spot, where a valley opens on the east into the beautiful and romantic vale through which the river Annamoe flows in its descent from Lough Dan. The scenery is richly diversified, and in the vicinity are several gentlemen's seats, among which is Castle-Kevin, occupying a lofty eminence planted with firs and other forest-trees, and commanding an extensive and delightful prospect. About half a mile to the north-west of the village is Glendalough House, situated in a demesne tastefully laid out; near it is the glebe-house of Derrallossory; and in the neighbourhood is Lara House, from which is a most extensive mountain view. A receiving-house is in connexion with the post-office of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy; and here is a small neat Roman Catholic chapel belonging to the district of Glendalough. At a short distance up the valley at the head of which the village is situated, is the site of Castle-Kevin, supposed to have been originally built by the O'Tooles; it is a spacious quadrangular area encompassed by a deep ditch and rampart, which, with some of the foundations, are all that remain of that ancient fortress. Lawrence Sterne, when a child, was on a visit with his father at the parsonage-house for about six months, during which period occurred the circumstance which he relates of his falling through a mill-race, while the mill was at work, and being taken up unhurt.—See DERRALOSSORY.

ANNAMULT, otherwise AGHNAMOLT, a parish, in the barony of SHILLELOGHER, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (S.) from Kilkenny. It is situated on the river Nore, which here receives the King's river, and on the high road from Stoneyford to Kilkenny by Bennett's Bridge; there are 1664 statute acres. An extensive Merino factory for superfine cloth, with a farm attached, was established here about 30 years since, at an expense, including the machinery, of nearly £30,000; and a sum of £10,000 was subsequently expended on additional buildings and machinery. This excellent establishment, in which about 800 persons were employed and every process of the manufacture carried on, was conducted on a plan which afforded to the children of the neighbouring peasantry the means of acquiring not only a knowledge of the trade, but also an useful elementary education; but from unavoidable losses, and want of sufficient encouragement, the undertaking was abandoned by its projectors, in 1822; and the works were subsequently taken by a firm in Dublin and Leeds, which, in 1826, being unable to obtain a satisfactory lease, discontinued them; they are now unoccupied. Except about 25 acres of woodland attached to Annamult, a bandsome residence, and to another house, the lands are all arable and pasture. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, and forms part of the union of Kells. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is united to Dunsfort.

ANNASCALL, or OUNECALL, a hamlet, in the parish of BALLINACOURTY, union of TRALEE, barony of CORKAGUIN, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 9 miles (E. by N.) from Dingle; containing 122 inhabitants. This place is situated in a pleasant valley on the mail-coach road from Tralee to Dingle. It is a constabulary police station; and petty-sessions are held, generally on alternate Mondays. There is a receiving-house for letters from and to Tralee and Dingle, and five fairs are held during the year. The parish church, a small plain edifice with a square tower, is situated here; and a Roman Catholic chapel has been erected. In the vicinity is a beautiful lake, called Lough Scall, or "bright lake," about a mile in circumference; and in a glen among the mountains in its neighbourhood, bordering on Ballyduff, it is said the last wolf in Ireland was killed: the particular spot is called the "Wolf Steep."—See BALLINACOURTY.

ANNESBOROUGH.—See DROMARAGH.

ANNESTOWN, a village, in the parish of DUNHILL, union of WATERFORD, barony of MIDDLETHIRN, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S. W.) from Tramore; containing 149 inhabitants. This place is situated on the south coast, and on the western side of a pleasant valley which extends for a considerable distance inland. The village possesses some natural advantages as a place of resort during summer; and a few lodging-houses have been raised for the accommodation of visitors. Its situation and appearance are highly picturesque; the vicinity presents an extensive line of coast, consisting of stupendous rocks rising abruptly from the sea. On the east the view is bounded by the isles of Icanne; and on the opposite side Minard head, which is twenty miles beyond Helvie head, or the entrance to the harbour of Dunganarvan, is seen stretching far to the south-west. A lead-mine here, belonging to the Mining Company, employs a number of hands; the ore is shipped at Waterford. The parish church, a neat edifice, is situated in the village.—See DUNHILL.

ANTRIM (County of), a maritime county in the province of ULSTER, bounded on the north by the Northern Ocean, or Deucalionian Sea; on the north-east and east, by the North Channel; on the south-east, by the lough or bay of Belfast and the river Lagan, separating it from the county of Down, which likewise borders it on the south; on the south-west, by Lough Neagh; on the west, by Lough Beg and the river Bann, which separate it from the county of Londonderry; and on the north-west, by the liberties of Coleraine. It extends from 54° 26' to 55° 12' 16" (N. Lat.), and from 5° 47' to 6° 52' (W. Lon.); and comprises 745,177 statute acres, of which 503,288 are arable land, 176,335 uncultivated, 10,358 plantation, 1908 occupied by towns and villages, and the remainder waste. The population, exclusively of Belfast and Carrickfergus, is 276,188.

In the ancient division of the island, the southern and south-western parts of this county were included in the territory called Dalaradia, or Ulidia; the western and north-western were designated Dalrieda, and the name of the whole was Endruim or Andruim, signifying the "habitation upon the waters," and strikingly descriptive of its situation. It was afterwards divided into the three districts of North or Lower Clan-Hugh-Boy, Clandeboy, or Clandeboy; the Glynnes; and the Route, or Route. North or Lower Clandeboy, so called to distinguish it from South or Upper Clandeboy now included in the adjacent county of Down, extended from Carrickfergus bay and the river Lagan to Lough Neagh, and consisted of the tract now forming the baronies of Belfast, Massareene, and Antrim. The Glynnes, so called from the intersection of its surface by many rocky dells, extended from Larne northward, along the coast, to Ballycastle, being backed by the mountains on the west, and containing the present baronies of Upper and Lower Gleam, and part of that of Carey. The Route included nearly all the rest of the county to the west and north, forming the more ancient Dalrieda, and, in the reign of Elizabeth, occasionally called "Mac Sorley Boy's Country." Within the limits of Clandeboy was a minor division, named "Bryen Carrogh's Country," won from the rest by the Scots. At what precise period Antrim was erected into a county is uncertain: it was divided into baronies in 1584, by the lord-deputy, Sir John Perrot; but this arrangement was not until some time afterwards strictly observed.

The earliest inhabitants of this part of Ireland on record were a race of its ancient Celtic possessors, designated by Ptolemy Darnii or Darini; and it deserves notice that Ptolemy mentions the "regions of Dalrieda" as the ultimate settlement of the Scythian colony in Ireland. According to the Irish annalists, Murdoch Mac Erch, chief of the Hibernian Dalardians, early in the fourth century, by a series of conquests extended his dominions in the north of Antrim and the adjacent districts, while his brother Fergus succeeded in establishing a colony in North Britain. The first intruders upon these earliest settlers were probably the Danish marauders, to whose desolating descents this coast was for several ages peculiarly exposed. Subsequently the northern Scots harassed the inhabitants by numerous plundering inroads, and ultimately accomplished permanent settlements here, maintaining for a long time a constant intercourse with their roving countrymen of the Isles. A right of supremacy over the lords of this territory was claimed by the powerful family of the northern O'NIALS (now written O'Neil), who were at length deprived of the southern part of this county by the family of Savage and other English adventurers. Early in the 14th century, Edward Bruce, the Scottish chieftain, gained possession of this district by the reduction of Carrickfergus, which had long resisted the most vigorous assaults of his troops. The English, however, shortly afterwards recovered their dominion; but in 1333, William de Burgho, Earl of Ulster, being assassinated at Carrickfergus by his own servants, and his countess, with her infant daughter, seeking safety by escaping into England, the sept of O'Neil rose suddenly in arms, and, falling furiously upon the English settlers, succeeded, notwithstanding a brave and obstinate defence, in either totally extirpating them, or reducing them within very narrow bounds. The conquerors then allotted amongst themselves the extensive possessions thus recaptured from the English, and the entire district received the name of the Upper and Lower Clan-Hugh-Boy, from their leader, Hugh-Boy O'Neil. During the successful operations of Sir John Perrot, lord-deputy in the reign of Elizabeth, to reduce the province of Ulster into allegiance to the English government, he was compelled to lay siege to Dunluce Castle, on the northern coast of Antrim, which surrendered on honourable terms. This fortress having been subsequently lost through treachery, in 1585, was again given up to the English by Sorley Boy O'Donnell or Mac Donnell, the proprietor of a great extent of the surrounding country, to whom it was returned in charge.

The county is in the diocese of Connor, except part of the parish of Ballyscullion in the diocese of Derry, Lambeg in that of Down, and Aghalee in that of Downmore. For purposes of civil jurisdiction it is divided into the baronies of Upper Belfast, Lower Belfast, Upper Massareene, Lower Massareene, Upper Antrim, Lower Antrim, Upper Toome, Lower Toome, Upper Glenarm, Lower Glenarm, Upper Dunluce, Lower Dunluce, Kilconway, and Carey. It contains the borough, market, and sea-port town of Belfast; the borough and market-town of Lisburn; the ancient disfranchised borough and market towns of Antrim and Randalstown; the sea-port and market towns of Ballycastle, Larne, and Portrush; the market and post towns of Ballymena, Ballymoney, Broughshane, and Glenarm; and the post-towns or post-villages of Ballinderry, Ballyclare, Bushmills, Crumlin, Cushendall, Dervock, Glenuvy, Portglenone, and Toome. Connor, the ancient seat of the diocese, is now merely a village; the other largest villages are, Ballykennedy, Templepatrick, Whitehouse, Dunnmurry, Kells, Doagh, Massareene, and Parkgate.

Prior to the Union this county, exclusively of the county of the town of Carrickfergus, sent ten members to the Irish parliament, namely, two knights of the shire, and two representatives for each of the boroughs of Antrim, Belfast, Lisburn, and Randalstown: from that period until 1832 it returned four members to the Imperial parliament, namely, two for the county, and one each for Belfast and Lisburn; and by the act to amend the representation, passed in that year (2 William IV., c. 88), an additional member was given to Belfast. The county constituency is 6280; the election takes place at Carrickfergus. It is included in the north-east circuit; the assizes are held at Carrickfergus, and the general quarter-sessions at Belfast, Antrim, Carrickfergus, Ballymena, and Ballymoney, the assistant barrister presiding. The county court-house and gaol are situated at Carrickfergus, the house of correction at Belfast, and there are bridewells at Antrim, Ballymena, and Ballymoney. The local government is vested in a lieutenant and nineteen deputy-lieutenants, who are all justices of the peace: the entire number of magistrates is 98; besides whom there are the usual county officers, including two coroners. There are 34 constabulary police stations, having a force of 212 men, the expense of whose maintenance is defrayed equally by grand jury presentments and by government. Along the coast are 21 coast-guard stations. The district lunatic asylum is at Belfast; the county infirmary is at Lisburn; the fever hospitals, at Ballycastle, Belfast, and Lisburn; and there are two dispensaries at Belfast, and others at Crumlin, Ballymoney, Ballymena, Larne, Doagh, Randalstown, Whitehouse, Antrim, Connor, Aboghill, Loughguile, Bushmills, Ballycastle, Broughshane, and Cushendall, supported by equal grand jury presentments and private subscriptions. The amount of grand jury presentments, in 1844, was £56,301. In the military arrangements the county is included in the Belfast district: there are barracks for artillery and infantry at Belfast; and Carrickfergus Castle, in which the ordnance stores are deposited, is appropriated as a barrack for detachments from Belfast.

The most striking features of the surface of this county are its mountains, which stretch in a regular outline from the southern to the northern extremity, terminating on the shore in abrupt and almost perpendicular declivities. They attain their greatest elevation near the coast, and have a gradual descent inland; so that many of the principal streams have their source near the sea, and run directly thence towards Lough Neagh. Exclusively of the valleys embosomed amid them, these mountains are computed to occupy about one-third of the superficial area of the county. Between the range and the shore, in some places, are tracts of very fertile land, especially from Belfast to Carrickfergus, and thence to Larne, near which the mountains project in rugged grandeur so as nearly to overhang the sea. From Glenarm round to Bengore Head the succession of rocky headlands presents numerous striking and picturesque views broken by narrow valleys watered by mountain torrents, which give a diversified character to the romantic scenery by which this part of the coast is distinguished. The most remarkable ranges of cliffs are those of perpendicular basaltic columns, which extend for many miles, and form a coast of surpassing magnificence : their arrangement is most strikingly displayed in Fair Head and the Giant's Causeway, which project several hundred feet into the sea, at the northern extremity of the county.

On the western side of the mountain range the valleys expand to a considerable width, and are of great fertility : that of the Six-mile-water, stretching towards the town of Antrim, is particularly distinguished for its beauty and high state of cultivation. The valley of the Lagan merits especial notice for its beautiful undulating surface, its richness, the enlivening aspect of its bleach-greens, and the numerous excellent habitations, with their gardens and plantations, which impart an air of cheerfulness and industry to this interesting vale. The general inclination of the surface of the mountainous region becomes less rapid as it approaches the river Bann : the flattest parts of this elevated tract are composed of turf bogs, which occupy a great space, but are mostly susceptible of improvement. In the southern part of the barony of Toome, along the shore of Lough Neagh to the east of Shane's Castle, the surface consists of numerous detached swells, and presents a remarkably pleasing aspect. Thence southward, along the shore of the lough to the confines of the county, lies the most extensive level tract within its limits, and one which for fertility and cultivation is nowhere surpassed. Detached basaltic eminences, in some instances attaining a mountainous elevation, are conspicuous in several parts of the county ; of these, Slemish, to the south-east of Broughshene, and 1437 feet high, is the most remarkable : and in diverse places, but generally in the lower tracts, are scattered gravelly knolls, of which those from Antrim to Kells are particularly striking. Off the northern extremity of the county, nearly seven miles distant from the town of Ballycastle, lies the island of Rathlin, about $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length by $1\frac{1}{2}$ in breadth, the shores of which are principally composed of precipitous basaltic and limestone rocks, rearing their heads in sublime grandeur above the waves of a wild and turbulent ocean. Off this part of the coast, also, are some small islets ; and a few others lie off the eastern shore, and in Lough Neagh.

LOUGH NEAGH, which is the largest lake in the British islands, is chiefly in this county, but extends into several others : it is traditionally stated to have been formed in the year 62, by an irruption of the sea, but is obviously formed by the confluence of the Black-water, Upper Bann, and five other rivers. This lake is about 90 British miles in length from north-east to south-west, about 12 miles in extreme breadth from east to west, and 80 miles in circumference, comprising about 154 square miles : its greatest depth in the middle is 45 feet. It is 48 feet above the level of the sea at low water, and contains $98,255\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which $90,025$ are in this county, $27,355\frac{1}{2}$ in Tyrone, $15,556\frac{1}{2}$ in Armagh, 5160 in Londonderry, and 138 in Down. The only outlet is the Lower Bann, which, being obstructed by weirs and rocks, prevents the free egress of the waters, and causes the surrounding country to be injuriously inundated in winter. In some places the waters possess medicinal properties, which they are supposed to derive from the adjacent shore. They have also petrifying powers ; but these are supposed to exist in the soil, as petrifications are only found in the lake near the shore of this county, while they are also found at considerable heights and depths, and at some distance from the coast, inland. Valuable bones are made of the petrified wood ; and in the white sand on the shore, very hard and beautiful stones, known by the name of Lough Neagh pebbles, are found : they are chiefly chalcedony, generally yellow or veined with red, susceptible of a fine polish, and highly valued for seals and necklaces. Besides the fish usually caught in fresh-water lakes, Lough Neagh has char, a species of trout called the dollagbern, and the pullan or fresh-water herring. Swans, teal, widgeon, herons, bitterns, and several other kinds of birds, frequent its shores. Canals connect it with Belfast, Newry, and Coalisland ; and a steam-boat is employed in towing trading vessels across its surface, which, although sometimes violently agitated, is scarcely ever visited by tempests, from the absence of mountains from its borders. This vast expanse of water was frozen in 1739 and 1784 ; and in 1814 the ice was sufficiently thick for Col. Heyland to ride from Crumlin water foot to Ram's Island, which is the only one of any importance in the lake, and contains the remains of a round tower. Sir Arthur Chichester, in 1604, received from James I. a grant of the fisheries and of the office of Admiral of Lough Neagh, which have been held by his successors and are now vested in the Marquess of Donegal. The lake gives the title of Baron to Viscount Massareene. North of it, and connected with it by a narrow channel a mile long, over which is the handsome bridge of Toome, is Lough Beg, or "the small lake," containing $3144\frac{1}{2}$ acres, of which 1624 are in this county, and $1590\frac{1}{2}$ in Derry. This lake, which is generally 15 inches lower than Lough Neagh, contains four islands, and its banks are more diversified and pleasing than those of the larger lake.

The soils are of considerable variety. That of the plains and valleys is a strong loam upon clay, capable of being rendered very fertile, and in many parts interspersed with whinstones lying on or near the surface, and the removal of which is necessary preparatory to tillage. On the rising grounds this kind of soil assumes a different quality, the vegetable mould diminishing in quantity, and being lighter in texture and colour ; while the substratum deteriorates into a brown or yellow till. Still nearer the mountains the change becomes more apparent from the coarse and scanty produce, rocks and stones in many parts occupying nearly the entire surface, and the soil gradually acquiring a mixture of peat, and thus forming extensive moors. To the north of the Lagan, at a short distance from Belfast, commences a sandy loam which extends, with occasional interruptions, to the Maze-course, and under good management is very productive : on the shores of Lough Neagh are some tracts of a similar soil ; and small stripes of sand are found on parts of the sea-shore. Gravelly soils prevail on the irregularly disposed swells above-mentioned, which are composed of water-worn stones of different dimensions, with a loamy covering. There are several detached tracts of soils of various texture, of a superior quality, resting on a substratum of limestone ; one of the most extensive lies in the parishes of Maheragall and Soldierstown. Besides the turf, a prevailing soil upon the mountains is, a peculiar loam without either cohesion or strength, which appears to be only a rust or oxide of the softer parts of the iron-stone, and which under tillage yields exceedingly scanty crops of grain, but an abundance of straw, and tolerably good crops of potatoes: its herbage forms excellent pasture.

The main feature in the TILLAGE system of a great part of Antrim is the potato fallow, to which it owes nearly as much as Norfolk does to the turnip fallow. The principal wheat district extends along the shore of Lough Neagh and the course of the Lagan river, stretching as far north as Cairncastle, in approaching which its extent is greatly reduced by the projection of the mountainous districts. Much barley of the four-rowed or Bere species is grown on the dry and gravelly swells; but the cultivation of oats is most extensive, the straw being used as fodder for cattle, and the meal, together with potatoes, constituting the chief food of the great body of the people. The other crops of common cultivation are potatoes and flax; turnips have been grown by some agriculturists since 1774, and the quantity is yearly increasing. In some districts the grass lands are extensive and productive, although a considerable portion formerly employed as grazing pastures is now under tillage: the mountains and high lands, also, are constantly stocked with either the cattle of the proprietors, or those taken in from distant owners. Much butter is made throughout the county, and is packed in firkins containing from 60 to 80lb., and sold at Belfast, whence a large quantity is exported. Carrickfergus and Antrim have long been celebrated for cheese, some of which rivals in quality that of Cheshire.

The principal manure, besides that of the farm-yard, is lime, the produce of the county; but the quarries being situated at its extremities, it requires much labour and expense to convey it into the interior. Near the coast, shells and sea-sand are applied; and sea-sand is also used even where it contains few shells. Great improvement has of late years been made in the agricultural implements, by introducing the best Scotch and English modes of construction. The soil being particularly favourable to the growth of the white thorn, the numerous hedges planted with it greatly enrich the appearance of the lower districts: the mountain fences consist either of loose stones collected from the surface of the ground, or of drains (called shoughs) with banks of earth. The breed of cattle has been very much improved within the last few years, particularly in the more fertile districts; the most esteemed English and Scottish breeds have been introduced, and, by judicious crosses, stock of the most valuable kind is becoming general. In several parts is a Bengal breed, imported by Sir Fras. McNaghten, Bart., and from which several crosses have been tried; but they appear too tender to endure the cold of winter. Generally, little attention is paid to the improvement of the breed of sheep, though on the rich lands of Muckamore and Massarene it has been very much improved: the old native sheep are principally found in and near the barony of Carey. A very hardy and strong, though small, race of horses, partly bred in the county and partly imported from Scotland, is employed on the northern and north-eastern coast, and among the mountains; and in Rathlin island is a breed similar to these, but still smaller. In other parts of the county the horses are of a good size and of valuable kinds, but are chiefly introduced by dealers from other counties. The long-legged flat-sided bogs formerly reared have been superseded by the best English breeds: the bacon and pork of more than 100,000 are annually exported from Belfast. The number of farms of above one acre each is 94,072, on which there was in 1841 a stock of 33,901 horses and mules, 71,328 horned cattle, 18,297 sheep, 35,104 pigs, 158,566 head of poultry, and 153 asses; the whole, of the estimated value of £723,757.

There is but little natural wood in the county, the greater portion being that which surrounds Shane's Castle, and the scattered trees on the steep banks of a few rivers. Numerous, and in some instances extensive, plantations have, however, been made in various parts; and, though there are still many wide naked tracts, there are others well clothed with wood, especially adjoining Lough Neagh, in the vicinities of Moneyglass and Drumraymond, the valleys of the Six-mile-water, Kellswater, and the Braid, the whole extent from Lisburn to Carrickfergus, the neighbourhood of Bella hill and Castle Dobbs, of Larne, Glenarm, Benavener, O'Harebrook, Ballynacree, Leslie hill, and Lisanoure. Of plantations, there are 63 acres oak, 211 ash, 130 elm, 26 beech, 462 fir, 8063 mixed timber, and 1403 fruit; besides 602,826 detached trees, equivalent to 3768 acres of plantation: total, 14,126 acres. The greatest tracts of waste land are the highest portions of the mountain range; but even the irreclaimable bogs of these elevated tracts produce a coarse herbage, and many of the bogs which overpread to a considerable extent the plains between the mountains and the Bann are likewise covered with verdure. Towards the southern part of the county most of the bogs have been exhausted. Coal was formerly furnished to the northern and eastern coasts from the mines of Ballycastle, but the entire supply is now from England, Wales, and Scotland.

The GEOLOGY of Antrim presents a great variety of the most interesting features, and its mineral productions are of considerable importance. With the exception of a diversified district on the eastern coast and of the entire vale of the Lagan, nearly the whole is occupied by basaltic beds, presenting on the eastern and northern coasts abrupt declivities, which are truly magnificent. These secondary beds consist of enormous unstratified masses, the average depth of which is about 300 feet, though in the north, at Knock-laid, it is 950 feet; the base of that mountain is composed of mica-slate. The island of Rathlin is principally occupied by these basaltic beds, which are classified by Dr. Berger under the heads of tabular basalt, columnar basalt, greenstone, greystone, porphyry, bole or red ochre, wacke, amygdaloidal wacke, and wood-coal; and imbedded in them are, granular olivine augite, calcareous spar, steatite, zeolite, iron pyrites, glassy feldspar, and chalcodony. The beds of columnar basalt occur almost exclusively towards the northern extremity of the county, and form an amazing display of natural grandeur along the shore. Besides the well-known columnar strata composing the Giant's Causeway and the adjacent cliffs, similar strata are seen in divers parts of the county, particularly near Antrim and Kilroot: the pillars composing the Giant's Causeway (which is minutely described in the article on Billy), are irregular prisms standing in the closest contact, and of various forms, from three to nine sides, the hexagonal equalling in number all the rest. Slieve-mish, or Slemish, mountain is an enormous mass of greenstone, which likewise occurs in other situations. Porphyry occupies a considerable district to the south of Connor and Kells, and is met with in several other places, particularly near Cushendall. The remarkable substance called wood-coal occurs in thin strata at Portnoffer, Killymorris, Ballintoy, and elsewhere.

All the other rocks of Antrim are beneath the basaltic beds in geological position. The first is hard chalk, sometimes called white limestone, which does not average more than 200 feet in thickness, and occurs on the eastern and southern sides of the county, and on the southern coast of Rathlin island. Mulattoe, or green sandstone, next occurs, in the neighbourhood of Belfast, to the north of Carrickfergus, near Larne, at Garron Point, &c.; and under this are found lias beds, on the coast between Garron Point and Larne, and in other places. These, together with the chalk and basalt, are based upon beds of reddish and reddish-brown sandstone of various textures, which are found under the entire south-eastern border of the county, in several detached spots along the eastern coast, and in considerable tracts from Red bay to Ballycastle: the upper strata form a marl, in which are veins of gypsum. The coal district of Ballycastle comprises an extent of about two miles along the coast; the beds, which are four feet and a half in thickness, crop out above the level of the sea, dipping to the south-east about one foot in nine, and alternate with others of sandstone and slate-clay, being themselves of a slaty quality. At Murlough bay, to the south-east of Fair head, are six beds of coal, from one to two feet and a half thick, consisting of partly bituminous and partly carbonaceous or blind coal. The only rocks lying under the strata of the great coal district, besides the primitive rocks of mica-slate, &c., already mentioned, are those of "old red sandstone," between the bays of Cushendall and Cushendun. All the above-mentioned strata are occasionally intersected and dislocated by remarkable dykes of basalt or whinstone, varying from three inches to sixteen feet in width. Sometimes very minute dykes or veins of greenstone penetrate these enormous beds of basalt, and such are particularly observable near Portrush, where they are seen in the face of the cliff not more than an inch broad. Chert is also found in abundance and variety at Portrush. Fullers-earth exists in the basaltic district, in which also a rough tripoli is found at Agnew's Hill, and a vein of steatite or French chalk in the path to the Gobbins. In Belfast Lough, lying under the level of the ordinary tides, but generally left bare at the ebb, is a stratum of submarine peat and timber, in which nuts are singularly petrified on the east and west sides of the lough. Numerous organic remains are also found in the beds of chalk; large and beautiful crystals occur in the basaltic region, particularly near the Giant's Causeway, where agates, opal, and chalcodony are met with in different situations. Of all this variety of subterranean productions, the coal has been procured to the greatest extent. The collieries of Ballycastle, once flourishing, are not now worked, owing to the difficulty of getting to the dip of the old excavations, as well as from the want of a safe harbour for shipping the coal; they were twelve in number, and exported from 10,000 to 15,000 tons annually. Gypsum or alabaster is dug in different places, and the various species of stone are quarried in spots convenient for building and other purposes.

As this county is situated in the district in which the linen and cotton manufactures are most vigorously carried on, a brief historical view of the progress of these branches of industry, the most valuable in the island, may here be introduced. The LINEN MANUFACTURE, of which Belfast is the grand mart, is most extensively pursued at Lisburn and in the surrounding country. It is of remote antiquity in Ireland, but appears to have been first particularly encouraged in the north about 1637, by Lord Strafford, who induced the Scottish and English settlers, then recently established in Ulster, to cultivate flax, offering them every facility in exporting the yarn. But this rising trade was entirely destroyed by the civil war which speedily followed, and its revival for some time effectually prevented by the competition of the French and Dutch in the English market. In 1678, an act prohibiting the importation of linen from France was passed, which was soon afterwards disannulled by James II., who afforded great encouragement to the French manufacturers. The first parliament of William III., however, declared the importation of French linens highly injurious to the interests of the three kingdoms; and the progress of the woollen trade in Ireland having alarmed the English manufacturers, the king was prevailed upon to suppress it, and re-establish in lieu the manufacture of linen, which was accordingly so much encouraged as to induce many of the Hugonots to emigrate hither from France, several of whom had carried on the trade extensively in their native country. Amongst these emigrants was Mr. Crommelin, who received from government a grant of £800 per annum, as an equivalent for the interest of capital to be expended by him in establishing the manufacture at Lisburn, with a patent for its improvement, and an additional salary of £900, on condition that, with the assistance of three other persons, also remunerated from the public purse, he should instruct the Irish farmers in the cultivation of flax, which had been altogether neglected for upwards of half a century. These and similar efforts, aided by protecting legislative enactments, produced the most important results: a board of trustees of the linen and hempen manufacturers was established under an act passed in 1711. At this period the value of the exports did not exceed £6000 per annum. But in the early part of the reign of George I., a linen-hall having been erected in Dublin, and a board of management appointed, authorised by parliament annually to employ a large specific sum in the importation and gratuitous distribution of flax seed, and in awarding premiums for the extension and improvement of the trade, the annual imports, before the year 1730, had increased in value to upwards of £400,000. In twenty years more they exceeded one million sterling; and of such importance was the success of this staple manufacture deemed, that £12,000 were annually granted by parliament for its better protection. During this rapid growth, numerous abuses crept in, and the most obnoxious frauds were practised by the weavers in the length and quality of their webs; for the suppression of which, several acts were passed in vain, until the provisions of the act of the 33rd of George II. were enforced, on the southern border of this county, by Lord Hillsborough and Mr. Williamson. Their persevering activity rendering it impossible for the weavers any longer to evade the law, while the bleachers and merchants were convinced of the advantages to be derived from its observance, the sealing of brown linen by deputed responsible officers, to attest its quantity and quality, became general throughout the whole province, and continues to be practised with equal strictness at present. In 1784, the value of brown linens sold in the markets of Ulster was £1,214,500; and for several years prior and subsequent to the Union, the total exports amounted in value to upwards of £2,600,000, of which nearly one-half was the produce of the county of Antrim. Some conception of the present extent of the manufacture may be derived from the fact, that at one only of the numerous bleach-grounds about 50,000 pieces of linen are finished annually, and at many others nearly the same number.

Prior to the accession of George II., every branch of the manufacture was performed by the same parties. Machinery was first invented and applied in the operation of washing, rubbing, and beeting, at Ballydrain, in the parish of Belfast, in 1725, and, as the manufacture extended, the process of bleaching became a separate business; the bleacher became a merchant, bought the brown linens in the open market, and made this business one of the most important branches of the trade. Owing, however, to the improvements in machinery, and to the aid afforded by the application of chymical preparations, the present number of bleach-grounds is not so great as formerly, notwithstanding the vast increase in the produce of the manufacture. So late as 1761, the only acid used in bleaching was buttermilk; in 1764, Dr. James Ferguson, of Belfast, received from the Linen Board a premium of £300 for the successful application of lime, and in 1770 he introduced the use of sulphuric acid; ten years subsequently, potash was first used, and, in 1795, chloride of lime was introduced: the articles now generally used are, barilla, American ashes, chloride of lime, and vitriol. The fine material which first induced competition and the offer of a bounty was, cambrics; the attention of the Board was next directed to the production of damasks and diapers; many looms were given to the weavers in the counties of Down and Antrim; and so great a degree of perfection has the weaving of damasks attained, that the Lisburn and Ardoyne manufactures adorn the tables of most of the sovereigns of Europe. Every species of fabric, from the coarsest canvas to the finest cambric, is now manufactured here from flax which is cultivated, and prepared in all its stages, in the province of Ulster.

The cotton trade, which has become of such importance in the north of Ireland, was introduced in 1777, merely as a source of employment for the children in the poor-house at Belfast, by Mr. Robert Joy and Thomas McCabe, who, unable to secure individual co-operation, offered the machinery, which was then of the most improved description, to the managers of the charitable institution, at prime cost. But the latter refusing to embark in a speculation altogether novel in Ireland, Messrs. Joy, McCabe, and McCracken formed themselves into a company, erected buildings, introduced new machinery, and generously opened their works to the public, at a time when it was endeavoured in England to keep the nature of the improved machinery a secret. In 1779 they commenced the manufacture of calico, dimities, and Marcellis quilting; and introduced the use of the fly shuttle. This branch of the trade soon acquiring considerable celebrity, many persons were induced to embark in it; a mill for spinning twist by water was erected at Whitehouse, near Belfast, in 1784, from which period may be dated the fixed establishment of the cotton manufacture; and so rapid was thenceforward its progress that, in 1800, in Belfast and the surrounding country, within a circuit of ten miles, it furnished employment to upwards of 13,000 individuals, or, including those indirectly connected with it, to 27,000. In 1811, the number of bags of cotton-wool imported into Belfast was 14,320, and the number exported, 3007; leaving for home consumption 11,313, worth £226,260, and, when manufactured, worth about one million sterling. The number of spinners in the mills, at the same period, was estimated at 22,000; of weavers, including attendants on looms, 25,000; and, engaged in bleaching, embroidery, and making looms, reels, &c., about 5000 more. The manufacture has been since still further extended, and every description of cotton fabric is now produced.

In addition to the two above-named important branches of manufacture, there are, in this county, at Belfast some canvas and rope manufactories, and extensive paper-mills in various places. Woollen stockings are woven in several of the towns; soap and candles are made for exportation and home consumption; the manufacture of chloride of lime and vitriol, for which there is a great demand in the bleach-grounds, has long been carried on at Lisburn and Belfast; and the manufacture of leather, though not so extensive as formerly, is still considerable throughout the county. At Belfast are several large iron-foundries and glass manufactories; and at Lisburn, works for turning and fluting iron. Hence the commerce of this county is very extensive: the exports are, linens, linen-yarn, cotton goods, all kinds of grain, pork, bacon, hams, beef, butter, eggs, lard, potatoes, soap, and candles; and the imports consist of the raw materials for the cotton manufacture, also coal, and the various foreign articles of consumption required by the numerous population. There is an extensive salmon-fishery along the coast at Carrickarde, between Ballintoy and Kenbane Head; and this fish is also caught at different places along the entire coast north of Glenarm, and also in the rivers Bann and Bush: all the other rivers, except the Lagan, are likewise frequented by salmon; and all abound with eels, which are taken at weirs in the Bann. There is a great variety of other valuable fish off the coast; of testaceous fish this shore affords the lobster and the eel, and oysters of superior size and flavour are found in Carrickfergus bay; the seal is common.

The two largest rivers are the Lagan and the Bann, both of which rise in the county of Down. The Lagan forms the boundary of the counties of Antrim and Down, until it joins the wide estuary called the Bay of Belfast, or Belfast Lough; and with the aid of several cuts it has been made navigable as high as Lisburn, forming part of the navigation between Belfast and Lough Neagh. The Bann enters the county from the county of Armagh, at the Bann-foot ferry, flowing through Lough Neagh and Lough Beg; thence it runs northward, forming the boundary between Antrim and Londonderry, on to Coleraine, below which it falls into the sea. Most of the rivers strictly belonging to the county rise in the mountains on the coast, and, owing to the rapidity and shortness of their currents, are un-navigable. The Bush rises in Cairnrough mountain, in the parish of Loughguile, and running a zigzag course, for about thirteen miles, and passing by Dervock, falls into the sea at the village of Bushmills. The Main rises in the parish of Kilrannaght, and flowing southward, runs at the Main-water foot into Lough Neagh, of which it is one of the principal feeders: its tributaries are, the Ravel, the Braid, and the Glenwherry, all plentiful streams. The Six-mile-water rises in the parish of Kilwaughter, and, flowing westward, empties itself into Lough Neagh at Antrim bay. The Camlin, or Crumlin, rises in the parish of the same name, and flowing a short distance, also falls into Lough Neagh, at Sandy bay: the Glenary rises in the parish of that name, and intersecting it, empties itself in the same way as the Camlin. The rapidity of these and the smaller rivers renders their banks peculiarly advantageous sites for bleach-greens, cotton-mills, and flour and corn mills, the last of which are especially numerous. The only artificial line of navigation is the Belfast Canal, or Lagan Navigation. The Lagan Navigation Company were incorporated by an act of the 27th of George III., empowering them to levy a duty of one penny per gallon on beer, and fourpence per gallon on spirits, in the excise district of Lisburn; but these duties having been repealed, an equivalent sum was annually paid to the company by government, until the year 1835, when their right ceased. The line is navigable for vessels of fifty tons' burthen, and the entire length from Lough Neagh to the quays of Belfast is twenty-two miles; its construction was powerfully aided by the noble family of Chichester, and the expense amounted to £62,000, raised by debentures.

The roads of late years have been gradually improved, the materials that exist within the county for making and repairing them being of the best quality. An important and very difficult work, called the Antrim Coast Road, from Larne to Ballycastle, has been executed under the immediate control of the Board of Public Works. It opens an improved communication with a fine tract of country comprehended between the coast and the range of mountains from Carrickfergus to Ballycastle, and hitherto cut off from any reasonable means of intercourse, by the badness of the roads over those mountains, some of which were conducted for miles at slopes varying from one yard in six to one in twelve. Many projects had been formed, at different times, for an improved line, but had been abandoned on account of the great expense involved in the execution of them; at length a plan with a moderate estimate was sanctioned by the Commissioners of Works, and they and the grand jury granted about £18,000 for carrying it into effect. The new road proceeds from Larne close along the shore to Black Cave, where it winds round the promontory of Ballygalley Head, passing by Glenarm, Cairnrough, Garraon Head, and Waterfoot, to Cushendall, where it strikes off inland to its northern terminus at Ballycastle, taking in the few portions of the old line that were available. The greatest difficulties encountered in its formation arose from the necessity of conducting the road, in part of its line, under a considerable extent of rock some hundreds of feet in height, having its base washed by the open sea; and from its passing along portions of very steep hills of moving clay bank. The former obstacle presented itself at the bold headland of Glenarm deer-park, where about 30,000 cubic yards of rock were, by blasting with great care and judgment, hurled in immense masses down upon the shore; and the road, 21 feet in clear width, and 10 feet above the highest tides, has been floored partly on the loose and partly on the solid rock. The latter obstacle occurred more particularly at the base of the hill of Cloony, and was by far the more serious, from the slippery nature of the clay banks and their tendency to move over the road. To counteract this inconvenience the engineer, after having thrown down, so as to form a sufficient flooring, very large masses of detached rock which were found strewn over the face of the bank, proposed to construct a revetment wall, from the summit of which any gradual accumulation of the slippery bank might from time to time be removed. Very solid piers of heavy rough blocks were deeply bedded into the bank, 30 feet apart, to be connected by substantial walls having a vertical curvilinear hatter combined with an arched horizontal curve, to which the piers form the abutments. The entire distance being also concave, a powerful combination of resistance is afforded against the pressure. The old road passes over the hill at an elevation of nearly 200 feet above the sea, with slopes of one in six and upwards; while the line along the coast is nearly level. A new road has likewise been opened from Belfast to Lisburn; another from Belfast to Antrim, which is continued to Ballymoney, Ballymena, and Coleraine; and a third from Belfast to Crumlin. A line has been made from Ballymoney to Dervock, crossing a large and valuable tract of bog; and others lead respectively from Whitewell-brac to Ballyclare and Ballymena, from Belfast to Carrickfergus and Larne, from Glenavy to Moira, from Doagh to Ballymena, and from Ballymena to Cushendall. But the most important and expensive is the road from Belfast to Derry, lately opened. The line from Belfast to Carrickfergus and Larne, and that from Antrim to Coleraine (the latter being part of the Derry road), were undertaken with the sanction of the Commissioners of Public Works. The railways are noticed in the articles on the towns where the termini are placed.

THE REMAINS OF ANTIQUITY of earliest date consist of cairns or barrows, cromlechs, raths or intrenchments, and mounds differing in magnitude and form. The most remarkable of the cairns is that on Colin mountain, about three miles north of Lisburn; there is also one on Slieve True, to the west of Carrickfergus, and there are two on Colinward. Near Cairnraginney, to the northeast of the old road from Belfast to Templepatrick, is the cromlech most worthy of especial notice: it has several table stones resting on numerous upright ones; and near it is a large mound, also several fortified posts different from all others in the county. There is likewise a large cromlech at Mount Druid, near Ballintoy; at the northern extremity of Island Magee is another; and Hole Stone, to the east of the road from Antrim to Glenavy, appears to be a relic of the Druids. Of forts and intrenchments, there is every variety which exists in Ireland; and so numerous are they, that the parishes of Killead and Muckamore alone contain two hundred and thirty, defended by one or more ramparts; besides ten mounts, two of them containing caves, and of which that called Donald's Mount is a fine specimen of this kind of earthwork. Among the most remarkable of the other intrenchments in the county are, one at Donegore, one at Kilconway, one at the Clough-water; one at Dunethery, which is planted with trees; one with a square outwork at Dunmacaltair, in the parish of Culfeightrin; Dunmaul fort, near Nappan; one at Cushendall, having a castle within its defences, and probably a Danish relic; one at Drumfane on the Braid, one at Camlent-Oldchurch, and another in a bog near Ballykennedy. One near Connor has outworks exactly resembling those at Dromore, and in another near Carrickfergus have been found some curious Danish trumpets. Stone hatchets or celts of various sizes have been discovered in several places, but in the greatest numbers near Ballintoy. Arrow-heads of flint, spear-heads of brass, and numerous miscellaneous relics, have been found. There have also been discovered a Roman torques, a coin of Valentinian, fibule, and other Roman antiquities, supposed to be relics of the spoil obtained by the Irish Scots in their plunder of South Britain, in alliance with the Picts. Of the singular round towers, the original purpose of which has been a fertile source of almost innumerable conjectures, there are at present four in this county; viz., one at Antrim, one on Ram's Island in Lough Neagh, a fragment of one near the old church at Trummery, between Lisbura and Moira, and one in the churchyard of Armoney.

Archdall enumerates forty-eight religious establishments as having existed in this county, but adds, that twenty of them were in his time unknown; and now scarcely can the existence of half the entire number be established by positive evidence. There are still interesting remains of those of Bonamargy, Kella, Glenarm, Glynn near Larne, Muckamore, and White Abbey to the west of the road from Belfast to Carrickfergus; and extensive ruins of other religious edifices, in the several townlands of Dundesert, Ballykennedy, and Carmay, in the parish of Killead. Of ancient fortresses, that of Carrickfergus, which has always been the strongest and most important, is the only one in complete preservation. There are interesting ruins of Green Castle, to the west of the road between Belfast and Carrickfergus; Olderfleet Castle, situated at the extremity of the peninsula which forms one side of the harbour of Larne; Castle Chichester, near the entrance to the peninsula of Island Magee; Red Bay Castle; and the Castle of Court Martin, near Cushendall. Near the northern coast are likewise several old castles, some of which are very difficult of access, and must have been fortresses of great strength prior to the use of artillery: of these the principal are, Dunluce, remarkable for its amazing extent and romantic situation, Dunseverick, Kenbane, Doonaniny, and Castle Carey. In Rathlin Island are the remains of Bruce's Castle. Inland are also many remains of fortified residences, of which Shane's Castle, the venerable seat of the O'Nials, was destroyed by fire in 1816: Castle Upton is the only mansion of this kind at present habitable. Lisnoure, a beautiful seat on the banks of Lough Guile, is so called from an old fort in the vicinity. Near the summit of White Mountain, two miles north of Lisbura, are the extensive remains of Castle Robin; and at Portmore, near the Little Lough in Ballinderry, are similar remains. Among the mansions of the nobility and gentry, few are splendid, though many are of considerable elegance. There are numerous mineral springs: one near Ballycastle is chalybeate, another aluminous and vitriolic, and a third, on Knockhall mountain, chalybeate; at Kilroot is a nitrous water of a purgative quality; and near Carrickfergus are two salt-springs, one at Bella hill, and the other in Island Magee. There are also various natural caverns, of which the most remarkable are, those of the picturesque mountain called Cave Hill; a curious and extensive cavity at Black-Cave-head, to the north of Larne; a cave of larger dimensions under Red Bay Castle; one under Dunluce Castle; the cave at Port Coon, near the Giant's Causeway; and those of Cushendun and the white rocks, near Dunluce. Besides these, there are numerous artificial caves.

ANTRIM, a market and post town, a parish, the head of a union, and formerly a parliamentary borough, partly in the barony of UPPER ANTRIM, and partly in that of UPPER TOOME, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 13 miles (N. W. by W.) from Belfast, and 94 miles (N.) from Dublin; containing 5182 inhabitants, of whom 2393 are in the town. This place was anciently called Entruim, Entrumnia, or Entrum Neagh, signifying, according to some writers, "the habitation upon the waters," probably from its contiguity to Lough Neagh. The earliest notice of it occurs in the year 495, when Aodh, a disciple of St. Patrick, founded a monastery here, which was destroyed during the Danish incursions, and of which no further mention appears till the foundation of Woodburn Abbey, to which it became an appendage. A sanguinary battle between the native Irish and the English occurred near the town, when Sir Robert Savage, one of the earliest English settlers, is said with a small party of his forces to have killed more than 3000 of the Irish army. In the 13th of James I., the town, and sixteen townlands of the parish, together with the advowson of the living and the rectorial tithes, were granted to Sir Arthur Chichester. A naval engagement took place on Lough Neagh, in 1643, when Col. Conolly and Capt. Longford gave battle to a party of Irish marauders who at that time had possession of the fort of Charlemont, near the shore of Clanbrassil; the Irish were defeated, and their fleet brought by the victors in triumph up to the town. In 1649 the town was burnt by Gen. Monroe; and in 1688 a party of Lord Blayney's troops, being separated from the main body of the army, crossed the river Bann at Toome, and were made prisoners in a skirmish near Antrim. During the disturbances of 1798 it was the principal scene of the hostilities which took place in the county. The insurgents had planned an attack on the 7th of June by marching their forces in four columns, respectively, by the Belfast, Carrickfergus, Ballymena, and Shane's Castle roads; but their design becoming known to the military commanders of the district, troops were hastily assembled in the town, and the inhabitants were also mustered for its defence. The conflict was obstinately maintained on both sides, but at length the insurgents fled in all directions, leaving behind them about 3000 pikes and muskets; more than 900 of them were slain in the town, and many killed in the pursuit.

The town is situated on the north bank of the Six-mile-water river, about three quarters of a mile from its influx into Lough Neagh; on the great road from Belfast to Londonderry, and in one of the most fertile and beautiful valleys in the county. It occupies an area of 116 acres, exclusive of the suburb of Massareene, and consists of two principal streets, with others branching from them; many of the houses are modern, and well built of stone and roofed with slate, but several are ancient, of timber frame-work and plaister, with gable fronts, of which the upper projects over the lower story. The inhabitants are amply supplied with water from conduits in the streets. The manufacture of paper is carried on to a great extent: mills for that purpose were erected about the year 1776, but were burnt down a few years after; they were, however, rebuilt on a very extensive scale, and the first machinery used in the north of Ireland for the making of paper was introduced, and is now employed in manufacturing paper of every description. Attached to these works, and belonging to the same proprietors, are a large brewery, some flour and meal mills, malt-kilns, stores for grain, and other appendages, the whole affording employment to a great number of the poor. At Boghead, one mile distant, and on the same stream, is a paper-mill on a smaller scale: there are also several bleach-works in the parish; and the weaving of linen, calico, and hosiery, is carried on in the dwellings of many of the poor both in the town and neighbourhood. The situation of Antrim near the north-eastern portion of Lough Neagh, where a small rude pier or quay has been constructed, is favourable to the increase of its trade, from the facility of water conveyance afforded by the lake, the Belfast canal, and the Upper Bann. Several patents bestowing fairs and markets are extant, the earliest of which, granting to Sir James Hamilton a market on Thursday, is dated Feb. 14th, 1605. The market is still held on Thursday; and there is a market for grain every Tuesday, but, although the town is situated in a fine grain country, the market is very small. Fairs are held on Jan. 1st, May 12th, Aug. 1st, and Nov. 12th; those in May and August are well supplied with black-cattle and pigs. Tolls were formerly levied, but were discontinued about twenty-four years since, by direction of Viscount Ferrard. A branch of the Ulster Bank is established, and this is a chief or baronial station of the constabulary police. Charles II., in the 17th year of his reign (1666), granted the inhabitants letters-patent empowering them to send two members to the Irish parliament, which they continued to do till deprived of the privilege at the time of the Union, when the compensation grant of £15,000 for the abolition of the franchise was assigned in four equal shares to Clotworthy, Earl of Massareene, and three members of the Skelington family. The seneschal of the manor of Moylinny, within which the town is situated, is appointed by the Marquess of Donegal, and holds a court once in three weeks, under charter of the 21st of Charles II., granted to Arthur, Earl of Donegal, for determining pleas "not exceeding £20 current money in England," with power of attachment of goods: he also holds a court-leet annually. Petty-sessions are held every alternate Tuesday; and the quarter-sessions for the county are held here in April and October. The court-house is a large and handsome building nearly in the centre of the town; and under it is the bridewell.

The parish comprises, according to the Ordnance survey, 8884½ statute acres, of which nearly three-fourths are arable, one-fourth pasture land, and 900 acres under plantations; there is little waste, and no bog. The scenery is diversified with several gentlemen's seats, and derives much interest from Lough Neagh, which is partly within the limits of the parish. Closely adjoining the town is Antrim Castle, the ancient residence of the earls of Massareene; it appears to have been originally built in the reign of Charles II., by Sir John Clotworthy, and has been enlarged and partly rebuilt. It occupies an elevated situation above the precipitous banks of the Six-mile-water, commanding a fine view of the lake and of the surrounding country. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Donegal; the rectory is impropriate in Lord Ferrard. The tithe rent-charge is £448. 12., of which £239. 4. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, originally built in 1596, was destroyed by fire in 1649, and remained in ruins till 1720, when it was rebuilt; a lofty square embattled tower, surmounted by an elegant octagonal spire of freestone, was added in 1816, for which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £1500, and Lord Ferrard contributed £500. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Drumaul, also called Randalstown; the chapel is a spacious and handsome edifice. There are two meeting-houses for Presbyterians; one, in Main-street, in connexion with the General Assembly, built in 1613; and the other, in Mill-row, in connexion with the presbytery of Antrim, built in 1726. There are also two places of worship for Primitive Wesleyan Methodists, and one for the Society of Friends; and several schools. A free school on the foundation of Erasmus Smith was established in 1812, and is supported by annual grants of £30 from the trustees, and £2 from the rector: the school-house was built at an expense of £800, of which £200 were given by Lord Ferrard. On the same foundation is a school for girls, to which the trustees contribute £27. 10. per annum. A mendicity society has been established for some years; a temperance society was formed in 1829; and a branch savings' bank, in connexion with the Belfast savings' bank, was established here in Dec. 1832, in which the deposits during the first half year amounted to £1369. 9. 3. The workhouse, standing on a site of six acres purchased for £546, was completed in 1842, at an expense of £5580; it has the necessary accommodation for the board and its officers, and is constructed to contain 700 paupers.

About half a mile to the north-east of the church, and in the middle of some plantations, in a part of the valley leading to Lough Neagh, is one of the most perfect round towers in the island: it is built of unhewn stone and mortar, is perfectly cylindrical in form, and is 95 feet in height, and 49 feet in circumference at the base; the summit terminates with a cone 12 feet high. The door is on the north side, and at a height of 7 feet 9 inches from the ground. The walls are 2 feet 9 inches in thickness, and the tower contains four stories, the ascent to which appears to have been by a spiral staircase; each of the three lower stories is lighted by a square window, and the upper story by four square perforations, corresponding with the cardinal points. Immediately above the doorway is a Grecian cross, rudely sculptured in alto-relievo on a block of freestone, which appears to be part of the original building. Around the base of the tower, great quantities of human bones and some vestiges of the foundations of buildings have been discovered; the latter are supposed to indicate the site of the monastery founded by Aodh. In a garden adjoining the tower is a large detached mass of basalt, having nearly a level surface, and in which are two cavities or basins, evidently the work of art; the larger is 19 inches in length, 16 inches wide, and 9 inches deep, and during the driest seasons, is constantly filled with fine clear water. There is a very powerful chalybeate spring in the garden of Frederick Macaulay, Esq. John Abernethy, the eminent surgeon, was a native of this place. Antrim gives the title of Earl to the family of Macdonnell, the late representative of which was the Countess of Antrim and Viscountess Dunsuise, in the peerage of Ireland, who, after her elder sister, succeeded her father, Randal William, Marquess and sixth Earl of Antrim, in 1791, in the earldom and viscounty only, by virtue of a new patent which the earl, having no son, had obtained in 1785, with remainder to his daughters and their heirs male. The countess died in 1835, and was succeeded by her son, the present earl.

ARBOE, or ARBOE, a parish, in the union of COOKSTOWN, partly in the barony of LOUGHSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, but chiefly in the barony of DUNGANNOON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Stewartstown; containing 8005 inhabitants. A monastery was founded here by St. Colman, son of Aidhe, and surnamed Mucaidhe, whose relics were long preserved in it: it was destroyed in 1166, by Rory Makang Makillmory Omorna, but there are still some remains. The parish is situated on the shore of Lough Neagh, by which it is bounded on the east, and comprises 33,504 statute acres, of which 21,000 form part of the Lough, and 56 are in small islands. The greater portion is under tillage, and there are some tracts of good meadow, about 50 acres of woodland, and 1000 acres of bog. The system of agriculture is improved; the soil is fertile, and the lands generally in a high state of cultivation. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £350. 16. 6. The church, a neat small edifice, was erected in the reign of William and Mary, on a site two miles westward from the ruins of the ancient abbey. The glebe-house is a handsome building; and the glebe comprises 240 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the chapel, a spacious edifice, is situated at New Arboe; and there are two altars in the open air, where divine service is performed alternately once every Sunday. There is also a place of worship for Presbyterians. On the western shore of Lough Neagh are the ruins of the abbey, which form an interesting and picturesque feature; and the remains of an old church, the walls of which are standing. Near them is an ancient ornamented stone cross in good preservation.

ARDAGH, a parish, in the union of MIDDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (N. W.) from Youghal, on the mail-coach road from that place to Tallow; containing 2552 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the confines of the county of Waterford, and comprises 7880 statute acres. The aspect is in part mountainous, and a portion of the surface is unreclaimed, affording a plentiful supply of turf. The soil is for the most part poor and stony; but, excepting the waste, the land is wholly in tillage, though only indifferently cultivated. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £450. The church is an old plain building of small dimensions. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises five acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Killeigh; the chapel is a small thatched building, situated at Inch. On the banks of the Turra, which runs through the centre of the parish, is the ruined castle of Kilmaturra, a massive square tower in excellent preservation.

ARDAGH, a parish, in the union of NEWCASTLE, partly in the barony of GLENQUIN, but chiefly in that of SHANID, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (N. W.) from Newcastle, on the road from that place to Shauagolden; containing 2223 inhabitants, of which number 386 are in the village. This place is situated in the heart of an interesting and fertile district; the village consists of one long irregular street, containing 64 houses in a very ruinous condition. Near it are the remains of the old parish church, which was destroyed in the insurrection of 1641, and has not been rebuilt. Fairs are held on the 11th of May, Aug. 14th, and Nov. 21st, chiefly for the sale of cattle, pigs, and pedlery. The parish comprises 9030 statute acres, including a considerable tract of bog; the land is some of the best in the county, and finely planted. The system of agriculture, however, is little improved; the fertility of the soil and the abundance of the crops rendering the farmer unwilling to change his plans. On the west Ardagh is bounded by heathly and boggy mountains, which contain several strata of coal, but only the two upper strata, which are very thin, are worked; the pits are at Carrigherry. Ironstone and fire-clay of very superior quality are also abundant, but no attempt has yet been made to work them. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Limerick, and forms part of the union of St. Michael and corps of the archdeaconry, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £138. 9. 3. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ardagh is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Rathronan and part of the parish of Kilsannell; the chapel, a large but old and neglected building, is situated in the village.

ARDAGH, a parish, in the union of LONGFORD, partly in the barony of MOYDOW, but chiefly in that of ARDAGH, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Edgeworthstown; containing 4524 inhabitants, of whom 165 are in the village, which comprises 31 houses and is wholly in the latter barony. This ancient place derives its name from its elevated situation; its origin may at the latest be ascribed to the middle of the fifth century, when its church was founded. Subsequently, here was a friary of the third order of St. Francis, founded at Ballynesaggard by the family of O'Ferrall, and reformed in 1521 by the friars of the Strict Observance. The parish is situated on the nearest road from Mullingar to Longford over Ballicorney bridge, but the coach road is through Edgeworthstown, under which place is a receiving-house. It comprises 11,416½ statute acres: there is a moderate extent of bog, but no waste. The land is good, and principally under tillage, and the system of agriculture, though still very backward, has considerably improved. Fairs are held on April 5th and Aug. 26th. Petty-sessions are held every Thursday; and here is a constabulary police station.

The DIOCESE OF ARDAGH appears to have been founded either by St. Patrick or by his disciple and nephew, St. Mell, a Briton, who became bishop and abbot of Ardagh before the year 454. Of his successors until the arrival of the English, in the reign of Henry II., little with certainty is known, and nothing remarkable is recorded of any. Near the close of the fifteenth century, the bishopric was held by William O'Ferrall, who was also dynast of the surrounding territory; and Richard O'Ferrall combined the two dignities from 1541 to 1553. It was held jointly with the diocese of Kilmore by royal patent from 1603 till 1633, when it was voluntarily resigned by William Bedell, Bishop of Kilmore; and John Richardson, D.D., Archdeacon of Derry, and a native of Chester, was advanced to the see of Ardagh. This prelate, apprehensive of the insurrection which broke out towards the close of 1641, withdrew with all his substance into England in the summer of that year; and having a short time before his departure recovered some lands in his diocese from one Teigue O'Roddy, the latter applied for relief to the British house of commons, and a summons was sent to the bishop requiring his appearance on a certain day. On application, however, to the Irish house of lords, the chancellor was ordered to write to the speaker of the English house, asserting their privileges, and refusing to permit the bishop's compliance; and on a motion of the Bishop of Clonfert an order was resolved on to prevent such grievances in future. After Dr. Richardson's death, in 1653 or 1654, the see continued vacant and its revenue sequestered until the Restoration of Charles II., when the dioceses were again united; and they so continued until the deprivation of Bishop Sheridan, in 1692. Ulysses Burgh, D.D., was then promoted to Ardagh, and he dying in the same year the union was restored; but it was ultimately dissolved in 1742, on the translation of Bishop Hart to the archiepiscopal see of Tuam, with which Ardagh was till lately held in commendam, the archbishop being suffragan to the Lord-Primate for this see. Under the provisions of the Church Temporalities act (3rd of William IV.), the diocese, on the death of the last archbishop of Tuam, became permanently united to that of Kilmore and that of Elphin.

It is one of the sixteen dioceses which constitute the ecclesiastical province of Armagh, and comprehends part of the counties of Sligo, Roscommon, and Leitrim, in the civil province of Connaught; part of Cavan, in Ulster; and part of Westmeath, and nearly the whole of Longford, in Leinster. It comprises, by estimation, 233,650 acres, of which 4400 are in Sligo, 8700 in Roscommon, 71,200 in Leitrim, 10,600 in Cavan, 8900 in Westmeath, and 129,850 in Longford. A dean and an archdeacon are the only dignitaries; even these have no official duties to perform, and the latter has no emoluments. There is no chapter, but in cases of necessity a majority of the beneficed clergymen of the diocese represent that body; the parochial church of Ardagh serves as the cathedral. The diocese was divided into four rural deaneries prior to the year 1819, when the diocesan dispensed with the services of the rural deans and undertook to discharge their duties himself. In 1837 there were 38 parishes, of which 20 were rectories or united rectories and vicarages, 17 vicarages, and 1 inappropriate cure: the total number of benefices was 96, of which 8 were unions of parishes and the remainder single parishes, and of which 1 was in the gift of the crown, 22 in that of the diocesan, and 3 in lay patronage; the number of churches was 33, and of glebe-houses 22. Since the year 1837 the number of benefices has been increased to 32, and there are now six benefices in lay patronage. The see lands comprise 22,216 statute acres, of which 13,194 are profitable land, and 9022 are unprofitable: the revenue is now paid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and in 1844 was £3023. In the Roman Catholic divisions this Protestant diocese and a few parishes in Meath constitute the see, which is suffragan to Armagh; it contained, in 1837, 65 chapels, served by 42 parish priests and 42 coadjutors and curates.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and constituting the corps of the deanery, which is in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge is £361; and the mensal and other lands of the deanery, exclusively of several houses, tolls of fairs, a plot of nearly two acres on which the deanery-house is built, a farm of 13 acres, and a large bog, comprise 714 statute acres, producing, with the annual renewal fines, a rental of £250 per annum. The church is a plain commodious building with a square tower, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £900, in 1812; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £301 for its repair. The deanery-house was built in 1828, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1200 from the same Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which includes also the adjoining parish of Moydow, where is a chapel; that of Ardagh is situated near the village. The parochial school for boys is principally supported by a grant of £40 per annum from Dr. Murray, the present dean, who also contributes annually £15 towards the support of the girls' school, which is further aided by £5 from the Ardagh Diocesan Society: the school-house is a good slated building of two stories, with apartments for the master and mistress, erected by Dr. Murray at an expense of £400; and attached to it is an acre of land. Some remains of the old cathedral church, a small edifice rudely built of fragments of rock of a large size, are still visible; it was superseded by another church, now also in ruins, and the present edifice was erected near its site. St. Mell was interred here, and his festival is annually celebrated on Feb. 6th. The comedy of The Mistakes of a Night, written by Goldsmith, derives its plot from an incident that occurred at this village to the author, who, on passing through it, having inquired for the "head inn," was directed by a humorous individual to the residence of the proprietor of the place, Mr. Fetherston, who perceiving the delusion, nevertheless indulged it, and hospitably entertained his guest; so that it was not until next morning that, on finishing his breakfast and calling for the bill, the poet discovered his mistake.

ARDAGH, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Ballina; containing 2631 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shores of Lough Conn and the river Deel, and on the road from Ballina to Crossmolina; it comprises 5494 statute acres, chiefly under tillage. There are large tracts of bog, furnishing abundance of fuel. Deel Castle is delightfully situated on the river, and in a fine demesne. Fairs are held at Newtown on the 4th of Aug. and the 1st of Nov. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, with the vicarages of Ballynahaglish, Kibbelfad, Kilmoremy, Attymass, and Kilgarvan episcopally united, constituting the union of Ardagh or Kilmoremy, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is partly appropriate to the vicars choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge of Ardagh is £83.1.6., of which £10.8. are payable to the vicars choral: the glebes, which are detached, comprise together 31 acres; and the gross tithes payable to the incumbent from the union, prior to the conversion of the composition into a rent-charge, amounted to £948.19. The church of this parish is in ruins, and the church of the union is situated at Kilmoremy. An episcopal chapel has been built at Deel Castle. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the chapel, a neat slated building, is situated at Newtown.—See KILMOREMY.

ARDAGH, a parish, in the union of BALLIBOY, partly in the barony of MORRILLION, but chiefly in that of LOWER SLANE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (E.S.E.) from Kingscourt; containing 2518 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Drumconra to Kingscourt, and on the confines of the counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Cavan, comprises 3669 statute acres, of which 2835 are arable, 324 are pasture, 112 are bog, and 19 woodland. Here are extensive quarries of limestone, a large quantity of which is sent into the county of Cavan to be burnt for manure. The living is a perpetual cure, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £155.11., payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church is a plain edifice, built in 1804, by a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, and towards the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £125. There is a glebe-house, with a glebe of ten acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is united to Drumconra: the old chapel, a plain building, is situated at Ballinavoren. A new chapel has been built on the townland of Upper-Meath hill; where is also a police barrack. On the townland of Cloughra are the remains of an old castle; and at the northern extremity of the parish, but principally in the county of Monaghan, is a considerable lake, called Rahans.

ARDAMINE, a parish, in the union of GOREY, barony of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Gorey; containing 1705 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the coast of the Irish Sea, and comprises 4214½ statute acres; the soil is generally a strong marl favourable to the growth of wheat, and the system of agriculture is improving. A fishery in the bay of Ardamine promises to become very valuable when the harbour of Courtown shall be completed. The residence of Ardamine is beautifully situated at a short distance from the sea; and the grounds have been embellished with thriving plantations and other improvements. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, with that of Killenagh episcopally united, and in the patronage of H. K. G. Morgan, Esq., in whom the rectory is inappropriate. The tithe rent-charge is £142.10., payable to the improprator, who allows £23 per annum for the performance of the clerical duties of both parishes, to which sum is added a grant of £48.2. from Primate Boulter's fund. The church was built in 1899, by a loan of £646 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe consists of 25 acres, subject to a rent of £15. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district sometimes called River Chapel, comprising the parishes of Ardamine and Donaghmore, in each of which is a chapel: that in this parish, with a comfortable residence for the clergyman adjoining it, was erected by subscription. Near the demesne of Ardamine is a large high tumulus, called the "Moat of Ardamine," considered to be one of the most perfect of its kind in Ireland: it is traditionally said to mark the burial-place of a Danish chief.

ARDARA, a post-town and district parish, in the union of GLenties, barony of BANNAGH, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Killybegs, and 134½ miles (N.W.) from Dublin; the town containing 603 inhabitants. This place is situated on the river Avinnee, at the bottom of Lockrumore bay on the northern coast, and on the road from Narin to Killybegs. The town consists of 115 houses: it is a constabulary police station, and has a fair on the 1st of November; petty-sessions, also, are held at irregular intervals. The parochial district was formed by act of council in 1829, by disuniting 38 townlands from the parish of Killybegs, and 49 from that of Inniskeel. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the alternate patronage of the Rectors of Killybegs and Inniskeel. The income of the curate is £90 per annum, of which £35 are paid by each of the rectors, and £20 given from Primate Boulter's Augmentation fund. The church is situated in the village; it was built in 1833, by a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits. The Roman Catholic parochial district is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains a chapel. The Wesleyan Methodists assemble in a school-house once every alternate Sunday. On an island in the lake of Kiltorus, off Boylagh, near Mr. Hamilton's, of Eden, are the ruins of an old fortified building, near which were formerly some rusty cannon.

ARDBOE, county of TYRONE.—See ARBOE.

ARDBOLINE, an island, in the parish of AMHALLISH, barony of LOWER CARBERRY, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It lies on the north-west coast, and comprises four statute acres.

ARDBRACCAN, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of LOWER NAVAN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Navan; containing 4596 inhabitants. This place derived its name, signifying in the Irish language "the Hill of Braccan," from St. Braccan, who presided over a monastery here, and died in the year 650. The establishment subsequently became the seat of a small bishopric, which flourished under a series of prelates, many of whom are noticed as eminent ecclesiastics, till the twelfth century, when, with several other small bishoprics, it was included in the diocese of Meath. The monastery was frequently plundered and laid waste by the Danes, and repeatedly destroyed by fire, from the 9th to the 12th century: in 1166, Moriartach, King of Ireland, granted to it in perpetuity a parcel of land at an annual rent of three ounces of gold. The village, which was anciently of some importance, especially during the existence of the see, appears to have declined from the period of the English invasion, and is no longer of any note. The parish comprises 6490½ statute acres, of which about one-half is under tillage, two-fifths in pasture, and the remainder meadow land. The only remarkable elevation is Faughan Hill, the conical summit of which, being well planted, is conspicuous over the surrounding flat districts: on the western border of the parish is a chain of bogs. Limestone is quarried for building; and at a place called White Quarry is found a particular kind of limestone, of which the bishop's palace of Ardbraccan is built. Limestone, gravel, and marl are also raised for manure. The bishop's palace, one of the most elegant ecclesiastical residences in Ireland, was erected by Bishop Maxwell: it is beautifully situated, and the grounds and gardens are tastefully laid out; the demesne is embellished with forest-trees of stately growth, among which are some remarkably fine horse-chestnut trees; and there are also two very beautiful cedars of Lebanon, planted by Bishop Pococke. Outland House and demesne are also within the parish; and Dormerstown Castle is an old fortified residence. The weaving of linen-cloth is carried on to a small extent, and some cotton-loomers are employed by the inhabitants.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, united by act of council, in 1771, to the rectories of Liscarton and Ratsine, the chapelry of Churchtown, and the vicarage of Martry, and by the same authority, in 1780, to the rectory of Clonmacduff: the six parishes constitute the union of Ardbraccan, in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge of Ardbraccan is £326, and the gross amount payable to the incumbent out of the union is £614, subject to a tax of nearly six per cent. to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church is a handsome edifice, erected in 1777, under the auspices and by aid of a large donation from Bishop Maxwell. The glebe-house, situated about half a mile from the church, was built in 1786, by the then incumbent, at a cost of £1042; the glebe comprises 33 acres of profitable land. The Roman Catholic district of Ardbraccan, called also Bohermein, includes the parishes of Ardbraccan, Martry, Rathboyne, and parts of the parishes of Moyagher and Liscarton; there are two chapels in Ardbraccan and one in Rathboyne. Dr. Chetwood, formerly rector of the parish, left £500, and Dr. Sterne, Bishop of Clogher, left £30 per annum, for apprenticing the children of Protestant inhabitants of the county to Protestant masters and mistresses; about 30 children are annually apprenticed from these funds. In the churchyard is a square tower with a spire and vane, forming a pleasing object. There is also a monument to Bishop Montgomery, who died in London, on the 15th of January, 1620, and was buried here; and on the south side of it is a small tablet to the memory of that celebrated traveller, Bishop Pococke, who presided over the see of Meath, and died in 1765.

ARDCANDRIDGE, or ARDCANDRISK, a parish, in the union of WEXFORD, barony of WEST SHELMAHER, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (W. by N.) from Wexford; containing 286 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Slaney, by which it is bounded upon the north, and on the road from Wexford along the south bank of the river, by way of Clonmore, to Enniscorthy: it comprises 1226½ statute acres, and is chiefly under tillage, which has gradually improved since the introduction of the drill system of husbandry. Ardcantrisk House, the seat of the proprietor of the parish, was built in 1833, and is beautifully situated on a wooded eminence rising above the Slaney, and commanding a very fine and extensive prospect. The Slaney is navigable for lighters up to Enniscorthy, affording facility for the conveyance of corn and other agricultural produce to Wexford, and for bringing coal and other commodities from that port. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns, and the rectory is one of the several denominations constituting the union of St. Patrick's, Wexford: the tithe rent-charge is £36.14. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ardcantrisk is included in the district of Glyn, a village in the parish of Killurin.

ARDCANNY, a parish, in the union of RATHKEALE, barony of KENRY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (W. by S.) from Limerick; containing 1283 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the north by the river Shannon, and on the east by the river Maigne, the banks of which are embellished with flourishing plantations and elegant seats. It comprises 3100 statute acres. The land is remarkably good, being based on a substratum of limestone; about one-fourth is under an excellent system of tillage, and the remainder is meadow, pasture, and demesne, except about 48 acres of woodland, 10 acres of bog, and a very small portion of waste. Among the principal seats is Shannon Grove, the old family mansion of the earls of Charleville, and now the residence of the Waller family. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, forming the corps of the prebend of Ardanny in the cathedral of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £225. The church is a spacious edifice built in 1736, but in a very dilapidated condition. The glebe-house was built in 1795, at an expense of £700, of which £100 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits; and has been greatly improved by the late and present incumbent: the glebe contains 52 statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Kildeemo, or Kildimo. A male and female parochial school, for which a house was built by the rector, has been discontinued, and the building is now used as a court-house. In the demesne of Rockfield is a very capacious and ancient fortress, constructed of large blocks of stone very ingeniously put together without mortar, and forming walls of great thickness: there are also numerous earthworks in the parish.

ARDCARNE, a parish, in the barony and union of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Boyle, on the road to Carrick-on-Shannon; containing 8304 inhabitants. An abbey of Regular canons was founded here, probably in the early part of the 6th century, and according to the Annals of the Four Masters, Beaidh died bishop of it in 523: its possessions were granted, in the 39th of Elizabeth, to the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin. Here was also a Benedictine nunnery, a cell to the abbey of Kilcreunata, in the county of Galway; and at Knockvicar was a monastery of the third order of Franciscans, which at the suppression was granted with other possessions on lease to Richard Kendlemarch. The parish is situated on the shores of Lough Key; it is partly bounded by the Shannon on the east, and comprises 19,962 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. The land is principally under an improving system of tillage; there is a considerable extent of reclaimable bog, and part of the plains of Boyle is included within the parish. Limestone and freestone of the best description for architectural purposes abound; indications of coal, also, have been discovered on the lands of Ballyfermoyle, where shafts have been sunk, but the operations are discontinued. The Boyle river runs through the parish, and a project was lately in contemplation to render it navigable from its junction with the Shannon, near Carrick, to Lough Gara; this river is crossed by a bridge at Knockvicar, where its banks are adorned with some pleasing scenery.

Rockingham House, the elegant mansion of Viscount Lorton, is beautifully situated on the south-east side of Lough Key, in a gently undulating and well-wooded demesne of about 2000 statute acres, tastefully laid out in lawns and groves descending to the water's edge. It is of Grecian Ionic architecture, and built externally of marble, with a portico of six Ionic columns forming the principal entrance, on each side of which are corresponding pillars ornamenting the façade, while on the north side is a colonnade supported by six Ionic columns: adjoining the house is an extensive orangery, and numerous improvements have been made in the grounds by the present noble proprietor. Oakport is a large edifice in the ancient or Gothic style of architecture, occupying a beautiful situation on the margin of a large expanse of water formed by the Boyle river; the demesne comprises about 1200 statute acres, beautifully wooded, and from the inequality of its surface presents many picturesque and commanding views. Petty-sessions are held every Tuesday at Cotehall. That place was formerly called Urtaherra, or O'Mulloy's Hall, and was, early in the 17th century, together with the manor attached to it, the property of William, styled "the Great O'Mulloy;" but in the war of 1641 it came into the possession of the Hon. Chidley Coote, nephew of the first Earl of Mountrath, and from that family took its present name. The parish is in the diocese of Elphin, and the rectory was once part of the union of Killuken, also called Ardcarne: the tithes rent-charge is £210. The church is an ancient structure, enlarged in 1828 by a grant of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £234 for its further repair. The glebe-house was built chiefly by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £300 from the same Board, in 1807; £100 were contributed by Lord Lorton: the glebe comprises 20 acres, subject to a rent of £8. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is sometimes called Crosna, and comprises the Protestant parish of Ardcarne and part of that of Tumna, containing two chapels, situated at Cotehall and Crosna. A dispensary is maintained by Lord Lorton for the benefit of his tenantry; and another has been established at Cotehall, by the exertions of the Messrs. Mulloy, by whom and the other principal landed proprietors it is supported.

ARDCATH, a parish, in the union of DROGHEDA, barony of UPPER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Drogheda, on the road from Dublin to Drogheda; containing 1481 inhabitants, of whom 103 are in the village. It comprises 4380 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres: about one-half is under an improved system of tillage, and the remainder is nearly all excellent pasture land; the principal corn crop is wheat. There are about 300 acres of bog, which is being gradually reclaimed and brought into cultivation. On the townland of Cloghan is a quarry of excellent slate, but it has not been worked for some years. The weaving of linen was formerly carried on to a considerable extent: about 200 looms are at present employed in weaving cotton for the Dublin and Drogheda manufacturers; and there are two oatmeal-mills, one worked by wind and the other by water. A fair is held on May 8th, principally for cattle. The parish is in the diocese of Meath; the rectory is inappropriate, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Duleek. The tithes rent-charge is £199, of which £146. 10. are payable to the impropror, and £52. 10. to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parish of Clonsally and part of Piercetown, and contains two chapels, situated respectively at Ardcaith and Clonsally: the former is a neat building, erected about 90 years since, and recently much enlarged; the additional part stands upon the glebe land, by permission of the then vicar of Duleek. The Rev. John Leonard, late P.P., bequeathed the ground on which the residence of the Roman Catholic clergyman is built, and fifteen acres of land, to be vested in trustees for the use of all future pastors; £10 per annum for the joint use of the three parishes of the Roman Catholic union; and one ton of oatmeal to be distributed annually in the same district. The ruins of the ancient church are extensive, but void of interesting details; the belfry still remains, and a bell has been preserved in it from time immemorial, at the joint expense of the Protestant and Roman Catholic inhabitants, and is used at funerals, and by the latter to assemble their congregations.

ARDCAVAN, a parish, in the union of WEXFORD, barony of EAST SHELMAHER, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER; adjoining the town of Wexford, with which it is connected by a bridge; and containing 947 inhabitants. It is situated on the eastern shore of the estuary of the Slaney, and comprises 2457 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. Ely House, the property of the Marquess of Ely, stands near the bridge, at the southern extremity of the parish. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns, and is an inappropriate cure, forming part of the union of Ardcolme; the rectory is inappropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. The tithes rent-charge is £104. 19., of which £54. 17. are payable to the impropror, and £50. 2. to the curate. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ardavan is included in the district of Castlebridge, where the chapel is situated. Near the shore of Wexford harbour are the ruins of the old church; and at Ballytramont are considerable remains of the ancient castle of that name. An extensive coppice wood, comprising about 65 statute acres, stretches along the estuary from the latter place.

ARDCLARE, or CLONGORMICKAN, a parish, in the union of ROSCOMMON, half-barony of BALLYMOR, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Roscommon, on the road to Castlerea; containing 2555 inhabitants. It comprises $8543\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, principally under pasture; there is no waste land, and only a small quantity of bog, just sufficient for supplying the inhabitants with fuel. Limestone of the best description abounds, but the quarries are not worked for any particular purpose. Manorial courts are held in the townland of Farragher three times in the year. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, to which the vicarages of Kilcooley, Creeve, Killuken, Shankill, Kilmacumsey, and Tanna were episcopally united in 1809: the seven parishes constitute the union of Ardclare, in the patronage of the Bishop. The rectory of Ardclare is inappropriate in the Earl of Essex and Lord De Ros. The tithe rent-charge is £132. 9., one-half of which is payable to the impropricators (the earl receiving £55. 3. 9., and Lord De Ros, £11. 0. 9.), and the other half to the vicar; the gross rent-charge of the union payable to the incumbent is £369. 14. The church was originally built by Chas. Hawkes, Esq., of Briarfield, as a chapel of ease, about the year 1750, and subsequently became the parochial church; it is a plain edifice in good repair. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Glinak and Ballymoe; the chapel, a neat edifice, is situated on the townland of Ballymacurly.

ARDCLARE, or ACLARE, a village, in the parish of KILMACTEIGUE, union of SWINFORD, barony of LENEY, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 9 miles (N. E.) from Foxford, on the road to Ballymote; containing 159 inhabitants. It has a market on Saturday, and is a station of the constabulary police.

ARDCLINIS, a parish, in the union of LARNE, Lower half-barony of GLENAM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Glenarm; containing 1742 inhabitants. This parish is composed principally of a mountainous peninsula lying between Cairnrough and Red bay in the North Channel, and comprises 15,691 statute acres. The surface is hilly and irregular, but the land in cultivation is fertile, and the system of agriculture is in a very improving state. Some of the waste land has been planted, especially the hills, and there is also some natural wood; both, particularly the latter, very beautiful, and imparting to the coast an interesting and cheerful aspect. The arable and inhabited portion of the parish consists of one long strip extending from the village of Cairnrough along the sea-coast into Red bay, and up one side of the beautiful glen of Glenariff. On the land side it is enclosed by a steep and lofty mountain, ascended only by narrow paths traversing its acclivities, by which the inhabitants convey their fuel in slide carts. The river Acre rises in the neighbouring mountains, and forms the limit between this parish and that of Layde; it abounds with excellent trout, and where it empties itself into the sea there is a salmon fishery. The highest part of the mountains is called Carnaalpi-Aura; near Broughshane they are mostly covered with heath, and abound with moor game. Glenariff, one of the seven great glens, is flat in the centre; the river winds through the whole extent of it in a serpentine course, and being on a level with the sea, whenever a high tide meets a flood it overflows its banks and inundates the glen; the rise on each side towards the rocks assumes an appearance of circular rising ground. Three-fourths of the superficial extent of the parish are composed of mountainous, marshy, boggy, and unprofitable land: limestone and basalt are found in great abundance. The scenery is enlivened with a few gentlemen's seats, among which are Drumnasole and Knappan. Several of the inhabitants are engaged in the fishery carried on in the bay, where there is a small, but commodious harbour; and vessels of from 14 to 20 tons' burthen can enter the river Acre at high water. Fairs are held at Cairnrough. The royal military road passes through this parish, the most mountainous of all the parishes on the coast, notwithstanding which the road preserves a perfect level throughout, at an elevation of a few feet above high water mark; the excavations round Garron Point are 360 feet in depth. Garron Point is one of the coast-guard stations in the district of Ballycastle.

This is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10. The church, situated at Linnally, near Cairnrough, was erected in 1839, at a cost of £641, of which £492 were provided by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ardclinis is in the district of Layde, or Cushendall; the chapel at Glenariff is a spacious building, in which divine service is performed every alternate Sunday. There is a place of worship for Methodists, open every alternate Thursday. A large school-house was erected at Drumnasole, at an expense of £1000, by F. Turnley, Esq. On the summit of a headland, near Garron Point, are the remains of a large Danish camp called Denmaul or Doon-mul, which, according to tradition, was occupied by the Danes during their continuance in Ireland, and from which they set sail when they finally quitted the country.

ARDCOLLUM.—See KILMURRY, TIPPERARY.

ARDCOLM, or ARDCOLUMB, a parish, in the barony of EAST SHERMALIER, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from the town of Wexford; containing 804 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which is derived from the patron saint, St. Columba, whose holy well is near the old parish church, is situated on the north side of Wexford harbour, and on the road leading from Wexford, by Oulart, to Dublin; it comprises 9232 statute acres, and contains a small part of the village of Castlebridge, and the island of Beg Erin in Wexford harbour, on which are the remains of a very ancient church. The living is an inappropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, to which the rectories of St. Margaret and Artramon, the vicarages of Tickillen and Kilpatrick, and the inappropriate cures of Ardavan, Ballyvalloo, Skreen, and St. Nicholas were united by act of council in 1764, forming the union of Ardcolme, which is in the patronage of the Bishop. By an act of council in 1829, however, the parish of Kilpatrick, and eight townlands constituting the greater portion of the adjoining parish of Ticklinc, were separated from this union, and erected into a distinct benefice. The rectory of Ardcolme is inappropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. The tithe rent-charge is £94. 7., of which £53. 8. are payable to the proprietor, and £40. 19. to the incumbent; and the gross tithes of the benefice payable to the incumbent amount to £443. 0. 8. The parochial church, situated in the village of Castlebridge, was erected in 1766 on the site of an ancient castle, which, with an acre of land, was given for that purpose by the bishop; the expense was defrayed partly by subscription and partly by the parishioners, aided by a gift of £250 from the Board of First Fruits. It is a neat plain edifice surrounded by some fine old elm trees, and contains a tablet to Lieut.-Col. Jones Watson, who was killed in the disturbances of 1798, and interred in the churchyard at Carrick; and another to Edward Turner, Esq., who, with others, fell a victim to popular fury on the bridge at Wexford, on the 20th of June in the same year. The glebe-house is a substantial building, erected in 1802, at an expense of £1300, of which £100 were a gift from the Board: there are three glebes in the union, comprising together about 71 acres, of which 32 are in this parish. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Castlebridge, where the chapel is situated. The parochial school was established under the auspices of the incumbent, the Rev. J. W. Stokes; and the school-house, a neat building, was erected at his expense. The ruins of the old church still remain, about a mile from the present church.

ARDCRONEY, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of LOWER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Burrisokane, on the road to Nenagh; containing 1571 inhabitants. It comprises 6429 statute acres. The soil is mostly light; there are several small bogs in the parish, which abounds also with limestone. The water of a lake covering about 172 plantation acres was drained off by the Rev. R. Falkner, of Mount Falcon, in 1800, and the land is now highly productive. Among the principal seats is Beechwood, once the residence of the first Earl of Norbury, and originally a castle, of which the present house is a part; on a stone is the date 1594, with the initials O. H. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the patronage of the Bishop, to whose mensal the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £230. 14., of which £153. 16. are payable to the bishop. The church is a very neat structure, built in 1824, by aid of a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe of 3½ acres, but no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Modreeny, or CloghJordan; the chapel is a small building. On an eminence near the high road are the remains of the old church, forming a conspicuous ruin; and on the townland of Ballyluskey is an ancient castle, consisting of one square tower. At the rear of Beechwood House, on an eminence, is a large fort or rath, planted with trees, and the summit of which is encircled by a stone wall.

ARDEA, a parish, in the union and barony of PORTNEIGHIN, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER; containing, with part of the town of Mountmellick, 5186 inhabitants. It is on the road from Portarlinton to Mountmellick, and comprises 7796 statute acres. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, forming part of the union of Coolbanagher, which see.

ARDEE, an incorporated market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of ARDEE, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 10 miles (S. W. by S.) from Dundalk, and 34½ miles (N. N. W.) from Dublin; containing 6392 inhabitants, of whom 3679 are in the town. This place, anciently called Atherdee or Athirdee, derives its name from its situation on the river Dee. Though a town of great antiquity, it was chiefly indebted for its former prosperity and importance to Roger de Pippart, one of the English adventurers, who became lord of the surrounding territory, and erected a strong castle here, about the beginning of the thirteenth century. In the year 1207 he also founded an hospital for Crouched friars of the order of St. Augustine, dedicated to St. John, and endowed it with a carucate of land, to which he afterwards added two more, and other gifts. Eugene, Archbishop of Armagh, who died in 1215, confirmed the charter of this establishment, and granted it the privilege of electing its own prior: thus it attained an eminent degree of wealth and importance. A Carmelite friary was also founded at an early period, to which Ralph de Pippart, in the reign of Edward I., assigned certain endowments out of his manor of Ardee; and its revenues were further augmented by several of the inhabitants. During the invasion of Edward Bruce, who laid waste much of the surrounding country, many of the townspeople assembled for protection in this friary, which was attacked by a party of Scots and Irish under his command, and reduced to ashes. John de Bermingham, after repelling these invaders, was created Earl of Louth, and had a grant of the manor; but was soon afterwards killed in an insurrection of his own people. In 1538, the town was burnt by O'Nial and his associates; and in the following year George Dowdall, the last prior of the Augustine monastery, surrendered that house with all its lands and advowsons, and was allowed a pension of £20 sterling until he should obtain some ecclesiastical preferment. Having been appointed to the archbishopric of Armagh, he received a grant for life of the monastery and its appurtenances, in 1554; and in 1612 its possessions in and near the town were granted, by James I., to Sir Garret Moore, who also subsequently received a grant of the remainder. On the breaking out of hostilities in 1641, Sir Phelim O'Nial seized upon the town, which thence became the headquarters of the Irish army; but Sir Henry Tichborne advanced against it in the same year, with his small force from Drogheda, and retook the town and castle, in which a garrison was at once placed. At a subsequent period the Marquess of Ormonde issued orders to the garrison to destroy the town, which, from their neglect or disobedience of his commands, afterwards fell into the hands of Cromwell. James II., after leaving Dundalk, retired with his army to this place; but on the approach of William's forces, previously to the battle of the Boyne, retreated to Drogheda.

The town is situated in a very fertile corn district, and consists of one principal street running north and south, with lanes branching from it; many of the houses are of respectable appearance. Turf is brought for the supply of the inhabitants from a large bog about 1½ mile to the west, by means of a branch of the river Dee, which has been made navigable for boats. Malting is extensively carried on by fourteen establishments; there are a corn-mill, a corn and flour mill, and a tannery; and a number of persons are engaged in the manufacture of baskets. The market is held on Tuesday, and is well supplied: a meat-market, or shambles, was erected by the corporation in 1796, at a cost of about £600; and a corn-market about the year 1710, at an expense of nearly £2000; for each of which they pay a ground rent of about £10 per annum. Fairs, four of which are held under the corporation charter of Queen Anne (in confirmation and extension of a patent of Charles II. in 1681), and three of which were granted by patent of George III. in 1819, are held on March 1st, April 10th, June 6th, July 8th, Aug. 20th, Oct. 23rd (a large fair for sheep), and Dec. 17th, principally for live stock, on a plot of ground which was inclosed at a considerable expense by the late corporation. The tolls were granted by charter to the corporation, who, previously to 1823, claimed the right of levying toll not only at the market and fairs, but also toll thorough and pontage; but after considerable resistance, accompanied by riot and disorder, their claim to the latter was negatived at the Dundalk assizes in that year: the payment of the former was subsequently also resisted, but their right was confirmed by the assistant barrister for the county. In the excise arrangements Ardee is within the district of Dundalk; and it is a chief station of the constabulary police.

A CORPORATION is first mentioned in a charter of the 51st of Edward III. (1377), which was set forth in a charter of inquisitions and confirmation of the 3rd of Richard II. The style then adopted was, "the Provosts (or Portreeves) and Commonalty of the town of Athirde;" and certain customs on goods for sale were granted for a term of ten years, and confirmed by succeeding monarchs, in aid of inclosing the town with a stone wall and of paving the streets. A charter of the 1st of Henry V. (1414) granted cognizance of all pleas, real and personal, and jurisdiction of assize, with return of writs and other important privileges, within the town and precincts; and by a statute in the 33rd of Henry VI., confirmed by another in the following year, it was enacted that the portreeves should be justices of the peace. By the charter granted in the 11th of Queen Anne, 1713, and which was until lately the governing charter, the corporation was styled "the Portreeve, Burgesses, and Commons of the Corporation of Atherdee;" and consisted of a portreeve, 23 other burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen, assisted by a town-clerk, constable, two sergeants-at-mace, &c. There was also a select body composed of the portreeve, six burgesses, and six common-council freemen. The portreeve was elected annually out of the burgesses on the 23rd of April, by the portreeve, burgesses, and freemen, and was sworn in on Sept. 29th; the burgesses were elected for life out of the freemen, by the corporation at large; the freemen were created by nomination of the common council, and subsequent election of the corporation at large; and the members of the common council were created for life in the same manner as the burgesses. By the act of the 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108, the corporation was dissolved; and the property, which is derived from rents of land and tolls, amounting to £135, is now vested in Municipal Commissioners. The borough returned to the Irish parliament two members, elected by the burgesses and freemen, until the Union, when, of the £15,000 awarded as compensation for the abolition of the elective franchise, one-half was paid to Wm. Ruxton, Esq., and the remainder to Chas. and Wm. Parkinson Ruxton, Esqrs. The portreeve, under the charter, was a justice of the peace, coroner, and clerk of the market; but, being usually a justice of peace for the county, and the local courts having fallen into disuse, these peculiar functions were little exercised, and the corporation before being dissolved became little more than nominal. The county quarter-sessions for the division of Ardee are held here in January and June; and petty-sessions are held every Wednesday, at which the county magistrates preside. The old castle is now used as a court-house; and attached to it is a well-regulated county bridewell, consisting of six cells, two day-rooms, and two yards.

The parish comprises 4884½ statute acres. With the exception of about 300 acres of bog, it is principally under tillage; the soil is very fertile, and the system of agriculture much improved. There are several quarries of limestone and greenstone. The surrounding scenery has been much improved by extensive planting, and attached to Ardee House and Red House are handsome demesnes. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Armagh, to which the rectory of Kildemock was united by act of council in 1700, and subsequently the vicarages of Shenlis, Smarmore, and Stickillen episcopally; forming the union of Ardee, in the patronage of the Lord-Primate: the rectory is inappropriate in Viscount Ferrard. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is about £294. 10. 6., the whole payable to the proprietor, who allows a stipend to the incumbent. Besides a glebe-house and 40 plantation acres of glebe, valued at £120 per annum, at Kildemock, nearly in the centre of the union, the incumbent has a glebe in this parish comprising 104 plantation acres, and valued at £391. 11. 5. per annum, fifteen tenements in the town let for £107. 2. 2. per annum, and half an acre in Stickillen. The gross annual value of his benefice prior to the conversion of tithe composition into rent-charge, tithe and glebe inclusive, was £842. 14. The church, which was formerly that of the Augustine monastery, is an ancient and spacious structure, supposed to have been built in 1208, and still in good repair. The Roman Catholic district comprises the Protestant union, and the parish of Maplestown in addition, and contains two chapels, situated at Ardee and Kildemock: the former stands at the entrance to the town from the south, and was built in 1829; it is a handsome and commodious edifice faced with hewn stone, 100 feet long by 56 broad, with a gallery extending round three sides of it.

There are, besides others, two schools for both sexes on the foundation of Erasmus Smith: the boys' school-room was built in 1806, and the girls' in 1817, at a total expense of £600, of which the corporation contributed £450 and about three roods of the fair-green as a site, and W. P. Ruxton, Esq., £150. There are also a dispensary and a savings' bank. The union workhouse, built on a site of seven acres held at a rent of £18, was completed in 1842, the cost being £5175; it has the necessary accommodations for the board of guardians and its officers, and is constructed to contain 600 paupers. Of the Augustine monastery, with the exception of the church, only the eastern wall of the belfry at the west end, and an adjoining cell on the north, are remaining; and of the Carmelite friary there are no vestiges. Near the church are the remains of an old college, which have been converted into a thatched dwelling. The ancient castle, situated nearly in the middle of the town, and now used as a court-house and gaol, is of quadrangular form, with a high roof and a rudely pointed gateway; the east and west fronts are defended by projecting towers, which rise above the rest of the building. In the centre of the town is another castle, which has long been in the possession of the Hatch family. It was granted by Cromwell to Williams, one of their ancestors, and was recently fitted up as a handsome dwelling by W. Hatch, Esq.; it is defended on the east side by embrasures and a tower, on which were placed two four-pounders, by permission of the lord-lieutenant and council, in 1828. Close to the town is a fortified mount of great magnitude, anciently called Cnoc na Scanghaim, and the seat of the chiefs of the district. The Earl of Meath enjoys the inferior title of Baron Brabazon, of Ardee, by which his ancestor, Sir Edward Brabazon, was elevated to the peerage of Ireland, in 1616.

ARDERA, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of IVERK, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Waterford; containing 300 inhabitants. This parish, which anciently was part of the possessions of the abbey of Jerpoint, is bounded on the north by the parish of Ulid, and on the south by that of Rathkyran; and comprises $77\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. It is in the diocese of Ossory, and is one of the several denominations constituting the union of Burnchurch: the tithe rent-charge is £51. 15. In the Roman Catholic divisions, Ardera forms part of the district of Moncoin.

ARDERRIG, or ALDERG, a parish, in the union of CELBRIDGE, barony of NEWCASTLE, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W.) from Lucan; containing 127 inhabitants. It is situated near the road from Dublin to Celbridge, and comprises 759 statute acres. The parish is a rectory and curacy, in the diocese of Dublin; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral, and the curacy is one of the denominations forming the union of Leixlip. In 1328, the rectorial value was eight marks annually, of which five were appropriated to light the altar of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the cathedral of St. Patrick's, and the residue to the vicars-choral. The ruins of the church are thickly covered with ivy, and occupy a space of twelve yards by six.

ARDESS, a hamlet, in the parish of MAGHERACULMONY, poor-law union of LOUTHKESTOWN, or IRVINESTOWN, barony of LURG, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from the town of Irvinestown, and a short distance (E. by S.) from the village of Kesh. This hamlet is situated about the centre of the parish, and has considerable facilities of communication. A loan fund was established some years ago, which in the year 1842 had a capital of £392, circulated £1391 in 521 loans, and cleared a net profit of about £13. 10.

ARDFERT, a decayed borough and market-town, and a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Tralee, and $144\frac{1}{2}$ (S. W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 4334 inhabitants, of whom 655 are in the town. The name of this place, sometimes written Ardart, signifies, according to Sir James Ware, "a wonderful place on an eminence," or, as some others interpret it, "the hill of miracles." Ardart has also been considered a corruption of Ard Ert, "the high place of Ert." Matthew Paris calls the spot Hertfert, "the place of miracles of Hert or Ert;" and in the Annals of Innisfallen it is mentioned under the name of Hylerte, which denotes "the territory of miracles, or of Ert." It is thought to have been made by St. Ert, in the fifth century, the seat of a bishopric comprehending the northern part of the county. St. Brendan erected a sumptuous monastery here in the sixth century, which, with the town, was destroyed by fire in 1069: it was again nearly reduced to ashes by Cormac O'Culen, in 1151, and, with the town, suffered a like fate in 1179, on which occasion it is supposed to have been entirely demolished. In 1253, Thomas, Lord of Kerry, founded a monastery for conventual Franciscans, probably on the site of the former house, and which was held in high estimation on account of numerous miracles said to have been performed in it: the founder and several other lords of Kerry, with many of their respective families, were interred in this monastery. A leper-house was founded about 1312 by Nicholas Fitz-Maurice, who also erected a castle, of which little is recorded until the reign of Elizabeth, when the town was destroyed by a party of the royal forces under Maurice Stack, in 1599. In the following year the castle was besieged by Sir Charles Wilmot, and, after a vigorous defence for nine days, was surrendered by the garrison, on some small pieces of ordnance being brought against it from an English vessel; the constable was hanged, but the lives of the rest were spared. The castle was rebuilt by Patrick, Lord of Kerry, in 1637, but demolished by an Irish leader named Lawler, in 1641; and there are now no remains. In the same year the cathedral was also destroyed, and only the south transept was afterwards fitted up for divine service.

The town is without either trade or manufacture, and presents the appearance of a village. The market, which was held on Thursday, was granted, with a fair on the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul and the following day, and a court of pie poudre and the usual tolls, by letters-patent bearing date July 6th, 10th of James I. (1612), to Thomas, Lord of Kerry, then principal owner of the district. Fairs are held on Whit-Monday, July 9th, and Aug. 15th. The collection of tolls is not confined to sales made in the public fair; every person selling in his own house, on the fair day, is compelled to pay toll to the collector. There is a receiving-house for letters to and from Tralee. Petty-sessions are held every

Ardfert has always been considered a monouch by prescription, there being no charter of incorporation on record. The corporation, under the title of "The Portreeve, Burgesses, and Freemen of the Borough of Ardfert, in the county of Kerry," consisted of a portreeve, twelve burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen. The borough returned two members to the Irish parliament in 1689, and continued to exercise the franchise till the Union, when the £15,000 awarded as compensation for the loss of that privilege was paid to the trustees of the marriage settlement of the Earl of Glandore: the right of election was vested in the corporation. For some years after the Union, meetings took place for the election of a portreeve and for filling up vacancies among the burgesses, principally with a view to preserve the corporate property in the commons from encroachment ; but the corporation was little more than nominal, and its meetings soon fell into disuse. By the act of the 3rd and 4th of Victoria, cap. 109, it was wholly dissolved ; and the property, consisting of the commons, is now vested in the guardians of the poor of the union of Listowel. The borough extends towards the east and west a considerable distance from the town, but on the south-west a portion of the town itself is outside the limits, which are not accurately defined : it is entirely within the parish, and is said to include the Sheep Walk, Grague, Killarane, Brandon Well, Kilquane, Laragh, Gortaspideale, and the commons. The above-mentioned grant of James I., in 1612, conferred on Thomas, Lord of Kerry, the privilege of holding courts baron and courts leet, with other manorial rights. The Earl of Listowel is now lord of the manor, and appoints a seneschal, who holds, in what was probably the old borough bridewell, a manor court once in three weeks, for the trial of actions of debt amounting to 40s. late currency. The jurisdiction extends about 2½ miles round the town ; all trials are by jury, the jurors being summoned from the tenants of the manor, who are bound by their leases to serve, or are otherwise liable to a fine. But the business in this court is decreasing, from the holding of petty-sessions in the town every alternate week, and of the county quarter-sessions before the assistant barrister at Tralee. The commons adjoining the town, now comprising about 200 acres, were formerly more extensive ; but encroachments have been made from time to time, which have been a source of constant disputes, and there are now on them about 100 houses or cabins.

The DIOCESE OF ARDERT and AGHADOC consists of two ancient sees which from time immemorial have been incorporated. The see of Ardfert, or Ardart, was anciently called Kiaragi or Kerrigia, also the bishopric of Iar-Muan, or West Munster ; and from history and public records it appears that the bishops of Ardfert were likewise denominated bishops of Kerry, which title is still retained in the Roman Catholic divisions. On the translation of Thomas Fulwar, the last bishop of Ardfert, to Cashel, in 1660, this see was held in commendam with that of Limerick, of which latter Edward Singe was in that year consecrated bishop ; and on his translation to Cork, in 1663, Ardfert was permanently united to Limerick, under the prelacy of William Fuller. The ancient diocese of Aghadoc can now only be traced in its archdeaconry, which is annexed to the chapter of Ardfert, and in the remains of its cathedral. The united diocese is one of the sixteen constituting the ecclesiastical province of Dublin, and comprehends the entire county of Kerry and a small portion of that of Cork : it extends about 66 British miles in length and 61 in breadth, and comprises by estimation a superficial area of 676,450 plantation acres, of which 647,650 are in Kerry, and 28,800 in Cork. The chapter consists of the dean, chancellor, treasurer, precentor, and archdeacon : there are no prebendaries or vicars-choral attached to the cathedral ; the only other endowed office is a minor canonry, which does not exist in connexion with any other cathedral in Ireland, except that of St. Patrick, Dublin. Of the cathedral of Ardfert, a portion of the remains, fitted up as the parochial church, was repaired in 1831 by subscription of the bishop and dignitaries ; there being no economy fund. The consistorial court consists of a vicar-general, surrogate, registrar, deputy-registrar, and proctor : there is also a diocesan schoolmaster. The diocese comprehends 89 parishes, forming 49 benefices, of which 9, including the deanery, are in the gift of the crown ; 21, including the other dignities, in the patronage of the bishop ; and the remainder in lay patronage. The number of churches is 35, besides 8 other buildings in which divine service is performed ; and of glebe-houses, 20. The Roman Catholic diocese retains its ancient name of Kerry, and extends, with the exception of a small part of one of the northern parishes, over the whole of that of the Established Church ; it also includes the parishes of Kileaskan, Kileatarn, Kilconenagh, and Kilnamanagh, in the Protestant diocese of Ross, and is suffragan to Cashel. It comprehends 43 parochial unions or districts, and contains 88 chapels, served by 43 parish priests and 34 coadjutors or curates : the bishop's district is Killarney.

The PARISH lies on the western coast, and contains 10,134 statute acres, inclusively of a considerable extent of sand-hills, marsh, and bog. Within its limits is the creek or harbour of Barra, where a pier was some years since constructed by the Fishery Board, which from its position has hitherto been of no avail. The entrance to the creek is flanked by rocks rising to the height of nearly 100 feet, and was formerly defended by a castle, of which a considerable part remains, and from which, according to tradition, a chain was thrown across to the opposite rock, to prevent the sudden entry of hostile vessels. Further in, on the Fenit side, are the remains of another old castle. The pasture farms in the parish are extensive ; the tillage farms average from 20 to 30 acres. There are a few good houses ; and within a short distance of the town are the ruins of a castle, called Rahanane, formerly the residence of the bishops of Ardfert, and still attached to the see. The living is a rectory divided into five equal portions, held respectively by the dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, and a perpetual curate : the portion attached to the deanery was united, at a period prior to any existing records, to the rectories of Rataas and Killaneer, constituting the corps of the deanery of Ardfert, in the patronage of the Crown. The title rent-charge of the parish is £190.7.9., and that of the whole decanal union £360. The church is served by the perpetual curate, whose stipend, payable by the dignitaries, has been augmented by a portion of the glebe, which formerly constituted part of the endowment of the archdeaconry. There is no glebe-house: the glebe lands comprise 280a. 1r. 20p., plantation measure, of which 37a. 1r. 8p. belong to the dean, 71a. 12p. to the precentor, 45a. to the treasurer, 15a. now to the perpetual curate, and 112a. to the minor canon, who has also other lands, amounting to about 68 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this place is the head of a district, which comprises the parishes of Ardferd, Kilmoiley, Ballynahaglish, and Fenit, and contains three chapels, situated respectively at Ardferd, Chapeltown, and Lerrigs: the first, erected in 1783, at an expense of £300, is a neat slated building, with a sacristy, and over the altar is a painting of the Crucifixion. Here is a dispensary.

The CATHEDRAL, dedicated to St. Brandon or Brendan, occupied an eminence on the north side of the town, and is said to have been destroyed, as already observed, in the war of 1641. The remains consist of the walls of the nave and choir, which are perfect. The east window has three lofty lancet-shaped compartments, ornamented internally with light and elegant clustered pilaster columns: on each side is a niche, in one of which stands the figure of a bishop, rudely sculptured, but in excellent preservation, lately found in sinking a vault, and called and venerated as the effigy of St. Brandon; near it, in the choir, is another of much superior workmanship. On the south side, near the altar, are nine windows, ornamented with pilaster columns terminating in a trefoil arch. At the west end, on the north side, are two square windows, opposite which are three bold arches resting on square pillars, which led from the cathedral probably into a chapel; and there were also two other entrances into this part of the building, the principal at the north-west corner. Four rude Norman arches still remain, one of which, larger than the rest, formed the doorway. A doorway at the north-west led into a later addition, part of which remains, and in 1669 was purchased for her tomb by the Dowager Countess of Kerry; it has since been the family vault of the Crosbys. To the west of the cathedral are two detached buildings, one having the Norman and the other the pointed arch. An ancient round tower, which formerly stood near the cathedral, fell about 70 years since. Within half a mile to the east, in a beautiful park of the late Earl of Glandore's, are the cruciform ruins of the FRANCISCAN abbey, consisting of the nave and choir, with a lofty tower on the west, a chapel on the south, and the refectory on the north, adjoining which are two sides of the cloisters; the whole principally in the pointed style. The great east window has five divisions, and is of bold design. On the south side the choir was lighted by nine windows, under which are five arches, in the wall, differing in style and elevation, and probably intended as monumental recesses for abbots; in the second is an altar-tomb of the last Earl and Countess of Glandore. The south chapel, of which the great window is perfect and its details handsome, was connected with the nave by three noble pointed arches resting on massive, but peculiarly elegant, circular columns: a stone in the buttress of the arch nearest the tower bears a rude inscription, which, from the difficulty of decyphering it, gave rise to various opinions, but which, on lately removing the moss and dirt, proved to be in Latin, purporting that Donald Fitz Bohon, "who sleeps here, caused this work (probably the chapel) to be done in 1453." In the choir are several very ancient tombstones, one bearing the effigy of an abbot.

Near these ruins stands ARDFERT ABBEY, the mansion of the Crosbie family, who have resided here since the reign of Elizabeth, when Dr. John Crosbie, of Maryborough, Queen's county, was preferred to the bishopric. His descendants successively attained the honours of Baron Brandon, Viscount Crosbie, and Earl of Glandore, now extinct. Colonel David Crosbie, son of the bishop, and who distinguished himself in the service of Charles I., mentions, in his claims to Cromwell in 1653, that the Irish had burnt his house at Ardferd, which had cost him more than £1000 in building; and the original order by Colonel Fitz Morice, for its destruction, is among the MSS. in the library. It appears, from an inscription still remaining, to have been completed in 1635. The succeeding mansion was modernised by the first Lord Brandon in 1720, and has been greatly improved by its present occupant: it contains a library of choice works and numerous family MSS., and in the dining and drawing rooms is a variety of paintings, mostly family portraits. The park is well stocked with deer; the gardens are extensive, and open into several fine avenues of elm, lime, and beech trees.

ARDFIELD, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, barony of IBANE and BARRYROE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S. by E.) from Clonakilly; containing 2460 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the south coast, and is bounded on the east by the bay of Clonakilly; it comprises 2646 statute acres. About four-fifths are under cultivation: there is very little waste land, and no bog; the poor bring the turf from Clonakilly. The soil, though light and in some places very stony, generally produces good crops. There are about 800 acres of land, called the Commons, wholly in the occupation of poor people who have inclosed it; some of it is remarkably good, and the whole is under cultivation. Indications of copper-ore appear at Duneen, and many excellent specimens have been found: attempts to raise it were made some years since, but the design was abandoned. There are several large and handsome houses in the parish. At its southern extremity is Dunowen Head, off which lie the Shanbuee rocks; and also in the parish is Dunny Cove, where is stationed the western coast-guard detachment within the district of Kineale. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is impropriate in M. Roberts and T. W. Foot, Esqrs. The tithe rent-charge is £152. 15., of which £83 are payable to the impropricators, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is in ruins; but divine service is performed in a room at the coast-guard station at Dunny Cove. A new church is about to be built by subscription, adjoining the ruins of the old edifice; and also a glebe-house. The glebe comprises 9½ acres of excellent land. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district comprising the parishes of Ardfield and Rathbarry, in each of which is a chapel; that of Ardfield is a low, plain, but commodious edifice, situated on the Commons. The ruins of the church are on the highest point of land in the parish; and near them is a building which, during the war, was used as a signal tower, but is now the residence of Lieut. Speck, who commands the coast-guard at Dunny Cove.

ARDFINNAN, a parish, in the union of CLOGHEEN, barony of IFFA and OFFA WEST, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Cahir; containing 1214 inhabitants, of whom 530 are in the village. The place derives its name, signifying "the hill of Finian," from an eminence on which its castle was built, and from St. Finian the Leper, who flourished in the latter part of the sixth century, and founded here an abbey of Regular canons, to which, about the year 903, Cormac Mac Cuillennan, the celebrated monarch and archbishop of Munster, bequeathed one ounce of gold and one of silver, with his horse and arms: it was plundered and burnt by the English forces, in 1178. Here was also at an early period a monastery for Conventual Franciscans, concerning which there are no particulars on record. The village is situated on both banks of the river Suir, which is here crossed by a bridge of fourteen arches, and on the mail-coach road from Dublin to Cork, by way of Clonmel. Within half a mile above the bridge, according to McCurtin's annals, Terlogh O'Brien, King of Munster, routed Terlogh O'Connor, Monarch of Ireland, in 1150, when O'Hyne, Prince of Fiachra, and O'Flahertie, Prince of West Connaught, were slain, with the greater part of the monarch's army. The castle was erected by King John, when Earl of Mortun and Lord of Ireland, in 1184. It was a large rectangular pile strengthened by square towers at the corners, and belonged to the Knights Templars, on the suppression of which order it was granted to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and subsequently to the Bishop of Waterford; its ruins occupy a picturesque and elevated site on a rock overlooking the river, and consist of the gateway and greater part of the walls. From public records it appears that this place had anciently a corporation: in 1311, 4th of Edward II., a grant of "pontage for three years" was made to "the Bailiffs and good men of Ardfinnan," at the request of the Bishop of Limerick. In 1399, John, Earl of Desmond, was drowned in crossing the ford here with his followers, on returning from an incursion into the territory of the Earl of Ormonde.

The PARISH comprises 1081 statute acres: there are some limestone quarries, the produce of which is chiefly burnt for manure. A fair, principally for the sale of pigs, is held on Feb. 2nd, and the village has a patent for two other fairs on May 17th and Nov. 19th. There is a receiving-house for letters to and from Clonmel. Petty-sessions are held once a fortnight, and a manorial court six times in the year; and here is a station of the constabulary police. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Lismore, with the vicarage of Neddins and the rectory of Rochestown episcopally united, forming the union of Ardfinnan, in the patronage of the Bishop of Cashel: the tithe rent-charge of Ardfinnan is £127. 10., and the gross rent-charge of the benefice payable to the incumbent is £258. 15. The church is a plain edifice, built in 1807, by subscription and parochial assessment. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £100, and a loan of £1200, from the Board of First Fruits, in 1818; the glebe comprises 20a. 2r. 11p. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which comprises also Neddins, Rochestown, Ballybacon, and Tnolloghmelan, and contains chapels at Ardfinnan, Ballybacon, and Grange. Dr. Downes bequeathed £8. 6s. per annum, late currency, for apprenticing Protestant children.

ARDGLASS, a sea-port town and a parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of LECALE, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Downpatrick, and 78 miles (N. E.) from Dublin; containing 1433 inhabitants, of whom 1066 are in the town. This place derives its name, signifying in the Irish language "the High Green," from a lofty green hill of conical form, called the Ward, and situated to the west of the town. From the remains of several castles it appears to have been formerly of some importance. Jordan's Castle is memorable for the gallant and protracted defence that it made during the insurrection of the Earl of Tyrone, in the reign of Elizabeth; and derived its present name from its loyal and intrepid proprietor, Simon Jordan, who for three years sustained the continued assaults of the besiegers. He was at length relieved by the Lord-Deputy Mountjoy, who sailed with a fleet from Dublin and landed here on the 17th of June, 1611; and who, after relieving the garrison, pursued the insurgents to Dunsford, where a battle took place, in which they were nearly annihilated; and Jordan was rewarded for his services by a concordatum from the queen. The port of Ardglass appears to have been in a flourishing condition from a very early period; a trading company from London settled here in the reign of Henry IV.; and in the reign of Henry VI. it had an extensive foreign trade, and was superior to any other port in the province of Ulster. At that time the town had received a charter of incorporation, was governed by a mayor, and had a port-admiral and revenue officers. Henry VIII. granted the customs of the port, then worth £5000 per annum, to Gerald Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, in whose family they remained till 1637, when, with certain privileges enjoyed by the port of Carrickfergus, they were purchased by the crown, and the whole were transferred to Newry and Belfast. From this time the trade of Ardglass began to decline, and the town ultimately became only a residence for fishermen. It was formerly the property of a branch of the Leinster family, of whom the last resident, Lord Lecale, sold the manor to W. Ogilvie, Esq., who had married his lordship's mother, the Dowager Duchess of Leinster, and under whose auspices the town recovered its former importance. At his decease it descended to his grandson and heir, Major Aubrey W. Beauclerk.

The town is pleasantly and advantageously situated on the eastern coast, on the side of a hill overlooking the sea, and is well known to mariners by two conspicuous hills, one on the west, called the Ward of Ardglass, and the other on the east, called the Ward of Ardtole. Mr. Ogilvie, on its coming into his possession in the year 1812, built entire streets, a church and school-house, and an elegant hotel; he also constructed hot, cold, and vapour baths; built and furnished lodging-houses for the accommodation of visitors, and rendered it one of the most fashionable watering-places in the north of Ireland. The town in its present state consists of one long street, nearly of semicircular form, from which several smaller streets branch off: the houses in front of the inner bay are called the Crescent; and there are many good houses in front of the harbour, adjoining which is a long range of building in the castellated style, called the New Works, although they are so old that nothing is known either of the time or the purpose of their erection. They form together a line of fortifications, 250 feet in length from east to west, and 24 feet in breadth close to the shore; the walls are three feet in thickness, and strengthened with three towers, one in the centre and one at each extremity. These buildings were originally divided into thirty-six apartments, eighteen on the ground floor and eighteen above, with a staircase in the centre; each of the lower apartments had a small arched door and a large square window, which renders it probable that they had been shops occupied by merchants at some very early period, possibly by the company of traders that settled here in the reign of Henry IV. About the year 1789, Lord Charles Fitzgerald, son of the Duke of Leinster, who was then proprietor, caused that portion of the building between the central and the western tower to be enlarged in the rear, and raised to the height of three stories, in the castellated style; and from that time it has been called Ardglass Castle, and has been the residence of the proprietor of the estate. It was once styled Horn Castle, either from a great quantity of horns found on the spot, or from a high pillar which stood on its summit previously to its being roofed; and near it is another castle, called Cow'd Castle, signifying the want of horns, from a word in the Scottish dialect, many phrases of which are still in use in the province. In a direct line with Ardglass Castle, and due west of it, is Margaret's Castle, a square ancient structure baving the lower story arched with stone; and on the north-west side of the town, on a considerable elevation, were formerly two other castles, about 90 feet distant from each other, the larger of which was called King's Castle, and the smaller the Tower; they were thrown down in excavating the foundation of a new building which now stands on their site. Jordan's Castle, previously noticed, is an elegant building, 70 feet high, standing in the centre of the town, and having at the entrance a well of excellent water.

The surrounding scenery is beautiful, and the air salubrious; the green banks of Ardole and Ringfad, on the north and south sides of the bay, overhanging the sea, where ships of large burthen can approach within an oar's length of the bold and precipitous rocks that line the coast. From the Ward of Ardglass is a delightful prospect extending from 30 to 40 miles over a fertile country: on the south-west, beyond Killough and the beautiful bay of Dundrum, are seen the lofty mountains of Morne rising in sublime grandeur; on the east, the Isle of Man; and on the north-east, the Ayrshire mountains of Scotland, in distant perspective, appearing to rise from the ocean, and embracing with their extended arch more than one-half of the horizon. During the fishing season the view of the sea from this place is rendered peculiarly striking and animated by the daily arrival and departure of vessels, and by the numerous shoals of mackerel, pollock, and other fish visible on the surface of the water for miles. There are no manufactures; the labouring classes being chiefly employed in the fisheries off the north-east coast, of which this place is the common centre. During the season there are frequently in the harbour, at one time, from 300 to 400 vessels from Donaghadee, Carlingford, Skerries, Dublin, Arklow, and the Isle of Man, but principally from St. Ives and Penzance, on the coast of Cornwall. The boats come regularly into the harbour to dispose of their fish, which is quickly purchased by carriers, who take it into the interior of the country, and by merchants who cure it; but chiefly by masters of sloops and small craft, who wait in the harbour for the arrival of the fishing-boats, and proceed directly to Dublin or Liverpool to dispose of the herrings fresh. These sloops usually perform two trips in the week, and the masters frequently make from £20 to £50 by each cargo.

The principal exports are corn, cattle, and provisions; and the imports, coal, salt, and earthenware. The harbour is admirably adapted for trade and steam navigation; and after the erection of the new pier, since destroyed, could accommodate steamers of any tonnage, there being sufficient depth of water for vessels of 500 tons to enter at any state of the tide. There is an inner harbour, where a quay and pier have been erected for the use of the fishing-vessels; it is called Kimmersport, and is capable of accommodating a great number of fishing-boats, exclusively of other vessels of 100 tons' burthen; but the sea recedes from it at low water. On the quay are capacious stores for corn, in which article an extensive trade is carried on. Adjoining the outer harbour a pier, now called the old pier, was completed, in 1814, at an expense of £14,000. The new pier, constructed in 1834, at an expense of £25,000, by Mr. Ogilvie, under the superintendence of Sir John Rennie, was destroyed by a storm in 1838; it extended 300 feet from the extremity of the old pier into deep water, and was 20 feet broad, and built of large blocks of stone from the Isle of Man, hewn and dressed, forming a breakwater, and affording a beautiful promenade embracing fine views of the Isle and Calf of Man. A handsome lighthouse erected on the pier shared its fate in the storm; it was connected with the land by a very capacious wharf, covering nearly an acre of ground, with a basin of semicircular form, beyond which are the quays for the colliers. The harbour is situated in lat. 54° 15' 20" (N.), and lon. 5° 35' 20" (W.). A sub-office here is in connexion with the post-office of Downpatrick. There is a patent for a market and four fairs. A constabulary police force, and a coast-guard station forming one of the seven that constitute the district of Newcastle, have been established; and a manorial court is held for debts and pleas to the amount of £100.

By an order in council dated Oct. 19th, 1834, the townlands of Jordan's Crew and Kildare's Crew formerly belonging to the parish of Ballee, and the townland of Ross formerly in the parish of Kilclief, were permanently united to this parish, which now comprises 1137½ statute acres. The lands are all arable, very fertile, and in a profitable state of cultivation; there is not a rood of waste or bog. At a short distance from the town, and near the shore, are extensive quarries of good rubble stone, from which were raised the materials used in the construction of the numerous buildings lately erected within the parish, and partly in the building of the pier: for the easier conveyance of the stone a railroad, a quarter of a mile in length, was laid down. The living was formerly a perpetual curacy, and the rectory was part of the union of Ballyphilip and corps of the chancellorship of Down, which union was dissolved in Feb. 1843, on the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and Ardglass is now an independent rectory, in the diocese of Down, of the yearly value of £193, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church was built on the site of an ancient edifice, the Board of First Fruits having granted £800 as a gift and £400 as a loan, in 1813; it is a handsome edifice, with a tower and spire 90 feet high, and has been recently enlarged. In digging the foundation, an oblong stone, broader at the top than at the bottom, was found near the place of the ancient altar: this relic is still in the churchyard; it has at the top a dove sculptured in relief, in the centre the Crucifixion, and on each side a shield of arms. Underneath are some lines in curiously raised letters of the old English character, from which, though rendered almost unintelligible by intricate literal combinations, it appears to have been dedicated to the memory of Mrs. Jane O'Brine, in 1573. The glebe-house was built in 1815, a quarter of a mile from the church, at an expense of £500, of which £450 were a gift and £50 a loan from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe contains three plantation acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is united with Dunsford, by which latter name the union is generally known. Each has a chapel; that of Ardglass is a very neat edifice, built in 1829 on a spacious site given by Mr. Ogilvie.

About half a mile to the north-east of the town, on a hill in the townland of Ardtole, are the ruins of an ancient place of worship called the old church of Ardtole, the eastern gable of which, with a large arched opening, and the two side walls, more than three feet in thickness, are remaining, and are of strong but very rude masonry. In Ardtole creek, on the north-east side of the bay, is a natural cavern with a large entrance, which gradually contracts into a narrow fissure in the rock, scarcely admitting one person to creep through it; the elevation is very great, from which circumstance the townland probably derived its name Ardtole, signifying "high hole;" some persons have penetrated a considerable way into this cavern, but no one has explored it fully. Ardglass formerly gave the title of Earl to the family of Cromwell, and subsequently that of Viscount to the Barringtons.

ARDGUIN, or ARDQUIN, a parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, on Lough Strangford, and on the road from Portaferry to Belfast; containing, with part of the post-town of Portaferry, 916 inhabitants. There appears to have been a monastery at this place, founded at a very early period: according to Harris' History of Down it was the priory of Eynes, which, on the authority of a patent roll among the public records, is said to have been seized by the crown during the war between England and France, and was granted, in 1411, by Henry IV. to Thomas Cherele. Ardquin afterwards became the chief residence of the bishops of Down, of whom the last that resided here was Dr. Echlin, who was consecrated to the see in 1614. The parish comprises 3043 statute acres, of which 80 are under water. The soil, though in some parts interspersed with rocks that rise above the surface, is in general fertile; the lands are in a good state of cultivation; there is neither waste nor bog. Clay-slate is raised for building, and for mending the roads. Portaferry House, a splendid mansion, is situated in an extensive park ornamented with stately timber. Here are mills for flour and oatmeal, and for dressing flax; the situation of the parish on Strangford Lough affords great facility of conveyance by water. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, held by the bishop, who appoints a curate, allowing him a stipend of £74 per annum. No church appears to have existed here from a period long prior to the Reformation till the year 1829, when the present edifice was erected by Dr. Mant, the bishop; it is a neat small building with a square tower, and occupies a picturesque situation on an eminence between Lough Strangford and Lough Cowie, which latter is a fresh-water lake of considerable extent. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. The chief lands appear to have been granted as mensal lands to the see, and consequently to have been tithe-free; but their exemption has formed a subject of dispute: the tithes are returned under the composition act as amounting to £289. 19. 7., payable to the bishop. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Upper Ardes. There are considerable remains of the monastery, which shew that the buildings were originally of very great extent.—See PORTAFERRY.

ARDKEEN, a parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Portaferry; containing 2238 inhabitants. This place derives its name, originally Ard-Coyne, from its situation on the shores of a salt-water lake, which was formerly called Lough Coyne. It was one of the most important strongholds of the ancient Irish, who made it a place of refuge from the violence and rapacity of the Danes, and had a large and well-fortified camp protected on three sides by the sea, with extensive pastures in the rear for their cattle. On this point of land, jutting into the lough, and forming a fertile peninsula nearly surrounded by every tide, Raymond Savage, one of the followers of De Courcy, in 1196 erected a strong castle, which became the chief residence of that family, who throughout the whole of the insurrection remained firmly attached to the English monarchs. In 1567, Shane O'Nial, who had overrun and destroyed the neighbouring country on every side, besieged this castle, but was so vigorously repulsed that he retreated with great loss and never penetrated further southward into the Ardes. The parish comprises 4800½ statute acres, of which 169 are islands, and 114 are covered with water. The LIVING was originally a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Down, and the rectory formed part of the union of Inch and the corps of the prebend of St. Andrew's in the cathedral of Down; but the Ecclesiastical Commissioners having recommended the dissolution of the union, Ardkeen and the northern part of Witter were constituted a distinct rectory, in the patronage of the Bishop, in 1834, by consent of the prebendary, and the perpetual curate was made rector: the tithe rent-charge is £348. 14. The church is situated on the peninsula, and at the extreme western boundary of the parish; it is a small ancient edifice, and contains several monuments to the family of Savage, its original founders. The glebe-house was built at an expense of £500, of which £450 were a gift and £50 a loan from the Board of First Fruits, in 1816; the glebe comprises 13 Cunningham acres, valued at £1 per acre, and subject to a rent of £4 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is included within the districts of Upper and Lower Ardes: the chapel, at Lisbawn, is connected with that of Ballygelgat, in the parish of Witter. The only remains of the castle are the foundations; the fosses are tolerably perfect, and some of the gardens and orchards may be traced.

ARDKILL, a parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, barony of CARRBERY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (E.) from Edenderry, on the road from Mullingar to Naas and Kildare; containing 1214 inhabitants. It comprises 5848½ acres, and is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, wholly impropriate in the Marquess of Downshire: the tithe rent-charge is £126. 13. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ardkill forms part of the union of Carberry. At Dinara is a school under the patronage of Viscount Harborton.

ARDMAYLE, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (N.) from Cashel; containing 1757 inhabitants. This appears to have been formerly a place of some importance; in many parts foundations of old houses have been discovered, and there are also remains of several castles. Of the latter, the castle of Sinone, consisting of a circular tower, is the most ancient. It is called in the Irish language Farrin-a-Urrigh; and it is said that many of Strongbow's forces, on their retreat from Cashel, were slain and interred here: human bones are frequently dug up near the spot, and within the last few years a very large helmet was discovered. The castle at Castle-moyle, at present consisting only of a square tower, was anciently the residence of the Butlers, and subsequently of the Cootes. Cromwell is said to have attacked it, and after gaining possession, to have hanged the proprietor; it still retains vestiges of its original extent, and appears to have been handsomely built. There are also some remains of a castle near the bridge. The parish is situated near the main road from Cashel to Thurles, and on the river Suir, over which is a bridge of stone; it comprises 4941 statute acres. The land is principally under an improved system of tillage; there is neither bog nor waste. Limestone abounds, and is quarried for building, and for burning into lime. Here is a station of the constabulary police. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Rev. W. Sutton and the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Cashel: the tithe rent-charge is £234. 7., the whole payable to the impropricators, who allow the perpetual curate a stipend of £27. 14., to which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners add £64. 12. The church, with the exception of the old tower, crowned by an embattled turret, was rebuilt in 1814, by aid of a gift of £800 and a loan of £150 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was erected in 1822, by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the same Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district called Bohirlahan, comprising Ardmayle and Ballysheehan, each of which has a chapel; the chapel for Ardmayle is situated at Bohirlahan.

ARDMILLAN, a village, in the parish of TULLYNAKILL, union of NEWTOWN-ARDES, barony of LOWER CASTLEREAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, ½ a mile (N. E.) from Killynchy; containing 108 inhabitants. It is situated on the shore of Lough Strangford, and occupies an area of ten acres.

ARDMORE, a parish, in the union of DUNGAN-NON, barony of DECIES-WITHIN-DRUM, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Youghal; containing 8737 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the bay of Ardmore in St. George's Channel, derived its name, signifying "a great promontory or eminence," from the Drumfheen mountain, an extensive and elevated range forming its northern barrier, and of which Slieve Grine constitutes a very considerable portion. In the infancy of Christianity in Ireland, St. Declan, a native of this country and a member of the tribe of the Decii, founded a religious establishment here, which became a see, over which he was confirmed bishop by St. Patrick in 448. Ardmore continued to flourish as a separate bishopric under a succession of prelates, of whom the next after the founder was St. Ultan, till the time of the English invasion, soon after which it was incorporated with the diocese of Lismore.

The parish includes the principal portion of the barony, and comprises 24,915 statute acres: the mountainous portion affords tolerable pasturage, and is well stocked with black-cattle; while the lands between the mountains and the sea are fertile, and in a good state of cultivation. Ballyquin, the seat of Sir Robert Pultney, Bart., is a handsome modern residence pleasantly situated on the north side of the bay, and commanding a fine view. Ardo is a castellated mansion about a mile from the village, near the sea, and also commanding an extensive and interesting prospect. Loscaine, an extremely neat modern residence, is at the eastern verge of the parish, adjoining the public road from Dungarvan to Youghal by way of Ring. Glenanna Cottage, a marine residence, is near Ballymacart; Glencorran, on the north-east shore of the bay; and Dufcarrig, an Elizabethan mansion, beautifully situated to the south of the village. By the line of road just mentioned, and which was made within the last few years, from Dungarvan through Ring to Youghal, the distance to the Ferry point is 17 miles: its construction has given a great impulse to agricultural improvement, by providing a convenient outlet for the produce of the district. It intersects the parish from N. E. to S. W.; and another road, in a N. W. direction, commencing at the upper bridge of Killongford, passes through the townlands of Ballyharrahan and Killongford, and over Slieve Grine mountain, and is shorter, by 2½ miles, than the old road: the mountain is principally the property of Lord Stuart of Decies. The village, which is rapidly improving, is situated on the shore of the bay, which is open to the east and protected on the south by Ardmore Head; the beach is of great extent and smoothness, and there is an interesting view of St. George's Channel. Its situation, and the beauty of the surrounding scenery, make it a desirable place of resort for sea-bathing; and several additional houses and bathing lodges have been lately built. Copper and lead mines were formerly worked, and, from the specimens still found, the ores appear to have been of rich quality. At Minehead, so called from the adjacent works, and also near the village, iron-ore of very good quality was procured. There is a receiving-house for letters to and from Dungarvan; petty-sessions are held; and a constabulary police force, and one of the coast-guard stations of the district of Youghal, have been established here.

The LIVING is a vicarage, with that of Ballymacart united, in the diocese of Lismore, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory constitutes the corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of Lismore. The tithe rent-charge of Ardmore is £487, of which £325 are payable to the precentor, and £162 to the vicar; and the gross vicarial rent-charge of the benefice is £193. The church and glebe-house are annexed to the vicarage: the glebe belonging to the precentor consists of the lands of Ardocharty, in this parish, comprising 140 acres, and 48½ a. in the parish of Lismore; the vicarial glebe comprises 12 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district comprising the parishes of Ardmore, Ballymacart, and Lisginan, in each of which is a chapel; the chapel of Ardmore is situated in the village, and is a commodious edifice of rather recent erection. Some remains exist of the ancient church, consisting chiefly of the chancel, part of which, till the erection of the present edifice, was used as the parish church; it was a fine building, richly decorated with sculpture, and still displays traces of magnificence. To the south-east of the church is a small, low, and plain building, called the Dormitory of St. Declan, and held in great veneration by the inhabitants; it was repaired and roofed about a century since by Bishop Mills. In the churchyard is one of the round towers, a fine specimen of those monuments of remote antiquity. Near Ardmore Head are some slight remains of an ancient church, but in a state of such dilapidation that few traces either of its original architecture or embellishment can be distinguished. Near it is St. Declan's well, which, like the Dormitory, is held in veneration by the people of the neighbourhood; and on the beach is St. Declan's stone, resting on a ledge of rock by which it is raised a little from the ground; on July 24th, the festival of the saint, numbers of people assemble here for devotional purposes. Several circular intrenchments may be traced in various parts of the parish. Near Ardmore Head is a large and curious cavern, called the "Parlour;" and on the coast, which is precipitously rocky, are several other caverns.

ARDMORE, county ARMAGH.—See MOYNTAGHS.

ARDMOY.—See ARMOY.

ARDMULCHAN, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of SKREEN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N.E.) from Navan; containing 1038 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the high road from Navan to Drogheda, and the new road from Trim to Duleek runs through the southern part of it: its northern part is intersected by the Boyne navigation. It comprises 3582½ statute acres: about two-thirds are under tillage, and the remainder is good grazing land; there is no waste or bog. Limestone abounds, and there is a quarry of stone for building. The parish is in the diocese of Meath, and the rectory forms part of the union of Painstown: the tithe rent-charge is £190. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ardmulchan is part of the district of Black Lion or Painstown. There is a free school for boys and girls at Hayes, under the patronage of R. Bourke, Esq., who built the school-house, gave an acre of land rent-free, and allows the sum of £24 per annum for its support; the girls' school is principally supported by Mrs. Bourke.—See PAINSTOWN.

ARDNACRUSHA, a village, in that part of the parish of St. PATRICK in the barony of LOWER BUNRATTY, union of LIMERICK, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Limerick; containing 136 inhabitants. It is situated near the Shannon, and on the road from Limerick to O'Brien's Bridge.

ARDNAGEEHY, a parish, in the union of FERNOW, barony of BARRYMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S.W.) from Rathcormac, on the mail-coach road from Cork to that place; containing 4798 inhabitants. It comprises 16,335 statute acres. The Nagle mountains and Leppers Hill form a tract of nearly 6000 acres, and on the south side of the river Bride are almost 2000 acres of waste: these lands are generally rough pasture, affording but a very scanty supply of herbage for cattle. Of the land under cultivation, the greater portion is in tillage; and the system of agriculture is improving. There are about 400 acres of bog, but it is not worked. The substratum of the soil is clay-slate; a coarse heavy kind of slate is quarried for roofing, and flag-stones are found in abundance, but neither the slate nor stone is wrought to any extent. There are several large and handsome houses in the parish. A small paper-mill is in operation at Glenville, where fairs for cattle, sheep, and pigs are held on the 4th of May and the 3rd of November: there are constabulary police stations at Glenville and Watergrass-hill, and petty-sessions are held at the latter place every alternate Tuesday. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £328. 17. The church is a neat edifice situated at Glenville, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £500 in 1798. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 40 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, sometimes called Watergrass-hill, which comprises the parishes of Ardnageehy and Ballynaultig, and parts of those of Dunhollogue and Kilkquane; there are chapels at Glenville and Watergrass-hill, both small plain buildings. About two miles to the south of the church are the ruins of the old parish church, romantically situated among the hills.

ARDNAREE, a suburb of the town of BALLINA, in that part of the parish of KILMOREMOY which is in the barony of TYRREAGH, union of BALLINA, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing 1699 inhabitants. This place is connected with Ballina by a bridge over the river Moy, and consists principally of one street, from which several lanes diverge; containing altogether 352 houses. In 1427 a monastery for Eremites of the order of St. Augustine was founded here, but by whom is not known; there are some slight remains, consisting of a beautiful arched doorway and several windows. The environs are remarkably pleasant, and a new bridge of four arches has been erected. Fairs are held on June 20th, Oct. 10th, and Dec. 13th; and here is a constabulary police station. The parish church, a plain edifice with a tower and spire, is situated in the village; and a Roman Catholic chapel, a handsome structure in the later English style, and ornamented with minarets, has been erected at an expense of £9000, since increased by the addition of a tower and spire: it is the cathedral of the Roman Catholic see of Killala, the bishop of which resides here.—See KILMOREMOY.

ARDNORCHER, otherwise HORSELEAP, a parish, in the union of TULLAMORE, partly in the barony of KILCOURSEY, KING'S county, but chiefly in that of MOYCASHIEL, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (W.N.W.) from Kilbeggan, on the river Brosna, and on the road from Dublin to Galway; containing 3687 inhabitants. It comprises 12,012½ statute acres: there is a considerable tract of bog, but no mountain or waste land. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, with the vicarages of Kilcumreagh and Rahue, and in the patronage of the Crown; the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Downshire. The tithe rent-charge of Ardnorcher is £245. 15. 5., of which £141. 16. 5. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; and the gross annual value of the five vicarages that once constituted the union of Ardnorcher, including glebe, was, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, £827. 0. 9., out of which the vicar paid the perpetual curate of Kilmanaghan and Kilbride-Langan £60, to which were added £40 from the augmentation fund. The church, to which a spire was added in 1822, is an ancient building in good repair; it stands on an eminence above the village of Horseleap. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £1150, in 1815, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 45 plantation acres, valued at £94 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district called Clara, comprising the parishes of Ardnorcher and Kilbride-Langan, in both of which are chapels; that of Ardnorcher is a large building in the village of Horseleap, erected in 1809. The lands of Moycashiel, which give name to the barony, are situated in this parish.

Anciently here were several castles, now mostly in ruins; that of Donour is still preserved in good repair by Sir Richard Nagle, Bart., and there is another at Bracea. The fort of Ardnorcher, or Ard-an-orchor, literally translated "the fort of slaughter," was one of the frontier forts of the English pale, and for some centuries past has been vulgarly called "Horseleap," on account of an extraordinary leap which is said to have been made into it over the drawbridge by an English knight, in escaping from a close pursuit. This ancient doon or moat formed a strong link in the chain of forts and castles constructed along that part of the county of Meath which was within the English pale, to protect the new settlers and check the inroads of the Irish. At Temple-Maccater are the remains of a monastery, said to have been founded in 440 by St. Kieran, and at Gageborough was a nunnery, founded by Matilda de Lacey in the 13th century: many coins have been dug up at the former place. A holy well, dedicated to St. David, was formerly much resorted to on the patron day, the 27th of June; but the custom has nearly fallen into disuse.

ARDOYNE, a district parish, in the unions of CARLOW and SHILLELAGH, partly in the barony of SHILLELAGH, county of WICKLOW, but chiefly in the baronies of FORTH and RATHVILL, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Tullow; containing 1791 inhabitants. It is pleasantly situated on the rivers Slaney and Dereen, and comprises 6577 statute acres, whereof about 650 are wood: the surface is diversified by hill and dale, and the soil is of good but light quality, and well adapted to the growth of oats and potatoes. In the vicinity are many gentlemen's seats. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the alternate patronage of the incumbents of Barragh and Fennagh, with a net income of £110, derived partly from rent-charge and partly from the patrons. A parsonage-house has been lately built through the exertions of Sir Thomas Butler, of Ballintemple, on a site of nearly two Irish acres, presented by Chief Justice Doherty. The church, erected in 1834-5, by aid of a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits, is a very neat, though plain and small, building; it is in the early English style, and the roof, in the interior, is enriched with tracery. There is a Roman Catholic chapel.

ARDPATRICK, a parish, in the union of BRUFF, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (S.E.) from Kilmallock; containing 101 inhabitants. An abbey is said to have been founded here by St. Patrick, and though no historical record exists, there is yet sufficient evidence that a religious house was established here in the earliest ages of Christianity. By an inquisition of the 39th of Elizabeth, it was found that the hill of Ardpatrick had been anciently granted to the corbeship founded in the church of Ardpatrick, a small sum out of the proceeds being paid annually to the bishop; and that the office of corbe had from time immemorial been continued by succession in the sept of the Lanegans, by one of whom it was then held. Near the confines of this townland is Sunville, the ancient residence of the Godsall family. The parish comprises 624 statute acres. In the ecclesiastical divisions it is unknown as a parish: in ancient records it was supposed to be part of that of Donoughmore, in the county of Clare, forming a portion of the estate belonging to the see, and held under lease from the Bishop, of Limerick; but for many years it has been united to the parish of Kilquane. The tithe rent-charge is £25. 5. 5. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ardpatrick forms part of the district of Kilfinnan; a large and handsome chapel has been erected at the foot of Ardpatrick hill. On the summit of this hill are the ruins of the monastery; and near the north-west angle are the remains of an ancient round tower, the greater portion of which fell down a few years since. Gold-ore has been found here; also the fossil remains of an elk, or moose deer.—See KILQUANE.

ARDQUIN.—See ARDGUIN.

ARDRAHAN, a parish and post-village, in the union of GORT, partly in the barony of KILTARTAN and partly in that of LOUGHREA, but chiefly in the barony of DUNKELLIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONAUGHT, 15 miles (S.E. by E.) from Galway, and 97 (W. by S.) from Dublin, on the road from Limerick to Galway; containing 4191 inhabitants. It comprises 14,997½ statute acres, a large portion of which is irremediable waste: at the eastern extremity of the parish is a range of peat mountain, which is profitable as affording pasture for numerous black-cattle. Flannel is rather extensively made by hand-spinning, a ready sale being found at Oranmore market, 12 miles distant. A constabulary police force is stationed here, and petty-sessions are held once a fortnight. The living is a vicarage with a portion of the rectory, and, with the rectory of Beagh, forms the union of Ardrahan, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Clanricarde. The tithe rent-charge of Ardahan is £347. 5., of which £63 are payable to the bishop, £17. 5. to the archdeacon, and the rest to the incumbent; the gross rent-charge of the union payable to the incumbent is £401. 9. 8. The church was erected in 1809, at an expense of £900, of which £400 were raised by parochial assessment, and £500 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits; but it was so indifferently built as to require a new roof, and has otherwise been repaired by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was erected by a gift of £400 and a loan of £400 from the Board; the glebe comprises 33 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and there is a chapel at Labane; divine service is also performed occasionally by the parish priest at Tyllira Castle. Here is a dispensary for Ardahan and Gort. Along the mountain's side are several mineral springs, and strong indications of iron-ore.

ARDREVAN, county of CARLOW.—See FENNAGH.

ARDRIE, LITTLE, a parish, in the poor-law union of ATHY, barony of KILKEA and MOONE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (S. by E.) from Athy; containing 205 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the road from Athy to Carlow, and comprises 323 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, anciently belonged to the monastery of St. Thomas, near Dublin, and was assigned to the precentorship in the cathedral church of St. Patrick, Dublin, on the institution of that dignity in 1219. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Dublin, partly appropriate to the precentorship, partly inappropriate in Michael Gould Adams, Esq., and partly forming a portion of the union of St. Michael's, Athy. The tithe rent-charge is £18, of which £12 are payable to the impropror, and £6 to the incumbent of St. Michael's; the portion appropriated to the precentorship is 154s. 2r. 8p., let on lease at an annual rent of £12.

ARDRISTIN, a parish, in the union of TULLOW, barony of RATHVILL, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W. by W.) from Tullow, on the road to Clonegal; containing 598 inhabitants. It comprises 1571 statute acres; and within its limits is a part of the suburbs of the town of Tullow, called the Green and Tullow-beg. Except one townland entirely surrounded by the parish of Aghade, it is bounded on the east and south-east by the river Slaney. More than one-half of its surface consists of meadow and pasture land; the rest, with the exception of a small tract of bog, is arable. The living is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £108. 15. The ruins of the church, situated on the townland of Ardristin, are divided by a pointed arch, and are 63 feet in length. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Tullow.

ARDSALLAGH, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of LOWER NAVAN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Navan; containing 341 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the river Boyne, and comprises 1788 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres: the prevailing substratum is limestone. The banks of the river are adorned with the mansion and demesne of Ardsallagh, the property of Earl Ludlow, whose ancestor, in 1755, was raised to the peerage of Ireland by the title of Baron Ludlow of Ardsallagh, and in 1760 advanced to the dignities of Viscount Preston of Ardsallagh, and Earl Ludlow. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and forms part of the union of Navan: the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions also, Ardsallagh is included in the union or district of Navan. There are some remains of the walls of the old church, with a burial-ground attached. According to Archdall, St. Finian of Clonard founded a monastery here near the river; but no vestiges can be traced.

ARDSALLIS, a village, in the parish of TOMFINLOUGH, union of ENNIS, barony of BUNRATTY, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Six-mile-bridge, on the road from Newmarket-on-Fergus to Quin. Nearly adjoining it is a good race-course, which was formerly much frequented; but the races have been for many years discontinued. Fairs are held on the 12th of May and the 12th of August, chiefly for cattle, and were at one period well attended.

ARDSKEAGH, a parish, in the union of MALLOW, barony of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Charleville; containing 280 inhabitants. This parish, called also Ardskeagh, comprises 1929 statute acres. The land under tillage is tolerably fertile, but a large portion of the parish is mountain pasture; the system of agriculture is gradually improving. The living, hitherto a rectory, has been suspended under the provisions of the Church Temporalities act; it is in the diocese of Cloyne, and now in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: the tithe rent-charge is £66. 9. There is neither church nor glebe-house; the occasional duties are performed by the clergyman of an adjoining parish. The glebe comprises four acres, near the site of the old church, some remains of which still exist in the burial-ground. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Charleville, but chiefly in that of Ballyhea.

ARDSTRAW, or ARDSRATH, a parish, in the union of STRABANE, partly in the barony of OMAGH, but chiefly in that of STRABANE, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Newtown-Stewart, 17,384 inhabitants. This place was distinguished, under the name of Ardsrath, as the seat of an ancient bishopric, over which St. Eugene, or Oen, presided about the year 540. At a very early period a small stone church or chapel existed here; and the names are recorded of several bishops who presided over the see, which, in 597, was removed to Maghera, and finally to Derry, in 1158. The place suffered repeatedly by fire, and appears to have been destroyed about the close of the twelfth century. The parish is situated on the road from Dublin to Londonderry, and comprises 44,974 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which 537 $\frac{1}{2}$ are covered with water. The surface is pleasingly diversified with hill and dale, and enlivened by the rivers Struell, Glueully, and Derg, which, after flowing through the parish, unite in forming the river Morne, which abounds with trout and salmon; there are also several large and beautiful lakes, three of which are within the demesne of Baron's Court. The land is chiefly arable, with pasture intermixed; and the soil in the valleys is fertile; but there are considerable tracts of mountain, and some extensive bogs. Limestone is found in several places at the base of the mountain called Bessy Bell, the whole of the upper portion of which is clay-slate; on the summit of another mountain, called Mary Gray, it is found with clay-slate at the base; and round the southern base of the former are detached blocks of freestone scattered in every direction. There are also some quarries of limestone at Cavandaragh; the stone is raised in blocks, or laminae, from a quarter of an inch to three feet in thickness. The mountains within or forming a portion of the boundary of the parish are, Bessy Bell, Douglas, and Mary Gray, the first rising 1386 feet above the level of the sea; they all present beautiful and romantic scenery, particularly in the neighbourhood of Newtown-Stewart; and the view from the high grounds generally, including the lakes and rivers by which the parish is diversified, is truly picturesque. There are five bridges; one at Moyle, of three elliptic arches; a very ancient bridge at Newtown-Stewart, of six arches; another of six arches at Ardstraw; and a modern bridge of three arches on the Derry road. The principal seat is Baron's Court, the residence of the Marquess of Abercorn. There were formerly several bleach-grounds in the parish, but at present there is only one in operation, which is at Spa Mount, on the river Derg.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £830. 10. The church is a large and beautiful edifice with a handsome spire, and is situated in the town of Newtown-Stewart; a grant of £478 for its repair was lately made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. A new church, or chapel of ease, has been built at Baron's Court, or Magheracreegan, for which the late Baron of First Fruits granted £600. The glebe-house, built about a century ago, has a glebe of 682 acres attached to it, which, with the exception of 60 acres of unprofitable land, are in a state of cultivation. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, but is divided into East and West Ardstraw: the chapels are at Newtown-Stewart, Dragish, and Cairncorn. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, at Ardstraw, Newtown-Stewart, Douglas-Bridge, Clady, Garvetagh, and Drumlagh; a meeting-house for Primitive Methodists; and two for Wesleyan Methodists. Of the numerous interesting remains of antiquity in the parish, the most ancient are those of the monastery and cathedral of Ardara, near the village. They consist chiefly of the foundations of that part of the building which was formerly used as the parish church, the remains of some very beautiful crosses of elaborate workmanship, and several upright stones and columns richly fluted; but the churchyard, which was very extensive, has been contracted by the passing of the public road, in the formation of which many remains of antiquity were destroyed. Nearly adjoining is a ruin which tradition points out as the bishop's palace, and which was occupied as an inn when the Dublin road passed this way. About three miles above Ardstraw-Bridge, and situated on a gentle eminence, are the picturesque ruins of Scarvaheen Abbey, founded by Turloch Mac Dolagh, in 1456, for Franciscan friars of the third order, and on its dissolution granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Henry Piers; and near Newtown-Stewart is the site of the priory of Pubble, which appears to have been an appendage to Scarvaheen, and was granted at the same time to Sir Henry Piers: of the latter, nothing but the cemetery remains. In Newtown-Stewart are the extensive and beautiful remains of the castle built by Sir Robert Newcomen, in 1619; it is in the Elizabethan style, with gables and clustered chimneys. James II. lodged in this castle, on his return from Lifford in 1689, and by his orders it was dismantled on the day following: with the exception of the roof, it is nearly perfect. At the foot of the mountain of Bessy Bell are the ruins of an ancient building called Harry Ouer's Castle, concerning which some remarkable legends are preserved by the country people; they consist of two circular towers, with a gateway between them, and some side walls, which overhang their base more than eight feet. Near the end of the bridge at Newtown-Stewart is a large mound of earth, evidently thrown up to protect the ford, which in early times must have been of importance as the only pass through the vast range of the Munsterlony mountains. There was a similar fort on the ford of Glenelly, near Moyle Castle, and another at the old ford at the village of Ardstraw. On the summit of Bessy Bell, or Boase-Baal, on which, in pagan times, sacrifice is supposed to have been offered to Baal or Bel, is a large and curious cairn: there are also cairns on the summit of Mary Gray, 826 feet above the level of the sea; and more than thirty forts in the parish, nearly in a line from east to west, and which were designed to guard the passes on the rivers of Glenelly and Derg. About a mile below Newtown-Stewart, in the bed of the river, is a single upright stone, called the "Giant's Finger," and lately "Flinn's rock," respecting which many strange traditions are preserved in the neighbourhood.—See NEWTOWN-STEWART.

ARDSTRAW-BRIDGE, a village, in the parish of ARDSTRAW, union of STRABANE, barony of STRABANE, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Newtown-Stewart; containing 134 inhabitants. This place, formerly Ardstrath, is of high antiquity, and was distinguished for its greatly celebrated abbey, noticed in the preceding description of the parish of Ardstraw. The village is situated on the river Derg, which is here wide and rapid, and is crossed by an ancient stone bridge of six arches, over which the old road from Londonderry to Dublin passed: it contains 28 houses, some of which are well built, but several of them are old and in a neglected state. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly.

ARDTRAMONT.—See ARTRAMONT.

ARDTREA, or ARTRAE, a parish, in the unions of COOKSTOWN and MONEYMORE, partly in the barony of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and partly in the barony of LOUGHINSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the district or perpetual curacy of Woods-chapel, and the greater part of the market-town of Moneymore, 13,046 inhabitants. During the rebellion of the Earl of Tyrone, in the reign of Elizabeth, this place was the scene of numerous conflicts; and in the parliamentary war, in 1641, it was also involved in many military transactions. In 1688-9, a sanguinary battle occurred here between the adherents of James II., who were in possession of the forts of Charlemont and Mountjoy, and the forces of William III., commanded by Lord Blayney, who, having possession of Armagh, was desirous of assisting the garrisons of Enniskillen and Derry, and for this purpose determined to force a passage to Coleraine, which he accomplished, after defeating a detachment of the enemy's forces at the bridge of Ardtrae. The PARISH, which is also called Ardtragh, is situated partly on Lough Beg, but chiefly on Lough Neagh; and is intersected by the Ballinderry river, and by numerous roads, the principal of which are those leading respectively from Armagh to Coleraine, from Omagh to Belfast, and from Stewartstown to Moneymore. It contains 20,962½ statute acres, of which 18,679½ are in the county of Londonderry, the latter number including 2181½ in Lough Neagh, 317½ in Lough Beg, and 26½ in the river Bann. The soil is very various; the land is chiefly arable, and is fertile and well cultivated, especially around Moneymore on the estate belonging to the Drapers' Company, and on that belonging to the Salters' Company round Ballyronan. There are several extensive tracts of bog, amounting in the whole to nearly 3000 acres, and affording an ample supply of fuel. Freestone, of every variety both of colour and quality, is found here in abundance; and there is plenty of limestone. At a short distance from the church, on the road to Cookstown, is an extraordinary whin-dyke, which rises near Ballycastle in the county of Antrim, passes under Lough Neagh, and on emerging thence near Stewart Hall, passes through this parish, and into the mountain of Slievegallon, near Moneymore. Spring Hill is an elegant and antique mansion, situated in a rich and highly improved demesne, embellished with some of the finest timber in the country. The farmhouses are generally large and well built; and most of the farmers, in addition to their agricultural pursuits, carry on the weaving of linen-cloth for the adjacent markets. There is an extensive bleach-green, which, after having been discontinued for some years, has been repaired and is now in operation. The Primate's court for the manor of Ardtrae is held at Cookstown monthly, for the recovery of debts under £5; its jurisdiction extends over such lands in the parishes of Lissan, Derryloran, Kildress, Arboe, Desertcreight, Ardtrae, Clonoe, Tamlaght, Ballinderry, and Donaghendrie, as are held under the see.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £553. 17. The church, an elegant edifice in the later English style, was erected in 1830, by a loan of £1200 from the late Board of First Fruits: it stands near the site of the ancient church; the principal entrance is a composition of very tasteful design, and, from its elevated site, the church forms a pleasing object in the landscape. The glebe-house is a large and handsome residence, built in 1810, of hewn freestone, by Dr. Elrington, then rector of the parish and subsequently Bishop of Ferns, aided by a gift of £100, and a loan of £1050, from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises 184½ acres. The district church called Woods-chapel is situated at a distance of ten miles from the mother church: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rector. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called Moneymore, which comprises this parish and part of that of Desertlyn, and contains three chapels, one at Moneymore, one at Bally-nenagh, and the third at Derrygaroe. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians at Moneymore, one built by the Drapers' Company at an expense of £4000, and the other built by subscription on a site given by the company, who also contributed £250 towards its erection. An ancient urn very elaborately ornamented was found in a kistvaen, on opening a tumulus in the townland of Knockarron, in 1800.—See MONEYMORE and WOODS-CHAPEL.

ARIGNA.—See County of ROSCOMMON, and also KILRONAN.

ARKLOW, a sea-port, market and post town, and a parish, in the union of RATHDRUM, barony of ARKLOW, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 12 miles (S.) from Wicklow, and 40 miles (S. by E.) from Dublin; containing 6237 inhabitants, of whom 3254 are in the town. This place, formerly called Arclagh and Alercomshed, appears to have been occupied as a fishing-station from time immemorial. It was included in one of those grants of territory for which Henry II., in 1172, caused service to be done at Wexford; and by an original charter, preserved among the rolls of Kilkenny Castle, it appears that John, Lord of Ireland, confirmed the castle and town of Arclagh, with all their appurtenances, to Theobald Fitzwalter, hereditary lord-butler of Ireland. Fitzwalter founded here a monastery, which he dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, for monks of the Cistercian order, whom he brought from the abbey of Furness, in Lancashire. The barony, which with the chief butlery always descended to the next heir male, was inherited by Theobald, the third of that name, who died here on the 26th of September, 1285, and was buried in the abbey church, under a tomb ornamented with his effigy. In 1281, a battle was fought near this place between the English and the Irish, in which the latter were totally defeated by Stephen de Fulborne, Bishop of Waterford and Lord Justiciary of Ireland; and in 1316, the O'Tooles and O'Byrnes, who had risen in arms and burnt Arklow, Bray, and Newcastle, with all the neighbouring villages, were defeated on the 16th of April by Edward le Boteler. In 1331, the castle was taken by the O'Tooles, but was retaken by Lord de Birmingham; and in the year following it was again seized by the Irish, who were finally repulsed by Sir Anthony Lucy, who repaired the fortifications and strengthened the garrison. In 1641, the castle was surprised by a party of insurgents, and the garrison put to the sword: being afterwards held for the royalists, it was, in 1649, assaulted by Oliver Cromwell in his victorious march southward, and on its surrender was totally demolished. During the disturbances of 1798, a battle was fought near Arklow bridge, between the king's troops under the command of Gen. Needham, and the insurgents, in which the latter were defeated and their leader shot; among the slain on the side of the royal forces was Thomas Grogan Knox, Esq., of Castletown, cornet of the 5th dragoon guards, to whose memory a neat marble tablet has been placed in the church.

The town is situated on the acclivity of a hill extending along the right bank of the river Ovoca, and on the mail-coach road from Dublin to Wexford. The Ovoca, after winding through the beautiful and romantic vale to which it gives name, passes under a bridge of nineteen arches at this place, and discharges itself into the sea, about 500 yards below the town. Arklow is divided into the Upper and Lower Towns, which latter is called the "Fishery;" and in 1841 it contained 538 houses. The houses in the Upper Town, which consists of one principal street, are neatly built; several of those in the Lower Town, which is chiefly inhabited by fishermen, are slated, but the dwellings are mostly thatched cabins. The inhabitants are amply supplied with water from numerous excellent springs, but no works have been established to convey it to their houses; the principal street has been macadamised, and foot-pavements have been laid down. An exceedingly handsome court-house, in which the quarter and petty sessions are held, has been erected, and the old houses around it having been thrown down and the ground cleared, it adds much to the appearance of the town. On the site of the ancient castle are barracks for two companies of foot. Extensive works are now in progress here: a massive stone wall and an embankment have been commenced at the north side of the river from the bridge to the sea, to confine the stream, and cause it to pass in a straight course into the sea, and thus deepen the water and do away with the present bar, which impedes the entrance of boats. These works are being carried on by the Mining Company, under the provisions of an old act of parliament. Henry Hodgson, Esq., too, a mining proprietor, has at his own expense constructed a wooden wharf far out into the sea, for shipping his copper and sulphur ore. The exports of Arklow consist chiefly of copper and sulphur ore, vast quantities of which are shipped throughout the year; the imports are chiefly coal. The principal trade, besides, is the fishery, which was formerly very lucrative, having two seasons in the year; one in May, which has lately ceased; and the other in November, which though still continued, has become so unproductive as scarcely to remunerate the persons engaged in it. The fishery, in 1835, employed about 200 boats in the herring-fishery, and in dredging for oysters, of the latter of which great quantities are taken off the coast in some years, and sent to different parts of Ireland, and to England. The want of a safe harbour where the fishermen may take refuge during bad weather, which for two or three seasons has prevailed on this coast, has been severely felt, there being no port between Kingstown and Waterford into which they can run for shelter; and many lives are annually lost. The harbour is at present accessible only for small boats, as the passage is sinuous and subject to shifting sands. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on Jan. 11th, March 22nd, April 19th, May 14th, June 28th, Aug. 9th, Sept. 25th, and Nov. 15th, chiefly for the sale of woollen-cloth, cattle, sheep, and pigs. In the excise arrangements, the town is within the district of Wexford. A constabulary police station has been established here; and on the north side of the river, in the parish of Kilbride, is a coast-guard station belonging to the Gorey district. The petty-sessions for the barony of Arklow are held every Thursday: the lower part of the court-house is appropriated to the use of a savings' bank.

The PARISH, which is situated at the south-eastern extremity of the county, and intersected by the river Ovoca, comprises 8126 statute acres. The surface is broken, abrupt, and mountainous; the soil towards the coast, and in the inlets between the hills, is rich, and abounds with excellent marl, which, together with lime, is used for manure. The system of agriculture has been greatly improved, under the auspices of the Agricultural Society; drill husbandry is practised where the soil will admit of it, and green crops have been partially introduced. The mountain of Croghan Kinshela, towards the close of the last century, became an object of intense interest from its supposed production of native gold. A peasant fishing in one of the streams which descended from it discovered, at different times, small particles of gold, which for about 12 years he continued to sell privately to a goldsmith, till, in September, 1796, the discovery became known, and thousands of persons engaged in the search for this precious metal. Several masses of extraordinary size were found, one of which weighed nine, another eighteen, and a third twenty-two ounces; and so great was the number of the peasantry allured to the spot by the hope of enriching themselves, that in the short space of six or seven weeks, during which the washing of the sands was continued, not less than 2666 ounces of pure gold were obtained, which were sold for £10,000. After the people had continued their searches for a little more than six weeks, government took possession of the mine, and stationed a party of the Kildare militia to prevent further encroachment; an act of parliament was passed for working it, and Messrs. Weaver, Mills, and King were appointed directors of the operations. Stream-works were established on several rivulets which descended from the mountain; and from this time till May, 1798, when the works were destroyed in the insurrection of that disturbed period, the total quantity of gold found was, 944 oz., 4 dwts., and 15 grs., which was sold for £3675. 8. In 1801 mining operations were resumed, and on the representation of the directors, government was induced to extend the search upon a more systematic principle. The stream-works were continued to the heads of the several streams, and the solid mass of the mountain was more minutely examined, by cutting trenches in every direction down to the firm rock. The veins already known, and such as were afterwards discovered by the process of trenching, were more extensively explored, and their depth accurately ascertained, by means of a gallery, or level, driven into the mountain at right angles to the general range of their direction. The mineral substances thus obtained were subjected to a rigid chymical analysis, but in no instance was a single particle of gold discovered; the result of these operations convinced government that no gold existed as an inherent ingredient in any of the veins which traversed the mountain, and the works were consequently abandoned.

The environs of Arklow are much admired for the beauty, richness, and variety of their scenery; the banks of the Ovoca are embellished with handsome seats, and the sides of the vale with woods of luxuriant growth. Shelton Abbey, the seat of the Earl of Wicklow, though in the parish of Kilbride, forms a conspicuous and interesting feature in the scenery of this parish; it is beautifully situated on the north bank of the river, and at the base of a range of hills of gentle elevation, wooded with oak and birch. The mansion, which was remodelled some years since by the Messrs. Morrison, is a low quadrilateral edifice with two principal fronts, richly embellished with decorated pinnacles, and resembling an ecclesiastical structure of the 14th century, converted into a baronial residence at a subsequent period. The entrance-hall is wainscoted with carved oak, and the ceiling delicately enriched with fan tracery, the pendants of which are gilt; the great hall, gallery, and state apartments, are all of corresponding richness and elegance; the library contains an exceedingly valuable collection of works made by a learned member of the family; and the cloisters are in a style of appropriate beauty. The demesne, which comprises more than 1000 statute acres, is ornamented with stately beech and chestnut trees; and the whole forms one of the most delightful retreats in this romantic part of the country. During the temporary sequestration of the family estates at the time of the Revolution, James II., on his flight to Waterford, after the battle of the Boyne, was entertained at Shelton Abbey by the party then in possession; and there is still a road within the demesne which is called King James's road. Glenart, a castellated mansion belonging to the Earl of Carysfort, is situated on the south bank of the Orocra, nearly opposite to the abbey, on a gentle slope in a very retired spot; the high grounds command prospects of the sea, and of the richly wooded hills of Shelton Abbey and Bally-Arthur. Ballyrane is a handsome modern house, pleasantly situated within a mile of the town, of which it embraces a fine view. Lambarton is beautifully situated in the midst of plantations, and commands delightful views of the sea and of the demesnes of Shelton and Bally-Arthur, terminating in the magnificent range of mountains in the neighbourhood of Lugnaquilla. Emma Vale is about a mile to the south-west of the town; the house has been enlarged and improved; the plantations are tastefully laid out, and the prospect comprehends a fine view of Glenart woods and mansion, Bally-Arthur, and the distant part of Shelton demesne, with an extensive range of mountain scenery. Elton, about half a mile to the south, is a commodious house occupying a healthful situation.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, to which the greater portion of the rectory, which formerly belonged to the abbey of Woney, was united in the year 1673, subject to a reserved rent of £3. 12. The vicarage of Enorilly, the perpetual curacies of Killahurley, Kilbride, and Templemichael, and part of the rectory of Kilgorman, were also united to it, from time immemorial, till 1833, when they were, with the exception of Killahurley and Kilgorman, separated by act of council, and made a distinct benefice; leaving only Arklow and Killahurley, with part of Kilgorman, to constitute the vicarial union, which is in the patronage of the Archbishop. The other portion of the rectory is inappropriate in W. Johnson, and D. Howell, Esqrs. The title rent-charge of Arklow is £173. 1. 7., of which £34. 16. 6. are payable to the lay proprietors, and the remainder to the incumbent; the gross rent-charge of the union payable to the incumbent is £187. 16. 6. The church, situated in the principal street of the town, was erected in 1810, at an expense of £2000, of which sum £1100 were granted on loan by the Board of First Fruits; and in 1823 it was enlarged at an expense of £1200, defrayed by the same Board, in consideration of which aid the additional sittings are free. It was built after a design by Mr. Johnson, and is in the later English style, with a square tower. A grant of £249 was lately made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which comprehends the parishes of Arklow, Killahurley, and Ballintemple, in the county of Wicklow, and of Inch and Kilgorman in the county of Wexford. The chapel of Arklow is a handsome modern structure, situated opposite to the remains of the ancient castle; and there are chapels also at Johnstown, Castletown, and Ballycowgue. In the town is likewise a small place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A fever-hospital and dispensary was erected in 1821, at an expense of £550, of which sum £400 were presented by the grand jury, and the remainder was raised by subscription; it is a neat square building, in a healthy situation just without the town, and is supported equally by grand jury presentments and private subscriptions. The only relic of the ancient castle is a small fragment mantled with ivy, situated on an eminence above the river, and adjoining the barracks. The cemetery of the Cistercian abbey is still used as a burying-place, by the Roman Catholics. Arklow gave the title of Baron in the peerage of Ireland, by creation, to his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, and gives it by tenure to the noble family of Butler, Marquesses of Ormonde, the representative of which family is hereditary chief butler of Ireland, under a grant by Henry II., in 1177, to Theobald Walter, who accompanied that monarch in his first expedition into Ireland in 1172.

ARLES, a village, in that part of the parish of KILLEBAN which is in the barony of SLIEU-MARQUE, union of CARLOW, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (N.W. by N.) from Carlow; containing 231 inhabitants. This place, which contains about 50 houses, is situated on the road from Carlow to Maryborough. The manufacture of tiles, of excellent quality for roofing and flooring, and which were sent to Dublin and other places, where they were in much request, formerly prevailed here, but has been in a great degree superseded by the general use of slates, and is now nearly extinct; the manufacture of yarn and linen is carried on to a small extent. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in the village, belonging to the district of Killeban; and in the chapel-yard is a neat mausoleum belonging to the Grace family: the chapel is 21 feet in length and 16 feet in breadth, with a gabled roof terminating at each corner in crocketed pinnacles; it was erected in 1818, and the prevailing character is the later English.

ARMAGH (County of), an inland county, in the province of ULSTER, bounded on the north by Lough Neagh, on the east by the county of Down, on the south-east by that of Louth, on the south-west by Monaghan, and on the west and north-west by Tyrone. It is situated between 54° 3' and 54° 31' (N. Lat.), and between 6° 14' and 6° 45' (W. Lon.); and comprises 328,076 statute acres, of which 265,243 are arable land, 35,117 uncultivated, 8996 plantation, 778 under towns and villages, and the remainder water. The population in 1831 was 220,134, and in 1841 it amounted to 232,393. This tract is supposed to have been part of that named by Ptolemy as the territories of the Finderii and Voluntii: it afterwards constituted a portion of the district called Orgial, which also comprised the counties of Louth and Monaghan. The formation of this part of Ireland into a separate dominion is said to have taken place so early as the year 392, after the battle of Achoighleth-derg, in Fermanagh, in which, as recorded by Tigernach, abbot of Clonmacnois, who died in 1066, Fergus Feagha, son of Frochair the Brave, the last of the Ultonian kings who resided in Eamania, was killed by the three Collas, who then expelled the Ultonians from that part of the province to the south of Lough Neagh, and formed it into an independent state. To this state they gave the appellation of Orgial, afterwards corrupted into Oriel or Uriel, names by which Armagh was distinguished to the beginning of the seventeenth century.

The county was made shire ground, under its present name, in 1586, by the lord-deputy, Sir John Perrott, who, not relying with confidence on the vigilance and care of Henry O'Neil and Sir Henry Bagnell, to whom the government of Ulster had been entrusted, projected the division of the greater part of that province into seven counties, of which Armagh was one, taking its name from the chief town in it. For each of these counties he appointed sheriffs, commissioners of the peace, coroners, and other officers. Previously to this arrangement, the chief part of the property of the county had centered in the family of the O'Nials, the Mac Cahans, and the O'Hanlons. At the commencement of the seventeenth century, it was principally vested in those of Mac Henry, Acheson, O'Neil, Brownlow, and O'Hanlon, exclusively of the great territories settled on Moharty, which the Mac Cahans had forfeited in rebellion, and of a large tract of country called Oirthir, afterwards Orior, a district in the southern part, which escheated to the crown by rebellion of a branch of the O'Hanlons. According to a project for PLANTING, by JAMES I., the whole of the arable and pasture land, amounting to 77,580 acres, was to be allotted in 61 proportions of three classes of 2000, 1500, and 1000 acres each, among the English and Scottish undertakers, the servitors, and the Irish natives. A portion was also assigned to the primate; another for glebes for the incumbents, of whom there was to be one for each proportion; another for the four corporate towns of Armagh, Mountmorris, Charlemont, and Tanderagee; and a fourth for a free grammar school. The native Irish were to be distributed among a few of the several proportions, with the exception of the swordsmen, who were to migrate into waste lands in Connaught and Munster. The project, which was but partially effected, was not acted upon until 1609, when a royal commission was issued to inquire into the king's title to the escheated and forfeited lands in Ulster, with a view to the plantation there. Inquisitions were consequently held, the return of which for Armagh, made in August of the same year, states that the county was then divided into the five baronies of Armagh, Toaghshryny, Orior, Fuighes, and Onylane or O'Nealane, and enumerates with great particularity the names and tenures of the proprietors. In 1618, a second commission was issued to Captain Pynnar and others, to ascertain how far the settlers located there in the intervening period had fulfilled the terms of their agreement. It is somewhat remarkable that, although the inquisition names five baronies, three only are noticed in Pynnar's survey; those of Armagh and Toaghshryny being omitted, probably because they contained no forfeited property. The number of the proportions specified in the survey are but 23, eleven of which, situated in O'Neulan, were in the hands of English undertakers; five, in the Fuighes, were in those of Scottish undertakers; and seven in Orior had been allotted to servitors and natives. The number of tenants and men capable of bearing arms in the two first proportions amounted to 319 of the former, and 679 of the latter; the number in Orior is not given.

The county is partly in the diocese of Dromore, but chiefly in that of Armagh. For civil purposes it is now divided into the baronies of Armagh, Turaney, O'Neilland East, O'Neilland West, Upper Fews, Lower Fews, Upper Orior, and Lower Orior. It contains the city and borough of Armagh; part of the borough, seaport, and market-town of Newry, which is noticed more particularly under the head of the county of Down; the market and post towns of Lurgan, Portadown, Tanderagee, Market-hill, and Newtown-Hamilton; the disfranchised borough of Charlemont; the post-towns or post-villages of Richhill, Keady, Blackwatertown, Loughgall, Tynan, Forkhill, and Flurry-Bridge; and the market-towns of Middleton and Crossmaglen. Prior to the Union it sent six members to the Irish parliament, two for the county at large and two for each of the boroughs of Armagh and Charlemont; at present its representation consists of three members in the Imperial parliament, two for the county at large and one for the borough of Armagh. The election takes place at Armagh. The county is in the north-east circuit: the assizes are held at Armagh, where the county court-house and goal are situated; and quarter-sessions at Armagh, Lurgan, Market-hill, and Ballyhott, the three last of which have each a court-house and bridewell. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, vice-lieutenant, 14 deputy-lieutenants, and 50 other magistrates; besides whom there are the usual county officers, including three coroners. There are 25 constabulary police stations, having in the whole a force of a county inspector, 5 sub-inspectors, 6 head constables, 23 constables, and 116 sub-constables; maintained equally by grand jury presentments and by government. The amount of grand jury presentments, for 1844, was £24,327. The public charitable institutions are, a district lunatic asylum, the county infirmary, and a fever hospital, at Armagh; fever hospitals at Middleton and Tanderagee; and dispensaries at Crossmaglen, Forkhill, Market-hill, Jonesborough, Keady, Blackwatertown, Seagoe, Loughgall, Richhill, Lurgan, Newtown-Hamilton, Poyntz-Pass, Tynan, Portadown, Tanderagee, and Ballyhott, supported by equal grand jury presentments and private subscriptions. There are also dispensaries at Tanderagee, Portadown, and Tullyhappy, built and supported by the Earl and Countess of Mandeville; and the fever hospital at Middleton is supported by the trustees of Bishop Sterne's munificent bequest. In the military arrangements this county is within the Belfast district, of which Armagh is the head-quarters, where there are an ordnance-depot and an infantry barrack constructed to accommodate 12 officers, 174 men, and 5 horses; at Charlemont is a fort, with an artillery barrack for 5 officers, 151 men, and 79 horses, to which is attached an hospital for 22 patients.

The northern verge of the county, near Lough Neagh, the north-western adjoining Tyrone, and the neighbourhoods of Armagh, Market-hill, and Tanderagee, have a level surface; the remainder is hilly, rising in the southern parts into mountains of considerable elevation. The highest of these is Slieve Gallion, 1893 feet above the level of the sea; it is about seven miles from the southern border, and sinks on the east into the Fathom hills, which skirt the Newry water. One of the finest and most extensive prospects in Ulster is obtained from its summit, which commands the bay of Dnaldalk; and the bold and picturesque features of mountain scenery in the county are confined to this immediate vicinity, including the Dooberin mountains and the neighbourhood of Forkhill. Westward to the Fews the country exhibits a chain of abrupt hills, the greater part of which can never be reduced to a state of profitable cultivation: the Fews mountains are a subordinate range, lying in a direction from south-east to north-west. The fertility of the more level districts towards the eastern, northern, and north-western confines is very remarkable, especially as displayed in the views from Richhill, the numerous demesnes being sufficiently wooded to ornament the whole country, and the surface generally varied by pleasing undulations. From the shores of Lough Neagh, however, extend considerable tracts of low, marshy, and boggy land. The other lakes are few and small: that of Camlough, romantically situated on the northern verge of Slieve Gullion, is the largest. Longh Clay, in the western part of the county, which gives rise to one of the branches of the Callan river, is the next in size; but none of the lakes, except Lough Neagh, would be noticed for extent or beauty if situated in some of the neighbouring counties. A chain of small lakes occupying the south-western boundary of the county is valuable from the supply of water afforded by them to the mills in their neighbourhood. Coney Island, near the southern shore of Lough Neagh, and between the mouths of the Blackwater and Bann rivers, is the only island in the county; it is uninhabited. The climate is more genial than that of most of the other counties in Ulster, as is evinced by the greater forwardness of the harvests: this advantage has been attributed to the nature of the soil and subsoil, the gentle undulation of the surface, the general absence of moor or marshy land, and the protection by mountains from the cooling breezes of the sea.

The soil is usually very fertile, especially in the northern part, the surface of which is a rich brown loam, tolerably deep, on a substratum of clay or gravel. There is an abundance of limestone in the vicinity of Armagh, and in Kilmore and other places; and there are quarries near Lough Neagh, but the stone lies so deep, and they are subject to such a flow of water, that they are of little practical use. Towards Charlemont there is much bog, which yields red ashes, and is easily reclaimable; the substratum of this is a rich limestone. The eastern part of the county consists of a light friable soil. In the south the country is almost entirely rocky and barren: huge rocks of granite appear on the surface promiscuously mixed with blocks of limestone, as if thrown together by some convulsion of nature. All the limestone tracts make good tillage and meadow ground: the natural meadow found on the banks of the rivers, and formed of a very deep brown loam, yields great crops without manure. The hilly district is generally of a deep retentive soil on a gravelly but not calcareous substratum: a decayed freestone gravel, highly tinged with ferruginous ore, is partially found here: the subsoil is sometimes clay-slate. In these parts heath is peculiarly vigorous, except where the judicious application of lime has compelled it to give place to a more productive vegetation. Except near Newtown-Hamilton, there is but little bog among the hills. The valleys that lie between them have a rich and loamy soil, which yields much grain, and does not abound in aquatic plants, although the poa fluitans grows luxuriantly. The general inequality of surface which pervades the county affords great facilities for drainage.

In consequence of the dense population the FARMS are generally small, and much land is tilled with the spade. Wheat is a very common crop in the baronies of Armagh, the O'Neillands, and Turaney; the main crops in the other baronies are oats, flax, and potatoes. In the smaller farms potatoes constitute the first and second crops, sometimes even a third; and afterwards flax occupies a portion of the potato plot, and barley the remainder, if the soil be dry and fine, but if otherwise, crops of oats are taken in succession. The treatment of the wheat crop consists of one harrowing and one ploughing, to level the potato furrows; if two crops of potatoes have preceded, a small quantity of ashes is scattered over the surface. The seed most in use is the red Lammass wheat, and the quantity sown is about three bushels to the acre. Potato oats are commonly sown on the best lands; black oats, and sometimes white oats, on land manured with lime, in the mountainous districts: the last species, when sown on mountain land not previously manured and drained, will degenerate into a black grain in two or three seasons. Flax is invariably sown on potato ground, the plot being tilled with the spade, but not rolled: Dutch seed is sown on heavy soils, American on light soils. The seed is not saved, and therefore the plant is pulled just before it changes colour, from an opinion that when thus prepared it makes finer yarn. More seed was sown in 1835 than was ever before known, in consequence of the increased demand from the spinners in England and Ireland. The pasturage is abundant and nutritious; and though there are no extensive dairies, cows are kept by all the small farmers of the rich northern districts, whence much butter is sent to the Belfast market: a considerable quantity of butter, generally made up in small firkins, is also sent to Armagh and Newry for exportation. The state of agriculture in modern times has very much improved; gentlemen and large farmers have introduced all the improved agricultural implements, with the practice of drainage, irrigation, and rotation crops. Mangel-wurzel, turnips, clover, and all other green crops are now generally cultivated even upon the smallest farms, particularly around Market-hill, Tanderagee, Banagher, and other places, where the greatest encouragement is given by Lords Gosford, Mandeville, and Charlemont, and by Col. Close and other resident gentlemen, who have established farming societies and expend large sums annually in premiums.

The Durham, Hereford, North Devon, Leicester, Ayrshire, and other breeds of cattle have been introduced, and by judicious crosses a very superior stock has been raised; some farmers on good soils have also brought over the Alderney breed, which thrives remarkably well. In some of the mountain districts, however, the old long-horned breed of the country is still preferred, and a cross between it and the old Leicester appears to suit both soil and climate, as they grow to a large size, give great quantities of milk, and fatten rapidly. The breed of sheep and horses has also been greatly improved; the former kind of stock is chiefly in the possession of gentlemen and large farmers. The horses used in farming are mostly a light active kind; the best hunters and saddle horses are brought hither by dealers from other counties. Many herds of young cattle are reared on the Fews mountains, which are the only part of the county where grass-farms are extensive. Goats are numerous, and are allowed to graze at liberty in the mountainous districts. Hogs are fattened in great numbers; the gentry prefer the Chinese breed, but the Berkshire is preferred by the country people, as being equally prolific and more profitable. The number of farms of more than one acre each is 23,855, on which there was in 1841 a stock of 12,449 horses and mules, 35,235 horned cattle, 5042 sheep, 28,432 pigs, and 150,598 head of poultry; the whole of the estimated value of £382,000. Lime and dung are the general manures; the former is usually mixed with clay for the culture of potatoes, and is also applied to grass-lands as a surface dressing preparatory to tillage, sometimes even three years before the sod is broken, as being deemed more effective than manuring the broken ground; the average quantity of lime laid on an acre is from 30 to 40 barrels. Thorn hedges well kept are the common fences in the more fertile districts, and, with scattered timber-trees and numerous orchards, give them a rich woody appearance. In the mountainous district, too, similar fences are rising in every direction. Many parts of the county, particularly in the barony of Armagh, are decorated with both old and new timber; and in comparison with neighbouring districts it has a well-wooded appearance; but there are no extensive woodlands, although near Armagh is a large public nursery of forest-trees. There are 406 acres of oak plantation in the county, 19 ash, 10 elm, 17 beech, 212 fir, 5549 mixed timber, and 2783 fruit; besides 406,075 detached trees, equivalent to 2538 acres: total, 11,534 acres.

The GEOLOGICAL features of the county are various and interesting. The mountain of Slieve Gullion, in its south-eastern extremity, is an offset of the granite district of Down, and is remarkable for the varieties of which it is composed. It is in the form of a truncated cone, and presents on some sides mural precipices several hundred feet in height, from which it acquires an appearance of greater elevation than it really attains: the summit is flat, and on it is a lake of considerable extent. The granite of this mountain, particularly that procured near the summit, is frequently used for mill-stones, being extremely hard and fine-grained, and composed of quartz, felspar, mica, and hornblende. This, indeed, is in Armagh the common composition of this primitive rock, the felspar being grey, and the mica black. Sometimes the hornblende is absent, in which case the rock is found to be a pure granite; and in other instances it graduates into a beautiful sienite composed of flesh-coloured felspar and hornblende. Flesh-coloured veins of quartz are also found to variegate the granite, in a beautiful manner, in several places. On the south, towards Jonesborough, the sienite succeeds to the granite, and afterwards passes into porphyry, which is succeeded by silicious slate. The Newry mountains and the Fathom hills are granite. Around Camlough mica-slate is found in vast beds. Westward the granite district of Slieve Gullion extends to the bill above Larkinmill, on the western declivity of which the granite basis is covered by almost vertical strata, composed first of an aggregation of quartz and mica with steatite, which in the distance of about a quarter of a mile is occasionally interstratified with greenish grey clay-slate, of which the strata still further west are wholly composed. Several slate-quarries have been opened here, and partially worked, but none with spirit or skill; the principal are at Dorey, Newtown-Hamilton, Cregan-Duff, and in the vicinity of Crossmaglen. Further distant this clay-slate becomes greywacke-slate, by being interstratified with greywacke. In the neighbourhood of Market-hill the strata comprise hornblende-slate and greenstone-porphry. Sandstone is also connected with this district; there is a quarry of remarkably fine freestone at Grange; and on the surface of the southern confines is seen the intermixture of grit and limestone rocks already noticed. Trap rocks, forming a hard stone varying in hue between dark green and blue, here called whin, are found in various places in huge blocks and boulders or long narrow stones. The substratum of the eastern portion of the county varies between a silicious schistus and an argillaceous deposit, forming a greywacke district, which extends across to the western confines of the county. The west and middle of the county are limestone, which is generally white, except in the vicinity of the city of Armagh, where it assumes a red tinge, exhibiting that colour more distinctly as it approaches the town, improving also in quality, and increasing in the varieties of its shades. The minerals, as connected with metallurgy, are so few as scarcely to deserve notice, lead only excepted, a mine of which was worked in the vicinity of Keady, on a property held by the Earl of Farnham, under Dublin College; but after much expenditure the operations were discontinued in consequence of the loss incurred, which, however, has been attributed to the want of skilful or honest superintendence. Lead-ore has also been found near Market-hill, in several places near Newtown-Hamilton, on the demesne of Ballymoyer, in Slieve Cross, near Forkhill, near Hockley, and in the parish of Middleton. Some indications of iron, imperfect lead, regulus of manganese, and antimony, have been met with in a few spots. The other mineral substances are potters'-clay and a variety of ochres. Various kinds of timber, particularly oak, pine, and yew, have been raised out of the hogs; petrified wood is found on the shores of Lough Neagh; and fern, spleenwort, and mosses have been discovered in the heart of slaty stones.

The woollen trade flourished extensively in this county until interrupted by the legislative measures enacted by William III., and cloth of every description was manufactured. The linen manufacture is now pursued in all its branches, the finest goods being produced in the northern parts. The extent of the manufacture cannot easily be ascertained, because much comes in from the outskirts of the neighbouring counties, though the excess thus arising is probably counterbalanced by the goods sent out of Armagh to the markets in the adjoining counties. At the commencement of the present century, the value of its produce annually was estimated at £300,000, and at present it exceeds £500,000. Large capitals are employed by bleachers, who purchase linen and bleach it on their own account; the principal district is on the river Callan, at Keady. Considerable sums are also laid out in the purchase of yarn, which is given to the weaver to manufacture. Woollen goods are now made solely for home consumption, and in only small quantities. Manufactories for the necessities of life in greatest demand, such as candles, leather, soap, and beer, are numerous; and there are mills for dressing flax and spinning linen-yarn, and many large flour-mills.

The two principal RIVERS are, the Blackwater and the Bann, which chiefly flow along the north-western and north-eastern boundaries of the county, respectively. The former, which rises in Tyrone, joins the county near Caledon, at the junction of the counties of Monaghan, Armagh, and Tyrone, from which it flows in a wide and beautiful river, discharging itself into the western side of Lough Neagh. The Bann enters the county from the county of Down; passing Gifford in the west of Down, it joins the Newry canal, and flowing thence, falls into the southern part of Lough Neagh, at the Baan-foot ferry. The Newry water, or river, also enters the county from Down, and running a short distance in a narrow valley along the boundary of the county, below Newry enters the county of Louth in its course to the bay of Carlingford. The Callan has two sources in the centre of the county; one in Lough Anghnagurran, in the parish of Armaghbreagh; the other in Mullaghbrack. It runs northward; and being joined by the Butterwater and Whitewater streams from the Fews mountains, and winding by the western base of the eminence on which is the city of Armagh, it falls into the Blackwater near Moy. The Cusher rises near Baleek; it flows in a north-east and north course to the village of Clare, thence by the towns of Market-hill and Tanderagee, and falls into the Bann at its junction with the Newry canal. The Tall water rises between the villages of Riehill and Hamilton's-Bawn; passes through the parishes of Kilmore and Loughgall; and, changing due west towards Charlemont, joins the Callan near its union with the Blackwater. The Camlough, flowing from the lake of the same name, discharges itself into the Newry water. This last-named river, during its short course of five miles, supplies numerous bleach-works, and corn, flour, and flax mills: its falls are so rapid that the tail race of the higher mill forms the head water of the next lower. The Newtown-Hamilton river is joined by the Tara, and flows into Dundalk bay, into which also the Flurry or Fleury, and the Fane, empty themselves. The total number of main and branch streams is eighteen, and the combined lengths of all are 165 miles. The mouths of those which flow into Lough Neagh have a fine kind of salmon-trout, frequently 30lb. in weight: the common trout is abundant and large, as are also pike, eels, bream, and roach.

An inland navigation along the border of the counties of Armagh and Down, from a short distance south of Newry to Lough Neagh, by the aid of the Bann and the Newry water, was the first line of CANAL executed in Ireland. Commencing at the tideway at Fathom, it proceeds northward to Newry, and in this part of the line admits vessels drawing nine or ten feet of water, having at each end a sea lock. From Newry to the point where the Bann is navigable, a distance of fifteen miles, is a canal for barges of from 40 to 60 tons, chiefly fed from Lough Brickland and Lough Shark, in the county of Down. An extension from Fathom south-wards, and other improvements, are in progress. The river Bann, from its junction with the canal to Lough Neagh, a distance of eleven miles and a half, completes the navigation, opening a communication with Belfast by the Lagan navigation, and with the Tyrone collieries by the Coal-Island or Blackwater navigation. The chief trade on this canal arises from the import of bleaching materials, flax-seed, iron, timber, coal, and foreign produce, from Newry; and from the export of agricultural produce, yarn, linen, fire-bricks, pottery, &c. The canal from Lough Erne to Lough Neagh enters this county near Tynan, and passes by Caledon, Blackwatertown, and Charlemont to its junction with the river Blackwater above Verner's bridge, and finally with Lough Neagh. The railways are noticed under the heads of the towns where the termini are placed. The roads are generally well laid out, and many of them of late have been much improved.

Among the relics of ANTIQUITY are the remains of the fortress of Eamania, near Armagh, once the royal seat of the kings of Ulster. The Dunes' Caet is an extensive line of fortification in the south-eastern part of the county, and stretching into the county of Down. The tumulus said to mark the burial-place of "Nial of the hundred battles" is still visible on the banks of the Callan. The Vicar's Cairn, or Cairn-na-Managhan, is situated near the city of Armagh; Cairn Bann is in Orior barony, near Newry. A tumulus in Killeavy parish contains an artificial cavern. Two ancient brazen weapons have been dug up in a bog near Carrick, where a battle is said to have been fought in 941. Spears, also, battle-axes, skeneys, swords, the golden torques, and collars, rings, amulets, medals of gold, and various ornaments of silver, jet, and amber, have been found in different places, and are mostly preserved. Near Hamilton's Bawn, in 1816, was found the entire skeleton of an elk, the head and horns of which were placed in the hall of the Infirmary at Armagh; and in the same year the body of a trooper was discovered in a bog near Charlemont, the armour of which appeared to be of the reign of Elizabeth. The only religious houses, besides those of the city of Armagh, of which any memorial has been handed down to us, were, Clonfeacle, Killeavy or Kilsleeve, Kilmore, Stradhallissey, and Tahellan. The most remarkable military remains are, Tyrone's ditches near Poyntz-Pass, Navan fort, the castles of Criff-Keirn and Argonell, the castle in the pass of Moyrath, and Castle Roe.

The peasantry are in possession of superior comforts in their habitations as well as in food and clothing, which cannot be attributed solely to the linen manufacture, as their neighbours of the same trade in the adjoining counties of Cavan and Monaghan are far behind them in this respect. The county has within its limits sufficient fuel for domestic consumption; but coal is imported from England by the Newry canal, and from the county of Tyrone by the Blackwater. In no other county do the working classes consume so much animal food. The general diffusion of the population is neither the result of a pre-determined plan, nor of mere accident: it arises from the nature of the linen manufacture, which does not require those employed in it to be collected into overgrown cities, or congregated in crowded factories. Engaged alternately at their loom and in their farm, the people derive both health and recreation from the alternation. Green lawns, clear streams, pure springs, and the open atmosphere, are necessary for bleaching: hence it is that so many eminent bleachers reside in the country, and hence also the towns are small, and every hill and valley abounds with rural and comfortable habitations.

In the mountainous districts are several springs slightly impregnated with sulphur and iron. The borders of the bogs sometimes also exhibit ferruginous oozings, and one of these, in the Fewa mountains, is said to be useful in scrofulous complaints. The same effect was formerly attributed to the waters of Lough Neagh, in the north-western limits of this county; and Boate states, in addition to this, that the temperature of the sand at the bottom of the bay in which this sanative quality is perceived, alternates frequently between cold and warmth. A petrifying quality such as that said to exist in some parts of Lough Neagh, has been discovered at Rosebrook, near Armagh, the mansion-house of which was built, in a great measure, of petrifications raised from a small lake there. Petrified branches of hawthorn have been found near the city of Armagh; and fossil remains of several animals have been discovered in the limestone rocks in the same vicinity. Petrifications of the muscle, oyster, and leech, together with dendrites, belemnites, and madrepores, are also found; and in the mountain streams are pure quartz crystals, of which a valuable specimen has been found near Keady.

ARMAGH, a city, market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, partly in the barony of O'NEIL-LAND WEST, but chiefly in that of ARMAGH, county of ARMAGH (of which it is the capital), and province of ULSTER, 31 miles (S. W. by W.) from Belfast, and 65½ (N. N. W.) from Dublin; containing 12,654 inhabitants, of whom 10,345 are within the limits of the borough. The vast importance of this ancient city is noticed by several early historians, who describe it as the chief city in Ireland. St. Flech, who flourished in the sixth century, calls it the seat of empire; Giraldus Cambrensis, the metropolis; and even so lately as 1580, Cluverius styles it the head of the kingdom, adding that Dublin was then next in rank to it. The original name was Druim-sailech, "the bill of fallows," which was afterwards changed to Ardsailech, "the height of fallows," and, still later, to Ards-macha, either from Eamhuin-macha, the residence of the kings of Ulster, which stood in its vicinity, or, as is more probable, from its characteristic situation, Ards-macha signifying "the high place or field."

Armagh is the head of the primacy of all Ireland, and is indebted for its origin, and ecclesiastical pre-eminence, to St. Patrick, by whom it was built in 445. He also founded near his own abode, the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, which was rebuilt by Imar O'Hoedegan, and was the most distinguished of the religious establishments which existed here, materially contributing to the early importance of the place. This institution received numerous grants of endowment from the native kings, the last of whom, Roderick O'Connor, made a grant to its professors in 1169; inasmuch that its landed possessions became very extensive, as appears from an inquisition taken on its suppression. Attached to it was a school or college, which long continued one of the most celebrated seminaries in Europe, and from which many learned men, not only of the Irish nation, but from all parts of Christendom, were despatched to diffuse knowledge throughout Europe. It is said that 7000 students were congregated in it, in the pursuit of learning, at one period; and the annals of Ulster relate that, at a synod held by Gelasius at Clonadh, in 1162, it was decreed that no person should lecture publicly on theology, except such as had studied at Armagh. The city was destroyed by accidental conflagrations in the year 670, 687, and 770, and also sustained considerable injury in the last-mentioned year by lightning. In subsequent periods it suffered severely and repeatedly from the Danes, a band of whom, landing at Newry in 830, penetrated into the interior, and having stormed Armagh established their head-quarters in it for one month, and on being driven out plundered the city and reduced it to ashes. In 836, Tergesius or Thorgis, a Danish chieftain, equally celebrated for his courage and ferocity, after having laid waste Connaught and a great part of Meath and Leinster, turned his arms against Ulster, which he devastated as far as Lough Neagh, and then advancing against Armagh, took it with little difficulty. His first act, after securing possession of the place, was the expulsion of the bishop, Farannan, with all the students of the college, and the whole body of the religious: the bishop and clergy sought refuge in Cashel. The numerous atrocities perpetrated by the invaders at length excited a combined effort against them. Nial the Third collected a large army, and after having defeated the Danes in a pitched battle in Tyrconnel, advanced upon Armagh, where, after a second successful engagement, and while preparing to force his victorious way into the city, the main position of the enemy in these parts, he was drowned in the river Callan, in an attempt to save the life of one of his followers. Malachy, his successor, obtained possession of the city, in which a public assembly of the princes and chieftains of Ireland was held, in 849, to devise the means of driving their ferocious enemies out of the island. At first the Danes suffered several defeats; but, having concentrated their forces, and being supported by a reinforcement of their countrymen, they again marched against Armagh, and took and plundered it about the year 852.

The subsequent annals of Armagh, to the commencement of the 11th century, are little more than a reiteration of invasions and conquests by the Danes, and of successful but brief insurrections of the natives, in all of which this devoted city became in turn the prize of each contending army, and suffered all the horrors of savage warfare. In 1004, the celebrated Brian Boru entered Armagh, where he presented at the great altar of the church a collar of gold weighing 20 ounces; and after his death at the battle of Clontarf, in 1014, his remains were deposited here according to his dying request, with those of his son Murchard, who fell in the same battle. From this period to the English invasion, the history of the city exhibits only a series of calamitous incidents either by hostile inroads or accidental fires. With regard even to the events connected with the arrival of the English, its annals evince nothing more than the fact of a synod of the Irish clergy having been held here by Gelasius, in 1170. That assembly came to the conclusion that the foreign invasion and internal distractions of the country were a visitation of divine retribution, as a punishment for the inhuman practice of purchasing Englishmen from pirates and selling them as slaves; and it was therefore decreed that every English captive should be liberated. The city suffered severely from the calamities consequent on the invasion of Edward Bruce in 1315, during which the entire see was lamentably wasted, and the archbishop reduced to a state of extreme destitution, by the reiterated incursions of the Scottish army.

During the local wars in Ulster, at the close of the 15th and the beginning of the 16th centuries, this city was in a condition of great wretchedness. In the year 1557, on the insurrection of Shane O'Neill or O'Neal, Lord Sussex, then lord-lieutenant, marched into Ulster to oppose him; and having attacked the insurgents successfully at Dundalk, forced O'Neill to retire upon Armagh, which the lord-lieutenant entered in October, and wasted with fire and sword, sparing only the cathedral church. In 1566, O'Neill, to revenge himself on Archbishop Loftus, who had transmitted information of his hostile intentions to government even before the Irish chieftains and the lord-deputy had preferred their complaint against him, resolved on a special expedition against this city, and on this occasion committed dreadful havoc, not even sparing the cathedral. Not long after, in the year 1575, Sydney, the lord-deputy, marched into Ulster against Turlough O'Neill, and fixed his head-quarters at Armagh: that chieftain, after some ineffectual negotiations through the agency of his wife, proceeded thither, and having surrendered himself, was permitted to return home without molestation. In the short but sanguinary war carried on between the English government and Hugh O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone, towards the close of the reign of Elizabeth, the earl obtained possession of this place by stratagem; but unfavourable events in other parts soon obliged him to evacuate the place. In the course of the same war, Armagh was again invested, in 1598, by this chieftain, who hoped to reduce it a second time by famine, but was baffled by the treachery of his illegitimate son, Con O'Neill, who, having deserted to the English, discovered a private road by which Sir Henry Bagnall, the British commander, was enabled to send in such a supply of men and provisions as completely frustrated the earl's efforts. Soon afterwards, the English were utterly defeated, and their commander killed, in a desperate attempt to force O'Neill's intrenchments, the immediate consequence of which was their evacuation of Armagh, which, however, was retaken in 1601, by Lord Mountjoy, who made it one of his principal positions in his Ulster expedition, and occupied it with a garrison of 900 men. In the early part of the 17th century, a colony of Scottish Presbyterians settled here, from which it is supposed that Scotch-street, near the eastern entrance of the town, took its name.

At the commencement of the war in 1641, Armagh fell into the hands of Sir Phelim O'Neill, who, on being soon after forced to evacuate it, set fire to the cathedral, and put to death many of the inhabitants. On the breaking out of the war between James II. and William, Prince of Orange, the Earl of Tyrconnell, then lord-lieutenant under the former sovereign, took the charter from the corporation, and placed a strong body of troops in the town; but these troops were surprised and disarmed by the people of the surrounding country, who had risen in favour of the new dynasty: the garrison was permitted to retreat without further injury, to Louth; and Lord Blayney, having taken possession of the town, immediately proclaimed King William. This nobleman, however, was soon afterwards compelled to evacuate it, and retreat with his forces to Londonderry, at that period the last refuge of the Protestants. James, in his progress through the north and from the siege of Derry, rested for a few days at Armagh, which he describes as having been pillaged by the enemy, and very inconvenient both for himself and his suite. In 1690, Duke Schomberg took possession of it, and formed a dépôt of provisions here. No important event occurred after the Revolution until the year 1769, when this city furnished a well-appointed troop of cavalry to oppose Thurot at Carrickfergus. In 1778, on the apprehension of an invasion from France and of civil disturbances, several of the inhabitants again formed themselves into a volunteer company, and offered the command to the Earl of Charlemont, by whom, after some deliberation, it was accepted. In 1781, an artillery company was formed; and in the following year, a troop of volunteer cavalry, of which the earl was also captain. In 1796, this nobleman, in pursuance of the wishes of government, formed an infantry company and a cavalry troop of yeomanry in the town, whose numbers were afterwards augmented to 200: they were serviceable in performing garrison duty during the temporary absence of the regular troops in the disturbances of 1798, but in 1812 were disbanded by order of the lord-lieutenant.

The city occupies an area of 269 acres, and contains 1719 houses, many of which are handsome and well built; it is delightfully situated on the declivity of a lofty eminence, round the western base of which the river Callan winds in its progress to the Blackwater. It is chiefly indebted for its present high state of improvement to the attention bestowed on it by several primates since the Reformation, especially by Primate Boulter, and, still more so, by Primate Robinson, both of whom made it their place of residence. The approaches on every side embrace interesting objects. On the east are the rural village or post-town of Rich-hill, and the demesne of Castle-Dillon, in which the late proprietor erected an obelisk on a lofty hill in memory of the volunteers of Ireland. The western approach exhibits the demesnes of Caledon, Glasslough, Woodpark, Elm Park, and Knappagh; the approaches from Dungannon and Loughgall pass through a rich and well-wooded country; that from the south, descending through the fertile, well-cultivated, and hazy vale of the Callan, the banks of which are adorned with several seats and extensive plantations, interspersed with numerous bleach-greens and mills, is also extremely pleasing; and that from the south-east, though less attractive, is marked by the classical feature of Hamilton's Bawn, immortalised by the sarcastic pen of Swift. Many of the streets converge towards the cathedral, the central point and the most conspicuous object in the city, and are connected by cross streets winding around the declivity. They have flagged pathways, are macadamised, and lighted with gas; and since 1833, the town has been also cleaved and watched, under the provisions of the general act of the 9th of George IV., cap 82, by which a cess is apportioned and levied on the inhabitants. A copious supply of fresh water has been procured under the authority of two general acts passed in 1789 and 1794: metal pipes have been carried through all the main streets, by which the water is brought from a small lake or basin nearly midway between Armagh and Hamilton's-Bawn, in consideration of a small rate on each house; and fountains have been erected in different parts of the town occupied by the poorer class of the inhabitants. The city is also plentifully supplied with turf, and coal of good quality is brought from the Drumglass and Coal-Island collieries, 11 miles distant. A public walk, called the Mall, has been formed by subscription, out of ground granted on lease to the corporation, originally in 1797, by the primate, being a part of the town commons, which were vested in the latter for useful purposes by an act of the 13th and 14th of George III.: the enclosed area, on the eastern side of which are many superior houses, comprehends nearly eight acres, kept in excellent condition. Besides this, the primate's demesne is open to respectable persons; and his lordship's praiseworthy example has been followed by two opulent citizens, who have also thrown open their grounds in the vicinity for the recreation of the inhabitants.

The Tontine Buildings, erected as a private speculation by a few individuals, contain a large assembly-room having a suite of apartments connected with it, a public news-room, and a savings'-bank. Dramatic performances occasionally take place in this edifice, from the want of a special building for their exhibition. The Public Library was founded by Primate Robinson, who bequeathed for the free use of the public his valuable collection of books, and endowed it with lands at Knockhamill and houses in Armagh yielding a clear rental of £339. He also erected the building, which is a handsome edifice in the Grecian style, situated to the north-west of the cathedral, and completed in 1771, as appears by the date in front, above which is the appropriate inscription "TO THE ΨΥΧΗΣ ΙΑΤΡΕΙΟΝ." The room in which the books are deposited is light, airy, and commodious, and has a gallery: there are also apartments for a librarian. In 1820, an additional staircase was erected as an entrance at the west end, which has in a great measure destroyed the uniformity and impaired the beauty of the building. The collection consists of about 20,000 volumes, and comprises many valuable works on theology, the classics, and antiquities, to which have been added several modern publications. In the record-room of the diocesan registry are writings and books bequeathed by Primate Robinson to the governors and librarian, in trust, for the sole use of the primate for the time being. The primate, and the dean and chapter, by the act of the 13th and 14th of George III., already referred to, are trustees of the library, with liberal powers. The Observatory, beautifully situated on a gentle eminence a little to the north-east of the city, was also erected by Primate Robinson, about the year 1788, on a plot of 15 acres: the building is of hewn limestone, and has on its front the inscription, "The Heavens declare the glory of God;" it comprises two lofty domes for the observatory, and a good house for the residence of the astronomer. The munificent founder provided for the maintenance of the astronomer, and gave the appropriate tithes of Carlingford for the support of an assistant and the maintenance of the observatory, vesting the management in the primate for the time being and twelve governors, of whom the chapter are eight, and the remaining four are elected by them as vacancies occur. Primate Robinson dying before the internal arrangements were completed, the establishment remained in an unfinished state till 1825, when Lord J. G. De La Poer Beresford, the present primate, furnished the necessary instruments, at a cost of nearly £3000. This city is usually the station of a regiment of infantry: the barracks occupy an elevated and healthy situation, and are capable of accommodating 800 men. In the immediate vicinity is the archiepiscopal palace, erected in 1770 by Primate Robinson, who also, in 1781, built a beautiful chapel of Grecian architecture nearly adjacent, and embellished the grounds, which comprise about 800 acres, with plantations tastefully arranged.

Though an increasing and improving town, Armagh has now no manufactures, and but little trade, except in grain, of which a great quantity is sent to Portadown and Newry for exportation: much of the flour made in the neighbourhood is conveyed to the county of Tyrone. After the introduction of the linen manufacture into the north of Ireland, Armagh became the grand mart for the sale of cloth produced in the surrounding district. From a return of six market-days in the spring of a very recent year, it appears that the average number of brown webs sold in the open market was 4392, and in private warehouses 3412, making a total of 7704 webs, weekly: the value of the webs annually sold, at £1. 11. each, may thus amount to £620,942. But this does not afford a just criterion of the present state of the trade, in which a great change has taken place within the last 30 years; the quantity now bleached annually in this neighbourhood is nearly double that of any former period, but only a portion of it is brought into the market of Armagh. The linen-hall is a large and commodious building, erected by Leonard Dobbin, Esq., M.P. for the borough: it is open for the sale of webs from ten to eleven o'clock every Tuesday. A yarn-market is held, in which the weekly sales amount to £3450, which is equivalent to £179,400 per annum. There are two extensive distilleries, in which upwards of 25,000 tons of grain were till lately annually consumed; an ale brewery, consuming 3900 barrels of malt annually; several tanneries; and numerous flour and corn mills, some of which are worked by steam. The amount of excise duties collected within the district for a recent year was £24,960. The Blackwater, within four miles of the city, affords a navigable communication with Lough Neagh, from which, by the Lagan canal, the line of navigation is extended to Belfast: to the east of Armagh is the navigable river Bann, which is connected with the Newry canal. A canal, also, from the Blackwater to Lough Erne, passes within one mile of the city. In the year 1845, an act was passed to amend the act relating to the Ulster Railway Company, and to enable the company to make a railway from Armagh to Portadown; being that portion of the original Ulster line from Armagh to Belfast for which, owing to pecuniary difficulties, the parliamentary powers were suffered to expire. The length of this new line is 11 British miles, and the cost £133,035. See Belfast.

The MARKETS are abundantly supplied: they are held on Tuesday, for linen-cloth and yarn, pigs, horned-cattle, provisions of all kinds, vast quantities of flax, and flax-seed during the season; and on Saturday, for grain and provisions. Fairs are held on the Tuesday after Michaelmas, and a week before Christmas; and a large cattle-market has been established on the first Saturday in every month. By a local act obtained in 1774, a parcel of waste land adjoining the city, and containing about 9½ plantation acres, was vested in the archbishop and his successors, to be parcelled into divisions for holding the fairs and markets; but only the fairs are now held on it. The market-house, an elegant and commodious building of hewn stone, erected by Archbishop Stuart, at an expense of £3000, occupies a central situation at the lower extremity of Market-street. The old shambles, built previously by Primate Robinson, have been taken down; and a more extensive and convenient range, with markets for grain, stores, weigh-house, &c., attached, was erected in 1829 by the committee of tolls: the supply of hutchers' meat is abundant, and the veal of Armagh is held in high estimation. There is also a plentiful supply of sea and fresh-water fish. Several of the inhabitants, in 1821, raised a subscription, by shares (on debentures or receipts) of £25 each, amounting to £1700; and purchased the lessee's interest in the tolls, a renewal of which for 21 years was obtained in 1829. Eight resident shareholders, elected annually, and called the "Armagh Toll Committee," have now the entire management of the tolls and customs of the borough, consisting of market-house, street, and shambles' customs, in which they have made considerable reductions. The proceeds, after deducting the expenses of management and five per cent. interest for the proprietors of the debentures, are applied partly as a sinking fund for liquidating the principal sum of £1700, and partly towards the improvement of the city and of the places for holding the fairs and markets. The Bank of Ireland and the Provincial Bank have each a branch establishment here; and there are also branches of the Northern, the Ulster, and the Belfast Banking Companies. In the excise arrangements, Armagh gives name to, and is the head of, a district which comprises the city, and the towns of Lurgan and Portadown, in the county of Armagh; the towns of Aghnacloy, Ballygawley, Caledon, Cookstown, and Dungannon, in the county of Tyrone; and the town of Monaghan, in the county of that name.

The inhabitants were incorporated under the title of the "Sovereign, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Armagh," in 1613, by charter of James I., which was taken from them by James II., who granted one conferring more extensive privileges. William III., however, restored the original charter, under which the CORPORATION consisted of a sovereign, twelve free burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen, of whom there were at the dissolution of the corporate body in 1840 only two; a town-clerk and registrar, and two sergeants-at-mace, were also appointed. The sovereign was, by the charter, to be elected by the free burgesses from among themselves, annually on the festival of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist (June 24th); the power of filling a vacancy in the number of free burgesses was vested in the sovereign and remaining free burgesses; the freemen were admitted by the sovereign and free burgesses; and the appointment of the inferior officers was vested in the corporation at large. By the act of the 3rd and 4th of Victoria, cap. 108, the corporation was dissolved; and the property is now vested in the commissioners under the Lighting act, 9th George IV., to be applied by them to aid in defraying the rates, and improving the town. By charter of King James, the borough was empowered to send two representatives to the Irish parliament, but the right of election was confined to the sovereign and twelve burgesses, who continued to return two members till the Union, when the number was reduced to one. The nature of the franchise remained the same until the 2nd of William IV., when the free burgesses not resident within seven miles of the borough were disfranchised, and the privilege of election was extended to the £10 householders; and as the limits of the district called "the Corporation" comprehended 1147 statute acres unconnected with the franchise, a new electoral boundary was formed close round the town, comprising only 277 acres. The senechal of the manor of Armagh, who is appointed by the primate, holds his court here, and exercises jurisdiction, both by attachment of goods and by civil bill process, in all cases of action arising within the manor and not exceeding £10: the greater part of the city is comprised within this manor, the remainder being in that of Mountnorris adjoining. The assizes and general quarter-sessions are held twice a year; a court for the relief of insolvent debtors is held three times in the year; and the county magistrates resident in the city and its neighbourhood hold a petty-session every Saturday. The old corporation grand jury consisted of a foreman and other jurors, usually not exceeding 23 in number, chosen from among the most respectable inhabitants by the sovereign, generally within a month after entering upon his office; its dissolution took place at the close of the year 1832, when a new grand jury having been formed amidst much political excitement, they determined, under an impression that the inhabitants would resist any assessment they might make, to abrogate their functions, and the system was abandoned. The inconvenience which resulted induced the inhabitants to adopt measures for carrying into effect the provisions of the act of the 9th of George IV., previously noticed. The sessions-house, built in 1809, is situated at the northern extremity of the Mall; it has an elegant portico in front, and affords every accommodation necessary for holding the courts. At the opposite end of the Mall stands the county gaol, a neat and substantial building, with two enclosed yards in which the prisoners may take exercise, and an infirmary containing two wards for males and two for females; there is also a tread-wheel. The females are instructed by the matron in spelling and reading. Armagh is a chief or baronial constabulary police station.

THE SEE OF ARMAGH, according to the common opinion of native historians, was founded by St. Patrick, who built the cathedral and some other religious edifices, in 445. Three years after, he held a synod here, the canons of which are still in existence; and in 454 he resigned the charge of the see (to which, on his recommendation, St. Binn was appointed), and spent the remainder of a life protracted to the patriarchal period of 120 years, in visiting and confirming the various churches which he had founded, and in forming others. Prior to the year 799, the bishop of Armagh and his suffragan bishops were obliged to attend the army during the expeditions of the king of Ireland; but on a remonstrance made by Connach, then archbishop, the custom was discontinued. A tumult which broke out in the city, during the celebration of the feast of Pentecost, in 889, between the septs of Cinel-Eoghain, of Tyrone, and Ulidia, of Down, affords an instance of the great power exercised by the archbishops at this period. Moelhrigid, having succeeded in quelling the disturbance, mulcted each of the offending parties in a fine of 200 oxen, exacted hostages for their future good conduct, and caused six of the ringleaders on each side to be executed on a gallows. The commencement of the twelfth century was marked by a contest as to the right of the primacy, which had been monopolised during fifteen episcopal successions by a single princely tribe, as an hereditary right. "Eight married men," says St. Bernard, "literate indeed, but not ordained, had been predecessors to Celsus, on whose demise the election of Malachy O'Morpair to the primatial dignity, by the united voice of the clergy and people, put an end to the contest, though not without some struggles." Malachy resigned the primacy in 1137, and in lieu of it accepted the bishopric of Down, which he afterwards divided into two, reserving one to himself. His object seems to have been to procure leisure for a journey to Rome, with a view to prevail upon the pope to grant palli to the archbishops of Armagh and Cashel; but in this he was, on his first journey, disappointed, by being informed that so important a measure could only be conceded in pursuance of the suffrage of an Irish council. On making a second journey for the same purpose, he fell sick on the road, and died at the abbey of Clarevall, in the arms of his friend, St. Bernard. Nevertheless, this object was soon after accomplished, even to a greater extent than he had proposed. In 1152, Cardinal Paparo arrived in Ireland as legate from Pope Eugene III., with four palli for the four archbishops, to whom the other Irish bishops were subjected as suffragans. The following sees, several of which are now unknown even by name, were then placed under the provincial jurisdiction of the archbishop of Armagh; viz., Connor, Dumdalesghias (now Down), Lugrad, Cluainiarn or Clonard, Connanas, Ardachad (now Ardagh), Rathboth (now Raphoe), Rathlurig or Rathlure, Damliag, and Darrick (now Derry).

The origin of a dispute between the archbishops of Arms of the Archbishopric.

Armagh and Dublin, regarding their respective claims to the PRIMATIAL AUTHORITY of Ireland, may be traced to this period, in consequence of a papal bull of 1182, which ordained that no archbishop or bishop should hold any assembly or hear ecclesiastical causes in the diocese of Dublin, unless authorised by the pope or his legate: but it was not until the following century that this dispute acquired a character of importance. The rank of the former of these prelates among the bishops of Christendom was determined at the council of Lyons, where, in the order of subscription to the acts, the name "Albertus Armachanus" preceded those of all the bishops of France, Italy, and Spain. In 1247, Archbishop Reginald or Rayner separated the county of Louth from the diocese of Clogher, and annexed it to Armagh. Indeed, before this act, the inadequacy of the revenue to maintain the dignity of the see had occasioned Henry III. to issue a mandate to the lord justice of Ireland, to cause liberty of seisin to be given to the archbishop of Armagh of all the lands belonging to the see of Clogher: but this writ had not been carried into effect. In 1263, Pope Urban is said to have addressed a bull to Archbishop O'Scanlain, confirming him in the dignity of primate of all Ireland; but the authenticity of the document has been disputed. This bull, if authentic, did not put an end to the contest about precedence with the archbishop of Dublin, which was renewed between Lech, Archbishop of Dublin, and Walter Jorse or Joyce, then primate, whose brother and successor, Rowland, persevering in the claim, was resisted by Bicknor, Archbishop of Dublin, and violently driven out of Leinster, in 1313. Again, in 1337, Primate David O'Hiraghty was obstructed in his attendance on parliament by Bicknor and his clergy, who would not permit him to have his crozier borne erect before him in the diocese of Dublin, although the king had expressly forbidden Bicknor to offer him any opposition. In 1349 Bicknor once more contested the point with Fitz-Ralph, Archbishop of Armagh; and, notwithstanding the king's confirmation of the right of the latter to erect his crozier in any part of Ireland, the lord justice and the prior of Kilmainham, being bribed, as is supposed, by Bicknor, combined with that prelate in opposing the claims of the primate, who thereupon excommunicated the resisting parties. Shortly after, both Bicknor and the prior died; and the latter, on his death-bed, solicited Fitz-Ralph's forgiveness through a special messenger. Upon his decease, his body was refused Christian burial, until absolved by the primate in consequence of his contrition. In 1350, the king, through partiality to John de St. Paul, then archbishop of Dublin, revoked his letter to Fitz-Ralph, and prohibited him from exercising his episcopal functions in the province of Dublin; and, in 1353, Pope Innocent VI. decided that Armagh and Dublin should be both primatial sees; the occupant of the former to be styled Primate of all Ireland, and of the latter, Primate of Ireland. In 1365, the Archbishops Milo Sweetman and Thomas Minot renewed the controversy, which, after that period, was suffered to lie dormant till Richard Talbot, of Dublin, prevented Primate Swain from attending his duty in five successive parliaments held in 1429, 1435, and the three following years. Primates Mey and Prene experienced similar opposition; but after the decease of Talbot, in 1449, their successors enjoyed their rights undisturbed till 1533, when John Alen, Archbishop of Dublin, revived the contest with Primate Cromer, but seemingly without success. Edward VI. divested Archbishop Dowdall of the primacy, in 1551, in order to confer it on George Browne, Archbishop of Dublin, as a reward for his advocacy of the Reformation; but, on the same principle, the right was restored to Dowdall on the accession of Mary. In 1623, Lancelot Bulkeley revived the contest with Primate Hampton, and continued it against his successor, the distinguished Ussher, in whose favour it was decided by the Earl of Strafford, then lord-deputy, in 1634.

At the commencement of the Reformation, Primate Cromer was inflexible in his determination to oppose its introduction into the Irish church; and on his death, in 1542, his example was followed by his successor, Dowdall, who, after the accession of Edward VI., maintained a controversy on the disputed points with Staples, Bishop of Meath, in which both parties claimed the victory. The English government, finding him determined in his opposition to the new arrangements, issued a mandate rendering his see subordinate to that of Dublin, which caused Dowdall to quit the country and take refuge on the continent. The king, deeming this act a virtual resignation of the see, appointed Hugh Goodacre his successor; but Dowdall, as already observed, was restored by Queen Mary, and held the see till his death in 1558, the year in which his protectress also died. Notwithstanding the ecclesiastical superiority of the see of Armagh over that of Dublin, the income of the latter was so much greater, that Adam Loftus, who had been appointed archbishop of Armagh on the death of Dowdall, was removed a few years afterwards to Dublin, as being more lucrative: he was only 28 years of age on his first elevation, being the youngest primate of all Ireland upon record, except Celsus. In 1614-15, a re-grant of the episcopal property of Armagh, together with a large additional tract of land, accruing from the forfeited estates of the Earls of Tyrone and Tyrconnel, was made to Primate Hampton. His immediate successor was the celebrated James Ussher, during whose primacy Charles I. endowed anew the college of vicars-choral in the cathedral, under patent granted in 1635, by which he bestowed on them various tracts of land, the property of the dissolved Caldean priory. Ussher was succeeded by Dr. Bramhall, a man also of great learning and mental powers, who was appointed by Charles II. immediately after the Restoration. Dr. Lindsay, who was enthroned in 1713, endowed the vicars-choral and singing-boys with £200 per annum out of lands in the county of Down, and also procured for them a new charter, in 1720. Dr. Boulter, who was translated from the see of Bristol to that of Armagh, on the death of Lindsay in 1724, is known only as a political character; a collection of his letters is extant. He was succeeded by Dr. Hoadly, translated from Dublin, who published some sermons and other works; and the latter by Dr. Stone, also an active participant in the political events of the time. His successor was Dr. Robinson, Bishop of Kildare, and, after his translation, created Baron Rokby of Armagh, whose history may be best learned in the contemplation of the city over which he presided. Armagh was raised by his continued munificence from extreme decay to a state of opulence and respectability, and embellished with various useful public institutions, worthy of its position among the principal cities of Ireland; while pastoral care was evinced by him in an eminent degree in the erection of numerous parochial and district churches for new parishes and incumencies, to which he annexed glebes and glebe-houses, and in otherwise promoting the spiritual concerns of his diocese.

Of the Roman Catholic archbishops, since the Reformation, but little connected with the localities of the see is known. Robert Wauchope, a Scotsman, who had been appointed by the pope during the lifetime of Dowdall, may rightly be considered the first; for Dowdall, though a zealous adherent to the doctrines of the Church of Rome, had been appointed solely by the authority of Henry VIII. Peter Lombard, who was appointed in 1594, is known in the literary and political circles by his commentary on Ireland, for which a prosecution was instituted against him by Lord Strafford, which was terminated only by Lombard's death at Rome, in 1625, or the year following. Hugh M'Caghwell, his successor, was a man of singular piety and learning, an acute metaphysician, and profoundly skilled in every branch of scholastic philosophy: a monument was erected to his memory by the Earl of Tyrone. Oliver Plunket, appointed in 1669, obtained distinction by his defence of the primatial rights against Talbot, Archbishop of Dublin; but his prosecution and death for high treason, on a charge of favouring a plot for betraying Ireland to France, have rendered his name still more known. Hugh M'Mahon, of the Monaghan family of that name, was appointed in 1708: his great work is the defence of the primatial rights, entitled "Jus Primatiæ Armacanum," in which he is said to have exhausted the subject.

The Archbishopric, or Ecclesiastical Province, of Armagh comprehends the sixteen dioceses of Armagh, Clogher, Meath, Down, Connor, Dromore, Derry, Raphoe, Kilmore, Elphin, Ardagh, Tuam, Killala, Achonry, Clonfert, and Kilmacduagh. It comprises within its limits the whole of the civil province of Ulster; the counties of Longford, Louth, Meath, and Westmeath, and parts of the King's and Queen's counties, in the province of Leinster; and the whole of the civil province of Connaught. The archbishop, who is primate and metropolitan of all Ireland, presides over the province, and exercises all episcopal jurisdiction within his own diocese; and the sees of Down and Connor being united to that of Dromore, and that of Derry to Raphoe, Kilmore to Elphin and Ardagh, Tuam to Killala and Achonry, and Clonfert to Kilmacduagh, seven bishops are suffragan to the Lord-Primate. Under the Church Temporalities' act of the 3rd of William IV., the archiepiscopal jurisdiction of the province of Tuam became extinct on the death of the late archbishop of Tuam, and the dioceses then included in it became suffragan to Armagh. Before this, the province of Armagh included only ten dioceses.

The Diocese of Armagh comprehends the greater part of that county, and parts of those of Meath, Louth, Tyrone, and Londonderry: it comprises by computation a superficial area of 468,550 acres, of which 1300 are in Meath, 108,900 in Louth, 162,500 in Tyrone, and 25,000 in Londonderry. It was anciently divided into two parts, the English and the Irish, now known as the Upper and Lower parts. The English or Upper part embraces that portion which extends into the counties of Louth and Meath, and is subdivided into the rural deaneries of Drogheda, Atherdee or Ardee, and Dundalk; the Irish or Lower part comprehends the remaining portion of the diocese in the counties of Armagh, Tyrone, and Londonderry, and is subdivided into the rural deaneries of Creggan, Aghaloe, Dungannon, and Tullahog. In all ancient synods and visitations the clergy of the English and Irish parts were congregated separately, which practice is still observed, the clergy of the Upper part assembling for visitation at Drogheda, and those of the Lower at Armagh. The see of Clogher, on the first avoidance by death or translation, will, under the Church Temporalities' act, become united to that of Armagh, and its temporalities will be vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland. There are 100,563 statute acres belonging to the see of Armagh, of which 87,809 are profitable land, the remainder being bog or mountain; and the gross amount of its yearly revenue on an average is about £17,670, arising from chief rents, fee farms, and copyhold leases. On the death of the present primate the sum of £4500 is, under the above act, to be paid out of the revenue annually to the Commissioners. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, archdeacon, and the four prebendaries of Mullaghbrack, Ballymore, Loughgall, and Tynan, with eight vicars-choral, and an organist and choir. The dean and precentor are the only dignitaries for whom houses are provided; five houses are assigned for the vicars-choral and organist. Each dignitary and prebend has cure of souls annexed, as regards the benefice forming its corps. The economy estate of the cathedral yields an annual rental of £180, which is expended in the payment of salaries to the officers of the cathedral, and in defraying other charges incident to the building. In 1837, the diocese comprised 88 benefices, of which 14 were unions consisting of 45 parishes, and 74 consisted of single parishes or portions thereof. Of these, 4 were in the gift of the Crown, 51 in that of the Lord-Primate, 12 in lay and corporation patronage, and 21 in clerical or alternate patronage. The total number of parishes or districts was 122, of which 91 were rectories or vicarages, 23 perpetual cures, 1 impropriate, and 7 parishes or districts without cure of souls; there were 22 lay impropriations. The number of churches was 88, besides other buildings in which divine service was performed; and of glebe-houses, 74. Since 1837, the number of benefices and churches has considerably increased: there are now above a hundred.

In the Roman Catholic Church the archbishopric of Armagh, as originally founded, is the head or primacy of all Ireland; and the same bishoprics are suffragan to it as were suffragan in the Protestant Church before the passing of the Church Temporalities' act. The Roman Catholic diocese comprises 51 parochial benefices or unions, containing 130 places of worship, served by 51 parish priests and 65 coadjutors or curates. The parochial benefice of St. Peter, Drogheda, is held by the archbishop; and the union of Armagh, Eglisli, and Grange, is also annexed to the see. There are 68 Presbyterian meeting-houses, and 44 belonging to other Protestant dissenters, making in the whole about 350 places of worship in the diocese.

The parish of Armagh comprises 4606½ statute acres, of which 1051½ are in the barony of O'Neilland West, and 3555½ in that of Armagh. The strictly rural district is only of small extent: the system of agriculture has very much improved of late; the land is excellent, and yields abundant crops. Limestone prevails, and is mostly used in building and in repairing the roads; in some places it is beautifully variegated, and is wrought into chimney-pieces. The living consists of a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Armagh, consolidated by letters-patent of the 11th and 12th of James I., and united, in the reign of Charles I., to the parishes of Eglisli, Lisnadill, and Ballymoyer, in the patronage of the Lord-Primate. These parishes, however, having been so long consolidated, are not specifically set forth in the incumbents' titles; so that Armagh has practically ceased to be a union, and is no longer designated such in the instruments of collation. The deanery is in the gift of the Crown, and has been usually held with the rectory, but they are not statutorily united, and are at present held separately. The former has neither tithes nor cure of souls: it is endowed with five tenelements and a small plot of land within the city, the deanery-house and farm of 90 acres, and five townlands in the parish of Lisnadill, comprising in all 1149 statute acres, valued at £274. 13. per annum. The deanery-house, situated about a quarter of a mile from the cathedral, was built in 1774. The rectorial glebelands comprise about 380 acres, valued at £368 per annum. The tithe rent-charge of Armagh and Grange is £375; and the gross value of the deanery and union of Armagh when held together, tithe and glebe inclusive, amounted to £2462: on the passing of the Rent-charge act, the income was of course considerably reduced. There are six perpetual cures within the union, namely, Grange, Eglisli, Killylea, Lisnadill, Armaghbreague, and Ballymoyer, the endowments of which are partly paid by the rector out of the tithes. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners some years ago recommended that the union, on the next avoidance, should be partially dissolved, and the district of Ballymoyer erected into a new parish; and that the deanery and consolidated rectory and vicarage, now belonging to different patrons, should be permanently united, the respective patrons presenting alternately, agreeably to the Irish act of the 10th and 11th of Charles I., cap. 2; or that the advowson of the deanery should be vested solely in the patron of the rectory and vicarage, which are of much greater value than the deanery, the patron of the latter to be compensated by being allowed the right of presentation to the new parish of Ballymoyer.

THE CATHEDRAL CHURCH, originally founded by St. Patrick in 445, was burnt by the Danes of Ulster, under Turgesius, who, in 836, destroyed the city. At what time the present building was erected is not accurately known; the crypt seems to be of the 11th or 12th century, but there are several portions of a much earlier date, which were probably part of a former, or perhaps of the original, structure. It appears from an existing record that the roof, which for 130 years had been only partially repaired, was, in 1125, covered with tiles; and in 1262 the church was repaired by Archbishop O'Scanlain, who is supposed to have built the nave and the elegant western entrance. The cathedral was partially burnt in 1404 and 1566, after which it was repaired by Primate Hampton, who in 1612 rebuilt the tower; it was again burnt in 1642 by Sir Phelim O'Neil, but was restored by Archbishop Margetson, at his own expense, in 1675, and was further repaired in 1729 by the dean and chapter, aided by Archbishop Bonlter. Primate Robinson, in 1766, roofed the nave with slate, and fitted it up for divine service; the same prelate commenced the erection of a tower, but when it was raised to the height of 60 feet, one of the piers, with the arch springing from it, yielded to the pressure from above, and it was consequently taken down, and made even with the roof of the building. The tower was, however, again raised to its present height and surmounted by a spire, which, from a fear of overpowering the foundation, was necessarily curtailed in its proportion. Primate Beresford, on his translation to the see, employed Mr. Cottingham, architect of London, and the restorer of the abbey of St. Alban's, to survey the cathedral with a view to its perfect restoration; and the report being favourable, the undertaking, towards which His Grace subscribed £6000, was commenced under that gentleman's superintendence in 1834. The piers of the tower were removed, and replaced by others resting upon a more solid foundation, in the execution of which the whole weight of the tower was sustained without the slightest crack or settlement, till the new work was brought into contact with the old, by a skilful and ingenious contrivance of which a model has been preserved. The prevailing character of the architecture is the early English style, with portions of the later Norman; many of the details are rich and elegant, though long obscured and concealed by injudicious management in repairing the building, and as the work lately in progress is now completed, they add much to the beauty of this venerable and interesting structure. The series of elegantly clustered columns separating the aisles from the nave, which had declined from the perpendicular and have been restored to their original position, were concealed by a rude encasement, with a view to strengthen them; and many of the corbels, enriched with emblematical sculpture, were covered with thick coats of plaister. Among other ancient details that had been long hidden is a sculpture of St. Patrick with his cross, in a compartment surmounted with shamrocks, which is perhaps the earliest existing record of that national emblem; and another of St. Peter, with the keys, surmounted by a cock, has been discovered in the wall under the rafters of the choir. There are several splendid monuments, the principal of which are those of Dean Drelincourt, by Rysbrach; of Primate Robinson, with a bust, by Bacon; of Lord Charlemont, who died in 1671; and of his father, Baron Caulfield. The monuments of Brian Boru or Boroimhe, his son Murchard, and his nephew Conard, who were slain in the battle of Clontarf and interred in this cathedral, long since perished. The church, which was made parochial by act of the 15th and 16th of George III., cap. 17th, occupies a commanding site; it is 183½ feet in length, and 119 in breadth along the transepts.

To the east of the cathedral and Mall, on an eminence in front of the city, is a new church, dedicated to St. Mark. It is a handsome edifice in the later English style: the interior is elegantly finished; the aisles are separated from the nave by a row of arches resting on clustered columns, from the capitals of which spring numerous ribs, supporting a groined roof. This church, which is indebted for much of its decorations to the munificence of the primate, was built at an expense of £3691, of which £1960 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits, £202 a donation from the primate, and the remainder was raised by parochial assessment and the sale of pews; it contains about 1500 sittings, of which 800 are free. There are six other churches within the union. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parishes of Eglisli and Grange, and forms one of the benefices of the primate; the union contains chapels at Armagh, Anacram, and Tullysaren. The older one of the two at Armagh was built about the year 1750, on ground held under different titles, the proprietors having successively devised a permanent interest therein to the congregation at a nominal rent; the building has of late been much enlarged and improved; it is triple-roofed, as if intended for three distinct buildings, yet has a good effect. St. Patrick's Roman Catholic college was opened on the 6th of August, 1838, under the patronage of Archbishop Crolly: the course of education comprises Latin, Greek, French, mathematics, ancient and modern history, geography, and the use of the globes. The places of worship for dissenters are, one built in 1722 with part of the ruins of the church and monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul, and having a substantial manse in front, for a congregation of Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, who settled here about the year 1670; one for Seceders, now also in connexion with the Assembly, built about the year 1785; one for the Evangelical or Independent congregational union; one for Wesleyan Methodists, built in 1786, with a comfortable house for the minister attached, and situated near the spot where Mr. Wesley, in 1767, frequently preached; and one for Primitive Wesleyan Methodists.

The Free Grammar School, to the south of the Observatory, is endowed with seven townlands in the parish of Loughgilly, comprising 1514 acres, and producing a clear rental of £1377, granted in trust to the primate and his successors in 1627, for the support of a grammar school at Mountnorris: part of the income is applied to the maintenance of several exhibitions at Trinity College, Dublin. The buildings occupy the four sides of a quadrangle, the front of which is formed by a covered passage communicating on each side with the apartments of the head-master and pupils; on the fourth side is the schoolroom, 56 feet long by 23 broad, behind which is a large area inclosed by a wall and serving as a play-ground. The edifice was completed in 1774, at an expense of £5000, defrayed by Primate Robinson, and is capable of conveniently accommodating 100 resident pupils. A school for the instruction of the Choir boys has been established by the present primate, the master of which receives a stipend of £75 per annum, and is allowed to take private pupils. The Charter School was founded in 1738, and endowed with £90 per annum by Mrs. Drelincourt, widow of Dean Drelincourt, for the maintenance and education of 20 boys and 20 girls, who were also to be instructed in the linen manufacture, housewifery, and husbandry. In that year the corporation granted certain commons or waste lands, called the "Irish-Street commons," comprising upwards of eight statute acres, on which the school premises, including separate residences for the master and mistress, were erected, and to which Primate

Boulter annexed 13 statute acres adjoining. The endowment was further augmented with the lands of Legumlin, in the county of Tyrone, comprising about 107 acres, and held under a renewable lease granted in trust by Primate Robinson to the dean and chapter. The primate and rector are trustees, and the officiating curate is superintendent of the school, in which only ten girls are now instructed in the general branches of useful education; the surplus funds have been allowed to accumulate for the erection of premises on a more eligible site, and it has been in contemplation to convert the establishment into a day school for boys and girls. In 1819, Primate Stuart built and endowed a large and handsome edifice, in which boys and girls are at present taught on the Lancasterian plan, and most of them are clothed by the dean and by William Stuart, Esq., son of the founder. The income is about £100, of which £31. 10. are given by the present primate and Mr. Stuart. The building is situated on the east side of the Mall, and consists of a centre and two wings, the former occupied as residences by the master and mistress, and the latter as schoolrooms. In Callan-street is a large building erected for a Sunday school by the primate, who has presented it to the committee of an infants' school established in 1835; and there are other schools in the parish for the instruction of the poor.

The County Hospital or Infirmary is situated on the north-western declivity of the hill which is crowned by the cathedral, at the top of Abbey-street, Callan-street, and Dawson-street, which, branching off in different directions, leave an open triangular space in front. It is a fine old building of unwhewn limestone, completed in 1774, at an expense of £2150, and consisting of a centre and two wings; one-half is occupied as the surgeon's residence, the other is open for the reception of patients; there are two wards for males, and one for females. The domestic offices are commodious and well arranged, and there are separate gardens for the infirmary and for the surgeon. The entire number of patients relieved in a recent year was 3044, of whom 563 were admitted into the hospital; and 71 children were vaccinated: the expenditure amounted to £1145, of which £500 were granted by the grand jury, and the remainder was defrayed by subscription. Prior to the establishment of the present county infirmary by act of parliament, the inhabitants had erected and maintained by private contributions an hospital called the "Charitable Infirmary," situated in Scotch-street: this they liberally assigned over to the lord primate and governors of the new establishment, and it was used as the county hospital until the erection of the present edifice. The Freder Hospital, situated about a furlong from the city, on the Caledon road, was erected in 1825, at an entire cost, including the purchase and laying out of the grounds, of about £3500, defrayed by the present primate, by whose munificence it is solely supported. It is a chaste and handsome building of brown limestone, 50 feet in length and 30 in width; with a projection rearward containing on the ground floor a physician's room, a warm-bath and washing-room, and on the other floors, male and female nurses' rooms and slop-rooms, in the latter of which are shower-baths. On the ground floor of the front building are the entrance hall, the matron's sitting and sleeping rooms, and a kitchen and pantry: the first and second floors are respectively appropriated to the use of male and female patients, each floor containing two wards, a fever and a recovery ward, the former having ten beds, and the latter five, making in all thirty beds. The subordinate buildings and offices are well calculated to promote the object of the institution: there is a good garden, with walks open to convalescents; and in regard to cleanliness, economy, and suitable accommodation for its suffering inmates, this hospital is entitled to rank among the first in the province. The Armagh District Asylum for Lunatic Poor of the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, Fermanagh, and Cavan, was erected pursuant to act of parliament by a grant from the consolidated fund, at an expense, including purchase of site, of £20,900, to be repaid by instalments by the respective counties, each of which sends patients in proportion to the amount of its population, and is only charged for the number admitted. It has accommodation for 122 patients, who are received on an affidavit of poverty, a medical certificate of insanity, and a certificate from the minister and churchwardens of their respective parishes. The establishment is under the superintendence of a board of directors, a resident manager and matron, and a physician. Thirteen acres of ground are attached to the asylum, and are devoted to gardening and husbandry. The male patients weave all the linen-cloth used in the establishment, and the clothing for the females; gymnastic exercises and a tennis-court have been lately established. From the 14th of July, 1825, when the asylum was first opened, to the 1st of January, 1835, 710 patients were admitted, of whom 400 were males and 310 females: of this number, 305 recovered and were discharged; 121 were discharged relieved; 70 unrelieved, and restored to their relations; 89 died, and 16 were transferred to the asylum at Londonderry; leaving in this asylum 109. The average annual expense for the above period amounted to about £1900, and the average cost of each patient, including clothing and all other charges, was about £17 per annum. In 1845 the expenditure was £2073.

Among the voluntary institutions for the improvement of the city the most remarkable is the Association for the Suppression of Mendicity, under the superintendence of a committee who meet weekly. For this purpose the city is divided into six districts, and eight resident visitors are appointed to each, one of whom collects the subscriptions of the contributors on Wednesday, and distributes them among the paupers on the ensuing Monday. The panpers are divided into three classes, viz., those wholly incapacitated from industrious exertion; orphans and destitute children; and panpers with large families, who are able in some measure, though not wholly, to provide for their subsistence. The visitors personally inspect the habitations of those whom they relieve, and report to the general committee. The panpers are employed in sweeping the streets and lanes, by which means the thoroughfares are kept in a state of great cleanliness; and itinerant mendicants are prevented from begging in the streets by two beadies. The Robinson Loan Fund consists of an accumulated bequest of £200 by Primate Robinson in 1794, held in trust, and lent, free of interest, under an order of the Court of Chancery, made in Feb. 1834, in sums of from £10 to £30, to tradesmen and artificers resident or about to settle in the city, who repay by instalments at or within 12 months. There is another fund for supplying distressed tradesmen with small loans to be repaid monthly. A bequest was made by Arthur Jacob Macan, who died in India in 1819, to the sovereign and burgesses and other inhabitants of Armagh, for the erection and endowment of an asylum for the blind, on the plan of that at Liverpool, but open indiscriminately to all religious persuasions, and, if the funds should allow of it, for the admission also of deaf and dumb children, with preference to the county of Armagh. The benefits derivable under the will are perspective, and are principally contingent on the death of certain legatees. The workhouse of the union, on a site of seven acres purchased for £1236, was completed in 1841, at an expense of £7200; it has all the necessary accommodation for the board of guardians and its officers, and is constructed to contain 1000 paupers.

Basilea Vetus Conciliaria, "the old preaching church," was probably used in later times as the parish church: a small fragment still remains contiguous to the cathedral, where the rectors of Armagh were formerly inducted. The priory of the Culdees, who were secular priests serving in the choir of the cathedral, where their president officiated as precentor, was situated in Castle-street, and had been totally forsaken for some time prior to 1625, at which period the rents were received by the archbishop's seneschal and the whole of its endowment was granted to the vicars-choral. Temple Bridget, built by St. Patrick, stood near the spot now occupied by the Roman Catholic chapel built about 1750. He also founded Temple na-Fearla, or "the church of the miracles," without the city, for his sister Lupita, who was interred there, and whose body was discovered at the commencement of the 17th century in an upright posture, deeply buried under the rubbish, with a cross before and behind it. The site of the monastery of St. Columba was that now occupied by the Provincial Bank, at the north-east corner of Abbey-street; the two Methodist chapels stand on part of its gardens. There are many other vestiges of antiquity in the city and its vicinity. The most ancient and remarkable is Eamhuin Macha or Eamania, the chief residence of the kings of Ulster, situated two miles to the west, and near which several celts, brazen spear-heads, and other military weapons have been found. Creeve Roe, adjoining it, is said to have been the seat of the only order of knighthood among the ancient Irish; its members were called "Knights of the Red Branch," and hence the name of the place. In the same neighbourhood is the Noran Fort, where also numerous ornaments, military weapons, and horse accoutrements, are frequently found; and in the townland of Kennedy are the remains of two forts, where petrified wood and other fossils have been met with. In the primate's demesne are extensive and picturesque ruins of an abbey; near the Asylum are the walls of Bishop's Court, once the residence of the primates; and on the banks of the Callan are the remains of the tumulus of "Nial of the hundred battles." On a lofty eminence four miles to the south-east is Cairnamhanaghan, now called the "Vicar's Cairn," commanding an extensive and pleasing prospect over several adjacent counties. It is a vast conical heap of stones in the parish of Mullaghbrack, covering a circular area 44 yards in diameter, and thrown together without any regularity, except in regard to the encircling stones, which were placed close to each other, in order to contain the smaller stones of which the cairn is composed. Its size has been much diminished by the peasantry, who have carried away the large stones for building; but the proprietor, the Earl of Charlemont, has prohibited this destruction. Coins of Anlaf the Dane, Athelstan, Alfred, and Edgar have been found in and around the city. Armagh gives the title of Earl to the King of Iananover.

ARMAGH-BREAGUE, a district parish, in the union of ARMAGH, partly in the barony of ARMAGH, and partly in that of LOWER FEWS, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 7 miles (S.) from Armagh, on the line of road from Armagh to Newtown-Hamilton; containing nearly 4000 inhabitants. It was formed into a parish under the provisions of an act of the 7th and 8th of George III., cap. 43, by taking the three townlands of Armagh-Breague, Corran, and Tullybrow from the perpetual curacy of Lisnadill, in the parish of Armagh, and the townlands of Corclea, Grange-more, and Aughnagorgan from the parish of Keady. The number of statute acres is 9113, of which all is arable land, with the exception of the portion under turf-bog. Considerable parts of the high hills in the townlands of Armagh-Breague and Corran were formerly uncultivated, and covered with heath; but they are now almost entirely under tillage, by which the general aspect of the country has been greatly improved. The hills here abound with clay-slate, and there are indications of lead and copper ores, but as yet no attempt has been made to work either. About two miles from the church is the beautiful and picturesque residence of Mountain Lodge. At Linen-Vale is an extensive bleach-green, and at Corclea another, each capable of finishing more than 20,000 pieces of linen annually, thus affording extensive and constant employment to the working-classes in the neighbourhood. Very little linen-weaving, however, is carried on, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agricultural pursuits.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the alternate patronage of the Rectors of Armagh and Keady, the former of whom contributes £60, and the latter £20, as a stipend for the curate. There is neither glebe land nor glebe-house; a good house, however, about a mile and a half distant from the church, is the residence of the incumbent, and is not likely to be converted to any other use. The church is situated on the summit of a well-cultivated hill, and is a handsome building in the early English style, erected in 1831, at a cost of £600, granted by the Board of First Fruits; it is capable of accommodating about 220 persons, and at present the attendance is so numerous as to make the enlargement of the edifice desirable. In the Roman Catholic divisions, this parish is one of three that form the union of Lisnadill and Ballymacnab: there is a chapel at Grange-more, to which additions have been lately made. Lough Aughnagorgan, the head of the river Callan, is in this parish; and on the townland of Corclea is erected a pillar, used as the South Meridian Arch by the astronomer at the observatory of Armagh.

ARMOY, or ARDMOY, a parish, in the union of BALLYCASTLE, partly in the barony of UPPER DUNLUCK, but chiefly in that of CAREY, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Ballycastle; containing 2766 inhabitants, of whom 315 are in the village. St. Patrick is said to have had a cell at this place, where, in attempting to convert the natives to Christianity, his disciple Udda was killed. The parish is situated on the river Bush, and is intersected by a small river called the Wellwater, which rises in a bog on the eastern side, and, with its tributary streams, flows into the Bush on the western side. The road from Ballycastle to Ballymena passes through, and is crossed by one from east to west, and by another from north-east to south-west. Armoey comprises 9349 statute acres, of which 826½ are in Upper Dunlun and 852½ in Carey; about seven-tenths are arable, pasture, and meadow. The surface is broken by a ridge of mountains which take their names from the townlands contiguous, and of which the north side affords pasturage for cattle, and the summits are heathy and barren; nine-tenths of the great hill of Knocklaid, the highest in the county, are good arable and pasture land. That portion of the parish which is under tillage is in a very high state of cultivation; the system of agriculture is rapidly improving; and composts of lime and earth, or moss, are used as manure for potatoes, by which the produce is greatly increased. There are three bogs, called respectively Ballykenvir, Breen, and Belaney, and the small bog of Moninacloygh; and turf may be had on the sides and summits of all the mountains. Several quarries of excellent white limestone and basalt afford good materials for building, and for repairing the roads. The village contains some handsome houses, new, and well built; new roads have been opened, and bridges constructed over the river Wellwater. A post-office has been lately established, the mail being conveyed by foot to Ballymoney. Fairs for horses, horned-cattle, and pigs, are held on Jan. 25th, Feb. 25th, March 29th, May 25th, Aug. 16th, Nov. 14th, and Dec. 26th.

The whole of the parish, with the exception of a few townlands, and part of the village of Armoey, belongs to the see of Connor. The living was formerly a vicarage, the rectory being appropriate to the archdeaconry from the year 1609 till 1831, when, upon the decease of Dr. Trail, the last archdeacon, the living became a rectory under the provisions of Bishop Mant's act; it is in the patronage of the Bishop, and the tithe rent-charge is £169. The church, situated in the centre of the parish, was rebuilt in 1820, a loan of £415 having been obtained from the Board of First Fruits; it is a neat plain edifice, and has been repaired by a grant of £128 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built in 1807, at an expense of £376: the glebe comprises 23 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is united with that of Ballintoy, in which there is a chapel: that in Armoey is a small edifice. There is also a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. In the churchyard are the remains of an ancient round tower, 47½ feet in circumference and 36 feet high; the late reactor enclosed the upper part with a dome of wood and stone, in which is placed the church bell. Some beautifully clear crystals, called Irish diamonds, are found on Knocklaid; and fragments of gneiss, porphyry, and mica-slate, are met with in various parts of the parish.

ARRAN ISLANDS, a barony, in the union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 30 miles (W. S. W.) from Galway; containing 3521 inhabitants. This barony consists of a group of islands called the South Arran Isles, situated in the centre of the mouth of Galway bay, and stretching south-east and north-west from 59° to 53° (N. Lat.), and from 9° 30' to 9° 42' (W. Lon.). They comprise Arranmore or the Great Arran to the west, Ennismain or Innismain (called also the Middle Island), and Innishere or the Eastern island, which are all three thickly inhabited; also the small rocky isles called Straw Island, the Branch Isles, and Illane-Earbach or the Western Isle. They are supposed to be the remains of a high barrier of land separated at some remote period by the violence of the sea; and from evident appearances of their having been anciently overspread with wood, their retired situation, and the existence of Druidical remains, they are thought to have been appropriated to the celebration of the religious rites of the early Irish, prior to the introduction of Christianity. The Firbolg tribes had possession of these islands at a very early period; and in the third century they were held, it is said, by the sept of Eogan More, King of Thomond. They subsequently became the residence of St. Ibar, one of the missionaries sent to Ireland before the time of St. Patrick; and in the fifth century the Great Island was given by Angus, King of Cashel, to St. Endeus or St. Enda, who founded several monasteries, and built several churches, the principal of which was named after him, Kill-Enda, now called Killeany. This island soon became celebrated for its number of holy men, and such was the fame of St. Enda for sanctity, that it was visited during his lifetime by St. Kieran, St. Brendan, and the celebrated Columbkil; it still bears the name of "Arran of the Saints." In 546 it was agreed between the kings of Munster and Connaught, whose territories were separated by the bay of Galway, that these islands should be independent of both, and pay tribute to neither. In 1081 the Great Island was ravaged by the Danes. The sept of Mac Tiege O'Brien were temporal lords of the islands from a very remote period, and the inhabitants of the English part of the town of Galway entered early into strict alliance and friendship with them; but this compact did not save the islands from being plundered and burnt by Sir John D'Arcy, Lord Justice of Ireland, who, in 1334, sailed round the western coast with a fleet of 56 vessels. In 1485 a monastery for Franciscans was founded in the Great Island, in which was also erected a famous abbey for Canons Regular.

In the reign of Elizabeth the O'Briens were expelled by the sept of O'Flaherty, of the neighbouring main land of Connaught. On this occasion the mayor and sheriffs of Galway sent a petition to the queen in favour of the former, to whom, they state, they paid an additional tribute of wine in consideration of their protection, and of their expenses in guarding the bay and harbour of Galway against pirates and coast plunderers. In consequence of this petition, a commission was issued, under which it appeared that the islands belonged of right to the crown; and in 1587 letters-patent were granted, by which the queen, instead of restoring them to the ancient proprietors, gave them to John Rawson, of Athlone, on condition of his keeping constantly on them 20 foot soldiers of the English nation. This property afterwards became vested in Sir Robert Lynch, of Galway; but the Clan Tiegies still claimed it as their patrimony, and taking advantage of the troubles of 1641, prepared, with the assistance of Boetius Clanchy the Younger, a man of great property and influence in the county of Clare, to invade the islands. The execution of their design was, however, prevented by the timely interference of the Marquess of Clanricarde and the Earl of Thomond. In 1651, when the royal authority was fast declining, the marquess placed 200 musqueteers on these islands, under the command of Sir Robert Lynch; the fort of Ardryn, in the Great Island, was soon after repaired, and mounted with cannon; and by these means the isles held out against the parliamentary forces for nearly twelve months after the surrender of Galway. In December of that year, the Irish, defeated in every other quarter, landed here 700 men in boats from lar Connaught and Inis Bophin; and on the 9th of the following January, 1300 of the parliamentary infantry were shipped from the bay of Galway to attack them; while 600 more marched from the town to lar Connaught, to be sent thence, if necessary, to their aid. On the 13th the islands surrendered, on condition that quarter should be given to all within the fort, and that they should have six weeks allowed them to retire to Spain, or any other country then at peace with England. Sir Robert Lynch, the late proprietor, being declared a traitor, the property was forfeited and granted to Erasmus Smith, one of the most considerable of the London adventurers, from whom it was purchased by Richard Butler, fifth son of James, first duke of Ormonde; who was created Earl of Arran in 1662, and to whom it was confirmed by royal patent under the Act of Settlement. On the surrender of Galway to the forces of William III., in 1691, Arran was again garrisoned, and a barrack was erected, in which soldiers were quartered for many years. In 1693, the title of Earl of the Isles of Arran was conferred on Charles, brother of the second duke of Ormonde, with whom it became extinct in 1758; it was revived in favour of Sir Arthur Gore, Bart., in 1762, and from him the title has descended to the present earl. The islands are now the property of the Digby family.

Their appearance, on approaching, is awfully impressive; the dark cliffs opposing to the billows that roll impetuously against them a perpendicular barrier, several hundred feet high, of rugged masses shelving abruptly towards the base, and perforated with various winding cavities worn by the violence of the waves. Arranmore, or the Great Island, which is the most northern of the three, is about 11 miles in length, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile at its greatest breadth, and comprises 7635 statute acres; it includes the villages of Killeany, Kilmurvey, and Onought, and the hamlets of Icararn, Ballyneerega, Mannister, Cownagb, Gortnagopple, Furanakurk, Cregacarean, Shran, and Bungowla. There are 2592 inhabitants. In the centre is a signal tower; and at Oagbill, on the summit, is a lighthouse, elevated 498 feet above the level of the sea at high water, and exhibiting a bright revolving light from 21 reflectors, which attains its greatest magnitude every three minutes, and may be seen from all points at a distance of 28 nautical miles, in clear weather. The island is bounded on the south and west by rocky cliffs, from 300 to 400 feet high; but on the north are low shelving rocks and sandy beaches: the passage to the northward is called the North Sound, or entrance to the bay of Galway. There is only one safe harbour, called Killeany or Arran bay: in its upper part is a small pier, erected by order of the Fishery Board in 1822, and which has eight feet of water. Ennismain, or the Middle Island, is separated from Arranmore by Gregory Sound, which is about four miles broad, and navigable from shore to shore; the isle is of irregular form, about eight miles in circumference, and comprises the village of Maber, and the hamlets of Moneenarouga, Lissheen, Ballindoon, and Kinavalla. Its area is 2252 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, and its population amounts to 473. The male inhabitants are chiefly engaged in fishing and making kelp; they have a few row-boats and a number of canoes, or corachs, made of osiers and covered with pitched canvas. The northern point of this island is lofty and rugged, but terminates in a low sandy beach; and on several sides it is boldly perpendicular. Innishire, or the Eastern Island, is separated from Ennismain by a rocky and dangerous passage, called Foul Sound, which is about a league broad, with a ledge of rocks baying on it six feet of water. It is a mile and a half in length, three-quarters of a mile in breadth, and four miles in circumference; comprising 1400 statute acres, and including the village of Temore, and the hamlets of Foranna, Castle, and Cleganough. The tillage is chiefly for potatoes, with a little rye; but the inhabitants, in number 456, live principally by fishing and by making kelp, which is said to be the best brought to the Galway market. There is a signal tower on the island, and near it an old castle. To the west of Arranmore are the Branach Isles, two of which, about eight acres in extent, afford good pasturage, and the third is a perpendicular and barren rock of about two acres.

The surface of all the islands is barren rock, interspersed with numerous verdant and fertile spots. There are many springs and rivulets; but these afford in dry seasons a very inadequate supply, and water is either brought from the main land for the use of the cattle, or the cattle are removed thither during the continuance of the drought. The best soils are near the shore, and are sandy, with a mixture of rich loam. The prevailing crops are, potatoes, rye, and a small kind of black oats; the inhabitants raise also barley and wheat, for which they apply an additional portion of sea-weed, their only manure; and they grow small quantities of flax; but the produce of their harvests seldom exceeds what is required for their own consumption. The pasture land is appropriated to sheep and goats, and a few cows and horses, for which the farmers also reserve some meadow: the mutton is of fine flavour and superior quality; but the most profitable stock is their breed of calves, which are reputed to be the best in Ireland, and are much sought after by the Connaught graziers. The grasses are intermingled with a variety of medicinal and sweet herbs, among which the wild garlic is so abundant as to give a flavour to the butter. The plant called Rineen, or "fair flax," is much relied on for its medicinal virtues in almost all cases; the tormentil root serves in place of bark for tanning; and there is another plant which gives a fine blue dye, and is used in colouring the woollen-cloth which the islanders manufacture for their own wear. The fisheries are a great source of profit, and in the whole employ about 120 boats; of these, 30 or 40 have sails and are of from five to ten tons' burthen; the rest are small row-boats and canoes, or corachs. The spring and beginning of the summer are the season for the spillard-fishery; immense quantities of cod, ling, haddock, turbot, gurnet, mackerel, glassin, bream, and herrings are taken here; and lobsters, crabs, cockles, and muscles are also found in abundance. The inhabitants rely chiefly, however, on the herring-fishery, which is very productive; and in April and May, many of them are employed in spearing the sun-fish, or hasking shark, from the liver of which they extract considerable quantities of oil. Hares and rabbits abound in these islands, which are also frequented by plovers, gannets, pigeons, ducks, and other wild-fowl; and the cliffs are the resort of numerous puffins, which are taken for the sake of their feathers by cragmen, who descend the cliffs at night by means of a rope fastened round the body, and lowered by four or five of their companions. In one of the islands, a very fine stratum of dove-coloured and black marble has been discovered; and from the various natural resources of this apparently barren district, the inhabitants are enabled to pay a rental of from £2000 to £3000 per annum to the proprietor. The most remarkable of the natural curiosities are the three caverns called the Puffing Holes, at the southern extremity of Arranmore; they communicate with the sea, and have apertures in the surface of the cliff, about 20 perches from its brink, from which, during the prevalence of strong westerly winds, prodigious columns of water are projected to the height of a ship's mast.

The three islands form three parishes in the diocese of Tuam, and, in respect to their vicarages, are part of the union of Ballynakill, from the church of which they are 28 miles distant; the rectories are inappropriate in the Digby family. The tithe rent-charge is £36, of which £28. 16. are payable to the impropriator. In the Roman Catholic divisions the isles form one parish, which is served by a clergyman resident at Oaghill, where a chapel, a neat slated building, has been erected. There are still some very interesting remains not only of Druidical antiquity, but also of the ancient churches and monasteries. The ruins of the old abbey of Kill-Enda are situated nearly at the eastern extremity of the largest island; and in the opposite direction are the ruins of seven churches, one of which, called Tempeil-Breanin, was probably dedicated to that saint. Near it is a holy well, and throughout the island are various others, and also numerous ancient crosses. In Ennismain are the ruins of two churches, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin; and in Innishire, formerly called Arran Coemhain, were three, namely, St. Coemhain's or Kerin's, St. Paul's, and Kill-i-Gradhndomhain, with the first of which was connected a monastery founded by St. Fechin. The most remarkable of the primitive fortifications is Dun-Engus, situated on the summit of a great precipice overhanging the sea: it consists of three inclosures, the largest of which is encircled by a rampart of large stones standing on end; and there are one of similar size and others smaller. From the secluded situation of these islands, the language, manners, customs, and dress of the natives are peculiarly primitive; instances of longevity are remarkable. The shoes worn are simply a piece of raw cow-hide, rather longer than the foot, and stitched close at the toes and heel with a piece of fishing-line. The Irish language is commonly spoken, and being replete with primitive words, varies from the dialect of the natives of the main land, though not so as to be unintelligible; a great portion of the inhabitants, however, speak good English. In the Great Island is a place called the Field of Skulls, from the number of human bones found in it, and thence supposed to have been the site of a battle fought during some intestine quarrel of the O'Briens.

ARRANMORE, an island, in the parish of TEMPLE-CROAN, union of GLENTIES, barony of BOYLAGE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (W.N.W.) from Rutland. This is the largest of a group of islands called the Rosses, lying off the north-west coast, about two miles from the shore, in lat. 54° 51' 45" (N.), and lon. 5° 31' 45" (W.). It is three miles in length and three in breadth, and is about nine miles distant from the main land; comprising 4355 statute acres, of which about 650 are under cultivation or in pasture, and the remainder is rugged mountain. In 1784 a large herring-fishery was carried on successfully on this part of the coast, in which 400 sail of vessels and about 1000 small boats were employed; but within the last 40 or 50 years it has been entirely discontinued. There are three lakes, Lough Shore, Lough Asheskey, and Lough Nameena: the highest point of land is Arran, 745 feet above the level of the sea. On the north point of the island, which is a large rock of granite, was formerly a lighthouse, fitted up with an improved apparatus in 1817 by the corporation for the improvements of the port of Dublin, and which has since been superseded by one on Tory Island; the house remains, but is not lighted. There is good anchorage on the east side of the island, in an open roadstead. In the Roman Catholic divisions this place forms part of the parish of Templemore or Templecroder, in which is the chapel, where divine service is performed every third Sunday.

ARTAGH.—See TAUGHBOYNE.

ARTANE, otherwise ARTANE, a parish, in the union of NORTH DUBLIN, barony of COOLOCK, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N.) from the Post-office, Dublin; containing 367 inhabitants, and comprising 953½ statute acres. The village is situated on the road from Dublin to Malahide, and has a receiving-house for letters to and from the metropolis. Artane Castle was long the property of the Donellans of Ravensdale, and is said to have been the scene of the death of John Alen or Alan, Archbishop of Dublin, who, in endeavouring to escape from the vengeance of the house of Kildare, which he had provoked by his adherence to the will and measures of Cardinal Wolsey, was shipwrecked near Clontarf. Being made prisoner by some followers of that family, he was brought before Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, then posted here with the insurgent army, whom he earnestly entreated to spare his life; but, either failing in his supplications, or from the wilful misconstruction of a contemptuous expression of Fitzgerald's into a sentence of death on the part of those around him, as variously alleged by different writers, he was instantly slain in the great hall of the castle, on the 28th of July, 1534. On the breaking out of hostilities in 1641, it was taken by Luke Netterville, one of the Roman Catholic leaders, at the head of a body of royalists, and was garrisoned. The castle was pulled down in 1825, and on its site and with its materials was erected a handsome house, which commands a splendid view of the islands of Lambay and Ireland's Eye, the Hill of Howth, and the Dublin and Wicklow mountains. In its ecclesiastical concerns this is a chapelry, in the diocese of Dublin, and one of three which, with the rectory of Finglas and the curacy of St. Werburgh's, Dublin, constitute the corps of the chancellorship in the cathedral of St. Patrick, Dublin, which is in the patronage of the Archbishop. The church is a picturesque ruin, partly covered with ivy: in the burial-ground is a tombstone to the Hollywood family, to which the manor belonged for many ages, and of which John Hollywood, a distinguished mathematician and philosopher of the 13th century, was a member. In the Roman Catholic divisions Artnane is in the district of Clontarf, Coolock, and Santry. A neat school-house for boys and girls, with apartments for the master and mistress, was built near the old church by the late M. Boyle, Esq., in 1832, at an expense of more than £600, of which £150 were repaid by the National Board, which contributes £25 per annum towards the support of the school, Mr. Boyle having in 1833 bequeathed £10 per annum for the same purpose.

ARTHURSTOWN, or KING'S-BAY, a post-village, in the parish of St. James, union of New Ross, barony of SHELBOURNE, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 9½ miles (S. E. by S.) from New Ross, and 80 (S. by W.) from Dublin; containing 285 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on Waterford barbour, three miles below the junction of the rivers Barrow, Suir, and Nore, derived its origin and name from its proprietor, Arthur, first lord Templemore, whose seat was here, and by whom it was mostly built. The trade consists principally in the importation of coal and culm from South Wales, and slates from Bangor; and in the exportation to Waterford of corn, pigs, butter, eggs, honey, and poultry. There is a commodious quay, with a muddy strand open to Waterford harbour; and a pier of millstone-grit found in the quarries here, 306 feet in length, and originally intended for the accommodation of the boats employed in the fishery, has been constructed at an expense of £3000, of which £700 were granted by the Fishery Board, and the remainder was defrayed by Lord Templemore. Vessels of 100 tons' burthen can come up close to the pier, but the barbour formed by it has lately become partially choked with an accumulation of mud, which requires speedy removal and the adoption of some plan calculated to prevent a recurrence of the obstruction. The bay is subject to a heavy sea during the prevalence of south, south-west, and north-west winds. Arthurstown is a chief constabulary police station, and a station of the coast-guard. There is a dispensary, and a fever hospital has been built in connexion with it, and is supported in the usual manner.—See JAMES, St.

ARTICLAVE, a village, in the parish of DUNBOE, union and barony of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Coleraine; containing 450 inhabitants. It lies on the cross roads leading from Coleraine to Downhill and to the sea, and in it are the parochial church, and a place of worship for Presbyterians.

ARTRAMONT, or ARDTRAMONT, a parish, in the union of WEXFORD, barony of EAST SHELMAHER, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N.) from Wexford; containing 754 inhabitants. It is situated on the north-western side of the estuary of the Slaney, and comprises 2376½ statute acres, of which 129 are woodland: the land is of very good quality. A kind of red sandstone adapted for building is quarried in the parish. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and in some parts highly picturesque. Artramount, an elegant seat, is beautifully situated on an eminence surrounded by a fine plantation, and commanding an extensive view of Wexford harbour, and the country adjacent; the demesne is separated from the parish of Tickillen, on the north, by a romantic glen called Eden Vale, the steep sides of which are covered from the water's edge to their summits with young and thriving plantations; and from one point of view are seen three picturesque cascades, formed by the precipitation of the little river Sow from a rocky height of 50 or 60 feet. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns, and is a rectory, forming part of the union of Ardcolm: the tithe rent-charge is £138.9.3. The church has long been in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions Artramount is in the district of Crossabeg, where the chapel is situated. A school for children of both sexes was established in 1818; the school-house, a handsome building in the rustic style, was erected at the expense of Sir Francis le Hunte. Within the demesne are the ruins of Artramount Castle; and there are also vestiges of a Danish fort, with a square moat, in the parish.

ARTREA.—See ARDREA.

ARUNDEL-MILLS, a village, partly in the parish of TEMPLOMALUS, but chiefly in that of DESERT, union of BANDON, barony of IBANE and BARRYROE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 288 inhabitants. It is situated on the shore of the bay of Clonakilty.

ARVAGH, a market-town, and district parish, in the barony of TULLOGHNOHO, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 10½ miles (S. W.) from CAVAN, and, by way of that town, 66 miles (N. W. by W.) from Dublin. Of the population, which is returned with the parish of Killesandra, 615 are in the town. This district parish is situated on the road from Killesandra to Scrabby, near the point of junction of the three counties of CAVAN, LEITRIM, and LONGFORD; and was formed by the disunion of thirty townlands from the parish of Killesandra. The green-crop system of husbandry has been introduced with great success. Near the town is the lake of Scrabs, one of the sources of the river Erne, which, with the lakes through which it runs, is commonly called in its entire extent Lough Erne. The market is on Friday, and is well supplied with provisions: the market-house, situated in the centre of the town, was built by the Earl of Gosford, to whom the town belongs. Fairs are held on Jan. 28th, March 25th, April 1st, May 2nd, June 8th, Aug. 8th, Sept. 23rd, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 23rd. A sub-post office is in connexion with CAVAN; and here is a station of the constabulary police. The living is a perpetual cure, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Killesandra: the perpetual curate has a fixed income of £75 per annum late currency, of which £50 are paid by the incumbent of Killesandra, and £25 from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church was built by aid of a gift of £900 and a loan of £100, in 1819, from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house is small but conveniently built; and the glebe comprises 21 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish remains included in the district of Killesandra, and has a chapel, situated at Corronee. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

ASHBOURNE, a post town or village, in the parish of KILLEGLAND, barony of RATOATH, poor-law union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 12½ miles (S. by E.) from Drogheda, and 10½ (N. by W.) from Dublin, on the road to Londonderry and Belfast; containing 57 houses and 375 inhabitants. It is a constabulary police station, and has fairs on Jan. 6th, April 16th, May 21st, July 29th, and Oct. 31st. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel, a neat modern building; and a dispensary is principally supported by the rector and curate, assisted by some of the parishioners.—See KILLEGLAND.

ASHFIELD, a district parish, in the union of COOTEHILL, barony of TULLAGHGARVEY, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, ½ a mile (S. W.) from Cootehill, on the road to Belturbet. It formerly constituted part of the parish of Killersherdiny, from which it was separated in 1799; and comprises 4426 acres. The land is in general good, and there is very little waste; the system of agriculture is slowly improving. The manufacture of linen for broad sheeting is carried on to a considerable extent. Ashfield Lodge is beautifully situated on an eminence within view of the church, beneath which swiftly flows the Cootehill river, a tributary to Lough Erne: it is surrounded with extensive plantations. Fort Henry was formerly a seat of the Clements family. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the vicar of Killersherdiny: the perpetual curate has a fixed annual income of £92. 8., of which half is payable by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, out of Boulter's fund, and the other half by the vicar. The church is a handsome edifice, with a lofty spire, occupying a very elevated site; it was built by aid of a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits in 1796, and in 1820 the Board also granted £500, of which one-half was a gift and the other a loan. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the same Board, in 1812; the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Killersherdiny: the chapel is situated at Drummury.

ASHFORD, a village or post-town, in the parish of RATHNEW, union of RATHDRUM, barony of NEWCASTLE, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Wicklow, and 2½ (S. by E.) from Dublin. This place, which is on the south side of the river Vartrey, and on the mail-coach road from Dublin, consists of several neat cottages, and is pleasantly situated in the centre of a rich agricultural district; it has a small but well-conducted posting-house and hotel. Fairs are held on April 27th, June 24th, Sept. 8th, and Dec. 16th.—See RATHNEW.

ASHFORD.—See KILLEDEY.

ASKEATON, a market and post town, a parish, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the union of RATHERKALE, barony of LOWER CONNELLO, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, about 16 miles (W. S. W.) from Limerick, and 119 miles (S. W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 4438 inhabitants, of whom 1862 are in the town. This place is indebted for its foundation and early importance to the Fitzgeralds, who had a magnificent castle here, and of whom James, seventh earl of Desmond, founded a monastery in 1490 for Conventual Franciscans, which was reformed, in 1490, by the Observantine friars, and ranked among the finest ecclesiastical structures in Ireland. In 1558, James Fitzgerald, fifteenth earl of Desmond, and High Treasurer of Ireland, died here, and was buried in the monastery. He was succeeded by his son Garret, called by way of distinction the Great Earl, who forfeited his life and his large estates by his participation in the insurrection during the reign of Elizabeth. In 1564 a provincial chapter of the Franciscan order was held in the monastery; but in the hostilities which broke out soon after, the monks were expelled and some of them put to death by the English forces. The Earl of Desmond, who, in 1573, had been in the custody of the mayor of Dublin, made his escape to the castle of this place, which, in 1579, he garrisoned against the queen's forces under Sir Nicholas Malby. In April of the following year it was attacked by Sir George Carew; the garrison retired during the night, leaving a train of gunpowder which blew up part of the fortress, and the English took possession of the remainder of the castle, which was the last that held out for this powerful earl. In 1642, Lord Broghill sent 200 men to defend the town, which was then walled, and to prevent the inhabitants from revolting to the insurgents; it was for some time bravely defended by this force, but was at length compelled to surrender. In 1648 the Confederate Roman Catholics took possession of the abbey, and commenced repairing and restoring it.

The town is pleasantly situated on the road from Limerick to Tarbert, and on the banks of the river Deel, which discharges itself into the Shannon about two miles below, and is here crossed by an ancient bridge of five arches connecting the opposite portions of the town: it contains 314 houses, of very indifferent appearance. The Deel runs through the demesne of Inchirourk-More, and has a waterfall, or salmon-leap, the scenery of which is wild and romantic; there is a beautiful view of it from the town. The fishery was formerly of considerable value, but it has been much injured by the erection of the Scotch weirs on the Shannon. The trade consists principally in grain and flour, which have sometimes been exported direct to the foreign markets: there are two large flour-mills; one near the castle is very extensive. The town is advantageously situated for trade, from its vicinity to the Shannon, and from its position on the Deel, a good river up which the tide flows, capable of admitting vessels of 60 tons' burthen, and which might be deepened at a trifling expense, so as to admit vessels drawing 15 feet of water to the bridge: the quays are spacious. In the spring, considerable quantities of sea-weed and sand are landed for manure. The market-day is Tuesday, and a market-house has been erected on ground given by R. Hunt, Esq.: fairs are held on July 30th, and Oct. 9th, for horses, cattle, and sheep. There is a sub-post office; also a station of the constabulary police. The borough was incorporated by charter of the 11th of James I. (1613), under the style of "the Sovereign, Free Burgesses, and Community of the Borough of Askeaton;" and the corporation was made to consist of a sovereign and 12 free burgesses, who, amongst other privileges, were empowered to have a court of record, to be held every Monday, for the trial of all actions personal to the extent of five marks. It returned two members to the Irish parliament until the Union, when it was deprived of the franchise; and of the £15,000 awarded in compensation for the loss of that privilege, £6850 were paid to Henry Thomas, Earl of Carrick, £6850 to the trustees of the will of Hugh, Lord Massey, £1100 to Sir Vere Hunt, Bart., and £200 to Sir Joseph Hoare, Bart. The corporation has since become extinct. A court of petty-sessions is held before the county magistrates every alternate Tuesday. A manorial court, with jurisdiction to the amount of £10 late currency, was formerly held every month before the seneschal, who was appointed by Sir Matthew Blakiston, Bart., lord of the manor; but it has been discontinued in consequence of the establishment of the petty-sessions, and no seneschal has been appointed since the death of the last, in 1834.

The PARISH comprises 6521 statute acres. The surface is very undulating, and numerous rocky knolls rise considerably above the ordinary level: the lands are arable and pasture; the soil is every where light. The system of agriculture, though advancing, is still capable of further improvement. Limestone of good quality is obtained in great abundance; and copper-ore has been discovered in several places, but no attempt has been hitherto made to work it. The scenery is pleasantly diversified, and enlivened with some gentlemen's seats. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, with the rectory of Lisakeery and the vicarage of Iverus united, forming the union of Askeaton, in the patronage of Sir Matthew Blakiston, in whom the rectory is impropriate. The tithe rent-charge of Askeaton is £337. 10., of which £225 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the incumbent; the whole union produces to the incumbent a rent-charge of £307. The church was built at a cost of £1058, of which £938 were provided by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house, a large and handsome residence, was built in 1828, at an expense of £800, of which £450 were a gift, and £350 a loan, from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district comprising the parishes of Askeaton, Iverus, Lisakeery, and Tomdeely; there are two chapels, one in the town, and one at Ballysteane, both thatched buildings. There is also a dispensary.

The old parochial church was that of a preceptory of Knights Templars, founded in 1298. On the south side is a transept, now in ruins, separated from the church by two lofty arches which have been rudely closed up; and near the east end are the remains of an ancient tower, square at the base and octagonal above. This tower, and also the church and transept, are precisely in the state described in the Poeta Hibernia, published more than 200 years since. To the west of the church are the remains of the once stately castle, boldly situated on a rock of limestone in the river Deel: and near it are those of the banqueting-house, a very spacious and elegant building, and, with the exception of the roof, still in a very perfect state; the arched vaults beneath are very extensive, and the windows of the great hall are lofty and of beautiful design. On the eastern bank of the river, and at a short distance to the north, are the venerable ruins of the Franciscan abbey. It is built entirely of the dark grey marble which is found here in such abundance: the cloisters are nearly entire, and of beautiful character; on each side of the inclosed quadrangle are twelve lofty pointed arches supported by cylindrical columns with richly-moulded capitals; and in the centre of the square is an ancient thorn of stately growth. The church, with the exception of the roof, is partly standing: the eastern gable, with its lofty window, has some details in the later English style; the other portions are much decayed, and large masses of the walls lie scattered around, as if detached by the force of gunpowder. These ruins are close to the bank of the river, and are almost washed by every tide. Two miles north of the town are the ruins of Court Browne Castle, seated on an eminence overlooking the Shannon. In 1834 two very splendid fibule of pure gold were found near the town; and, in the following year, several ancient gold coins were discovered in sinking the foundation of a wall on the west side of the river. Silver chalices, crossers, and a great number of coins, have been found near the abbey and the castle.

ASSEY, or ATHSY, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of LOWER DERC, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Navan, on the river Boyne; containing 138 inhabitants. It comprises 1218½ statute acres; the land, though not rich, is tolerably productive; a considerable portion is under tillage, and the remainder is good grazing land. The house of Bellinter is situated in a well-wooded demesne of more than 500 acres, stretching into the adjoining parish of Balscon. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, to which the rectory of Balscon was united by diocesan authority in 1826, together forming the union of Assey, in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge of the union is £99. There is neither church nor glebe-house; the occasional duties are performed by the incumbent of Kilmessan, who receives £10 per annum, and has the glebe, which consists of three acres. The Commissioners of Ecclesiastical Inquiry, in 1831, recommended that the two parishes of Assey and Balscon should be formed into one, to be called the parish of Athsy, and that a church and glebe-house for a resident minister should be erected. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Dunsany and Kilmessan. Of the ancient castle of Asigh, on the right bank of the Boyne, there remains a square massive tower, commanding an extensive view of the hills of Taragh and Skryne: about 30 yards northward are the ruins of a small chapel.

ATHASSEL, a parish, in the union of TIPPERARY, barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (W.) from Cashel: the population and extent are returned with the parish of Relickmurry. This place, which is situated on the river Suir, was distinguished for its priory, founded towards the close of the 12th century by William Fitz Aldelm de Burgho, for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, and dedicated to St. Edmund the King and Martyr. In 1319 the town was set on fire by Lord John, brother of Lord Maurice Fitz-Thomas; and, in 1329, Bryan O'Brien burned it to the ground: there are now only some slight traces of its site. The priory, which was amply endowed, and of which the abbot sat in parliament, continued to flourish till the reign of Edward VI., when it was dissolved; and in that of Philip and Mary it was, with other possessions, granted to Thomas, Earl of Ormonde. The remains are extensive and highly interesting, and show the buildings to have been distinguished for elegance and magnificence, and equal, if not superior, to any monastic structure in the kingdom. In this monastery was interred Richard de Burgho, second earl of Ulster, called, from his complexion, the Red, who, after giving a splendid entertainment to the nobles and his friends at Kilkenny, in 1326, retired hither and soon after died. Castle Park is a spacious and well-built mansion, pleasantly situated in a richly planted demesne, in which are some remains of an ancient castle; Ballycarron, also, has an extensive and finely planted demesne. Golden Hills is a castellated residence. Suir Castle, a modern edifice, is situated on the banks of the Suir, and within the demesne are the ruins of a castle with a square tower. The parish is in the diocese of Cashel, and is a rectory, forming part of the union of Relickmurry; in the Roman Catholic divisions it forms part of the district of Golden.

ATHBOY, a market and post town, a parish, and formerly a borough, in the union of TRIM, barony of LUNE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (N.W.) from Trim, and 28 (N.W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 5365 inhabitants, of whom 1826 are in the town. This place derives its name, signifying in the Irish language "the yellow ford," from its situation on a stream which falls into the river Boyne near Trim. The town contains 324 houses, and is at present a place of very little trade: the road from Oldcastle to Dublin runs through it; there is a very large flour-mill. The market is on Thursday, and is well supplied with corn and provisions. The principal fairs are held on the Thursday before Jan. 28th, May 4th, Aug. 4th, and Nov. 7th; there are others on March 3rd and 10th, June 22nd and 30th, and Sept. 22nd and 29th, but they are very inconspicuous. Athboy is within the district of Drogheda, and is a chief station of the constabulary police.

In the 9th of Henry IV. (1407), a charter was granted on petition from the provost and commonalty, which, after setting forth that the town had been from time immemorial an ancient borough, confirmed all existing privileges, and bestowed a guild mercatory, freedom from tolls and customs throughout the king's dominions, and other immunities. Henry VI., in 1446, gave a confirmatory charter, by which additional customs were conferred for a term of 60 years. These charters, again, were confirmed in the 9th of Henry VII.; and in the 9th of James I. (1612), on a surrender of the corporation property, a charter of inspection and confirmation was granted, under which the corporation was entitled "the Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town of Athboy." This charter vested the right of electing the provost in the burgesses and freemen, and the burgesses and all inferior officers were to be chosen by the corporation at large. It ordained that the provost should be a justice of the peace, and prohibited all other justices from acting within the borough, which comprised an extent of one mile beyond the town in every direction: it also granted a court of record, with jurisdiction to the amount of £10. From the second of Elizabeth the borough returned two representatives to the Irish parliament, who were exclusively elected by the members of the corporation; but it was disfranchised at the Union, when the £15,000 compensation money for the loss of this privilege was awarded to the trustees under the will of John, Earl of Darnley, to be applied to the trusts of the will. The corporation then fell into disuse, and is now extinct. By patent granted in 1694 to Thomas Bligh, Esq., "the town's lands and commons," and several other denominations of land, were erected into a manor, and power was given to him and his heirs to hold a court leet twice in the year, and a court baron every three weeks, or not so often, before a seneschal; but no manor court has been held, or seneschal appointed, since the beginning of the present century. Petty-sessions are held every third Wednesday by the county magistrates.

The parish extends five Irish miles in length and four in breadth, and comprises 11,584 statute acres: the land is mostly of very good quality, and is principally under grass; there is an abundance of limestone, used both for building and as manure. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, to which the rectory and vicarage of Girty, and the rectories of Moyagher, Rathmore, and Kildalky were united by act of council in 1678, now forming the union of Athboy, in the patronage of the Crown, the Lord-Primate, and the Bishop of Meath: the rectory is appropriate to the Lord-Primate. The tithe rent-charge of Athboy is £420, of which £270 are payable to the lessee of the Lord-Primate, and £150 to the vicar; and the rent-charge of the entire union payable to the incumbent is £360. The church has an ancient tower, but the body of the building is somewhat modern; it has been enlarged at the cost of £770, of which £670 were provided by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house, situated near the town, was built in 1818, at an expense of £1700, principally defrayed by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1050 from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises six acres in Athboy, and 1½ in Girty. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district comprising the parishes of Athboy and Rathmore: the chapel is a handsome and commodious edifice in the ancient style of architecture, with a steeple 90 feet high; it is lighted by five windows of considerable dimensions on each side, and three at each end, and has three entrances in front. There is a dispensary; and three almshouses were founded by the late Earl of Darnley, containing apartments for twelve poor widows, who have each an annual allowance of £5. 5., with a garden, and ten kishes of turf; about 43 out-pensioners also receive weekly allowances from his lordship's successor. A monastery of Carmelite friars was founded here early in the 14th century, and, with its possessions, was granted in the 34th of Henry VIII. to Thomas Casey. There are some picturesque remains of the ancient church; at Frayne are considerable ruins of two castles, and at Causestown the ruins of a third. This town confers the inferior title of Viscount on the Earl of Darnley; John Bligh, Baron Clifton of Rathmore, having been advanced to the dignity of Viscount Darnley of Athboy on the 7th of March, 1722-3.

ATHEA, or TEMPLE-ATHEA, a village, in the parish of RATHRONAN, union of NEWCASTLE, barony of SHANID, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W.) from Newcastle; containing 215 inhabitants. It is picturesquely situated on the river Geale, and on the road to Shanagolden. In it is the Roman Catholic chapel of the district of Athea; also a constabulary station.

town, which is wholly within the barony of Athenry. This place, anciently called Athnere, is said to have derived its name from Ath-na-Riagh, "the King's ford," or "the abode of a King." Sir James Ware considers it to have been the chief town of the Anteri, who, according to Ptolemy, were the ancient inhabitants of this part of the country. It was the first town established by the De Burgos and Berminghams, the Anglo-Norman invaders of Connanght, and at a remote period was surrounded with walls and became a place of importance. In the reign of John, Meyler de Bermingham granted a site of land here for the foundation of a Dominican monastery, and contributed towards the erection of the buildings, which were completed in 1261. Florence O'Flin, Archbishop of Tuam, and the Earls of Ulster and many others were munificent benefactors to this establishment, which became very extensive and wealthy, and was the chief burial-place of the earls and of all the principal families of this part of Ireland. Indulgences for the benefit of the monastery were granted by the Pope in 1400, and in 1423 its church was burned down; in 1427, some of the monks obtained licence from the Pope to found two subordinate establishments; and in 1445 Pope Eugene IV. renewed the bull of Pope Martin for repairing the church, at which time there were 30 brethren in the monastery. A Franciscan friary was founded here by Thomas, Earl of Kildare, in 1464; and chapels were successively erected by his wife, the Earl of Desmond, and O'Tully.

In 1577, the two sons of the Earl of Clanricarde, called the "Mac-an-Earlas," renouncing the submission which they had recently made to Queen Elizabeth, assembled their partisans in considerable force and sacked the town, destroyed the few houses that had recently been built, set fire to the new gates, and drove away the workmen employed in repairing the fortifications and in erecting other buildings which had been undertaken by the chief governor, Sir Henry Sidney. From this period the town remained in a deserted condition till 1584, when Robert Foyle, John Browne, and other of its former inhabitants, petitioned the queen's council in England for such encouragement as would enable them to bring over English artisans and tradesmen to settle in the town, to rebuild and improve it, and to support a sufficient force for its future protection. The queen, in 1585, directed the lord-deputy to accede to their request forthwith; and although no record exists of any such grant having passed the seal, several buildings were erected and numerous improvements made. In 1596 the northern Irish invested the town, burned the gates, and forced an entrance; they were repulsed in an attack on the castle, which was bravely defended, but they took possession of all the wall towers, and made prisoners of the inhabitants who guarded them. They afterwards set fire to the town, which, with the exception only of the castle, the abbey, and the church, was reduced to ashes, and from this time seems to have been entirely neglected except by its immediate proprietors. In 1644 the Dominican establishment was revived, and converted into a university; and in 1662 a writ of privy seal was issued on behalf of the inhabitants; but the town, which had once held the second rank in the county, never recovered its ancient importance. It is situated on the roads from Orammore to Monivac, and from Longhrea to Tuam, and contains 254 houses: there is a sub-post office, in connexion with Craughwell. The regular market, with a fair in October, was granted to Sir Wm. Parsons, Bart., in 1629, and is on Friday, but is only indifferently attended; a market is also held on Sunday, and the principal shops of the town are kept open during the whole of that day. Fairs for sheep and cattle are held on May 5th, July 2nd, and Oct. 20th, of which that in July is the largest. A constabulary police force is stationed here.

The borough, which was lately divested of its privileges, was very ancient, and probably existed by prescription. From a murage grant made to the "bailiffs and honest men of Athenry," in the 4th of Edward II. (1310), it would appear that there had been a corporation previously; and writs of the first and some subsequent years of the reign of Richard II. show that it then returned representatives to parliament. Queen Elizabeth, by letters-patent dated at Greenwich in the 16th of her reign, granted to the portreeve and burgesses divers extensive privileges, and in the same year she gave them the site and precincts of the Dominican monastery. In 1578 she conferred upon them various rectories and tithes; but all these privileges and possessions appear to have become forfeited during the civil dissensions which soon afterwards ensued, as Charles II., by his letters under the privy seal in 1662, after reciting the petition of "the ancient inhabitants, natives, and freemen of the old corporation of Athenry," and other particulars referring to the borough, ordered that they should be forthwith reinvested as a corporation, with all their rights and estates, excepting such inhabitants as had been disloyal to his government. A charter was granted in the 4th of James II., on a seizure of the franchises, but it does not appear to have been accepted or acted upon. In the grant of Elizabeth, under which the borough continued to be governed till its extinction, the corporation is styled "the Portreeve, Burgesses, and Freemen of the Corporation of the Town and Liberties of Athenry." The body consisted of a portreeve and an unlimited number of burgesses and freemen, who were empowered to appoint a common clerk and "all such other necessary servants as Trim used;" but the only inferior officers were a serjeant-at-mace, cramer, pound-keeper, two appraisers, and a bellman, appointed by the portreeve. The portreeve was annually elected on the 14th of Sept., by the portreeve and burgesses, from three burgesses nominated on the preceding day by the same body, and was sworn in on the 29th: the burgesses were nominated on one day, elected on the next, and sworn on the 29th of Sept., and were latterly about twenty in number. By the act of the 3rd and 4th of Victoria, cap. 108, the corporation was dissolved, and any property it possessed became vested in the guardians of the poor of the two unions. The borough returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union; the £15,000 awarded as compensation for the abolition of its franchise was paid to the trustees of the marriage settlement of Theophilus Blakeney, Esq. The ancient limits of the borough comprehend the town, and a surrounding agricultural district called "the liberties." The portreeve, who had power to appoint a deputy, was a justice of the peace within the borough and its liberties, clerk of the market, and sole judge in the borough court. The town or portreeve's court was held for all pleas, real and personal, to an unlimited amount, as often as business required, which of late had been but seldom, and generally on a Monday, not in any fixed court-house or place, but in different parts of the town; the ordinary process was by attachment against the debtor's goods, on affidavit made by the plaintiff. Petty-sessions are held in the town every Monday, at which several of the county magistrates usually attend.

The PARISH comprises 24,950½ statute acres: the system of agriculture is somewhat improved; there is still, however, a considerable extent of unreclaimed bog. A coal-pit was opened some years since at Castle Lambert, and a considerable quantity of coal was found, but the working was soon discontinued. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tasm; the rectory is partly appropriate to the prebend of Taghsaxon, but is principally consolidated with the vicarage, to which are united the chapelries of Abbert and Derry-maclooughy, and which is in the patronage of the Crown for two turns, and the Bishop for one. The tithe rent-charge is £806. 5., of which £5. 13. are payable to the prebendary, and the remainder to the incumbent. The church is a very neat edifice, built in 1928, by aid of a gift of £1500 from the Board of First Fruits; and there is also a church at Monivae, served by a perpetual curate. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a plain slated building in the town. Some remains exist of the old town walls and of one of the gates. The ruins of the Dominican monastery evince its ancient extent and grandeur: the tower of the church remained till 1845, when it fell to the ground; the east window is of good design. On Mr. Hickman's estate is a chalybeate spring, which is much resorted to. Athenry formerly gave the title of Baron to the family of Bermingham, and was the premier barony of Ireland, having been created in 1178; this title has been claimed by Edmund Bermingham, Esq., of Dalgan, and also by the family of St. George, of Tyrone, in the county of Galway.

ATHLACCA, or ATHLATRICKE, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSHMA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Bruff; containing 1379 inhabitants. This place was anciently the residence of the powerful family of De Lacy, who were proprietors of the surrounding territory, and had two very strong castles, one near the present village, and the other at Tullerbuoy, now Castle Ivers. In 1691, a sanguinary battle was fought here between the Irish adherents of James II., and a force of militia and dragoons commanded by Capt. O'Dell on the part of William III.; the latter were defeated with great slaughter. The parish is situated on the road from Croom to Kilmallock, and is intersected by a beautiful little river called the Morning Star, which falls into the Maigue about a mile below the village. It comprises 5511 statute acres; the land is fertile, resting on a substratum of limestone, and around Rathcannon it is exceedingly productive. About one-half is under tillage; the remainder is rich meadow and pasture land, on which a large number of cattle are fed; there is not an acre of waste or turfary. A great want of timber prevails throughout the district; scarcely a tree or shrub, or even a hedge-row, is to be seen, except around the houses of the principal inhabitants. The residence of Castle Ivers is about a mile from the village, and is pleasantly situated in a well-planted demesne. A constabulary police force has been stationed in the village. The parish is in the diocese of Limerick, and is a rectory, united to Dromin: the tithe rent-charge of Athlaccas is £390. The church, built in 1813, by aid of a loan of £560 from the Board of First Fruits, was burnt by the Rockites in 1822; and the present church, a small but neat edifice, with a tower and lofty spire, was erected in the following year by a cess levied on the parish. The glebe-house, built in 1813, by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £360 from the Board, is a handsome residence situated on a glebe of 14 acres, the whole of which is tastefully laid out. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish also forms part of the union or district of Dromin, and has a chapel. Adjoining Castle Ivers are the ruins of Tullerbuoy Castle. On the summit of a fertile eminence are the extensive remains of the castle of Rathcannon, built by the O'Casey family in the 16th century, on the site of a very ancient fortress. Near Castle Ivers are the ruins of Kilhroney church, built on a gentle eminence by the Knights Templars, in 1289, in view of their wide manor of Ross-Temple. In the churchyard are some curious tombs of the De Lacy family, who were great benefactors to the church and parish, and presented a valuable service of communion plate. Near the castle of Rathcannon, a very perfect specimen of the elk or moose deer was discovered by Archdeacon Maunsell, who presented it to the Royal Dublin Society, in whose museum it may be seen: the body, from the nose to the tail, is 11 feet in length; the antlers measure 12 feet from tip to tip, and the highest point is 10 feet from the ground.

ATHLEAGUE, a post-town and parish, in the union of ROSCOMMON, partly in the barony of KILLIAN, county of GALWAY, but chiefly in that of ATHLONE, county of ROSCOMMON, and in the province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (S. W.) from Roscommon, and 7¼ (W.) from Dublin; containing 5087 inhabitants, of whom 631 are in the town. This parish is situated on the river Suck, and on the road from Roscommon to Mount-Talbot and Ballinacloe: it contains 13,012 statute acres; the state of agriculture is improving. There are large tracts of bog, now being reclaimed, but not on an extensive scale; a great part of the Galway portion of the parish consists of this species of land. Limestone and freestone of excellent quality abound; and mines of iron were formerly worked, but were discontinued from the scarcity of fuel. Over the Suck is a bridge, from one end of which the houses stretch along the right bank of the river, with a street or road ascending a hill at right angles; the number of houses in the town is 126. There is a sub-office under the post-office of Roscommon. The principal seats in the parish are, Rookwood, a handsome residence, and Castle Kelly, originally built as a castle in the 14th century; the modern portion is castellated, and part of the ancient structure still remains. Near the river are some large insulated mills. Fairs are held on July 11th and Sept. 24th. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, united in 1807 to that of Kilbegnet, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is inappropriate in the Incorporated Society for Protestant Charter Schools, by deed of request from Lord Ranelagh. The tithes rent-charge of Athleague is £169, of which £68 are payable to the proprietor, and the remainder to the vicar; the gross amount of tithes in the union payable to the incumbent is £156. The church, built in 1849, partly by subscription and partly by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, is at Athleague, and is the only one in the union; the cost of its erection was £737. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £400 and a loan of £214 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1815; the glebe annexed to it comprises 23 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is situated in the town, and is in bad repair. Between Castle Kelly and Rookwood is a rath, in which stood an abbey of Grey friars, where Mayless O'Hanayn, abbot of Roscommon, died in 1266; and near it was a cell in which, according to tradition, four bishops were interred. In 1819, some labourers digging for gravel under a bog that had been cut away, on the estate of Castle Kelly, found a gold fibula weighing 17½ oz. A chalybeate spring issues from the hill of Mount-Mary.

linasloe, 15½ (S. E. by S.) from Roscommon, and 69½ (W.) from Dublin; containing 6393 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the words Ath Luain, signifying in the Irish language "the ford of the moon," of which, previously to the introduction of Christianity, the ancient inhabitants were worshippers; or, according to some, from Ath-Luan, in reference to the rapids at the bridge over the Shannon. After the erection of a town at this ford it obtained the name of Bail-ath-Luain, or "the town of the ford of the moon," by which, now contracted into Blahluin, it is generally called by the Irish inhabitants of the neighbourhood. The town is situated on the river Shannon, by which it is divided into two parts, and on the great western road from Dublin to Galway through Ballinasloe. An abbey for Cistercian monks, dedicated to St. Peter, was founded, according to Ware, in 1216, on the western or Connaught side of the Shannon; and in that year King John gave certain lands to it in exchange for the site on which was erected the CASTLE of ATHLONE, besides one-tenth part of the expenses of the castle, which afterwards became one of the principal military stations in the country. The castle was progressively increased in strength, and so important was it regarded by the English monarchs, that when Henry III. granted the dominion of Ireland to his son Prince Edward, this town was expressly reserved with other chief cities; and when the same king bestowed the whole of Connaught upon Richard de Burgo, he retained for himself five cantreds contiguous to the castle. In this reign another monastery was founded, on the eastern side of the Shannon, by Cathal Croibh-Dearg O'Connor, Prince of Connaught, and completed by Sir Henry Dillon, who was interred in it in 1844. In the reign of Elizabeth, Athlone was greatly improved; the fortifications were strengthened, and the castle was for some time occupied by the Earl of Essex.

The castle became the seat of the presidency of Connaught, and when the insurrection broke out in 1641, it was occupied by Viscount Ranelagh, then lord-president, with the usual ward of a royal castle. Independently of its several defences, the town was strong in itself, being built of stone; and the inhabitants having given assurances of their determination to defend it against all enemies, the president entrusted it entirely to their custody; but in a few weeks they secretly formed a design of enabling the insurgents to seize the president and his family, and to surprise the castle. For this purpose they admitted Sir James Dillon's forces within the walls on the night of Saturday, in the hope of surprising Lord Ranelagh on his way to church in the English town on the following day; but by some mistake in the appointed signal the design miscarried. The Irish forces laid close siege to the castle for twenty-two weeks, when it was relieved by some troops sent from Dublin by the Duke of Ormonde, who strengthened the garrison; but with this reinforcement the president effected nothing more than an unimportant defeat of the Connaught men near Ballintobber. During the president's absence on this expedition, the insurgents of Westmeath under Sir James Dillon attacked the English town in such numbers that the garrison were compelled to abandon the walls, but they defended the houses till Captain St. George, making a sally from the castle, compelled the assailants to withdraw. By occupying the pass of Ballykeran, however, Dillon's forces cut off all communication with the metropolis, and reduced the town to a state of extreme distress for want of supplies, which an entire troop had to cut its way through his forces to Dublin to solicit. At length, all hope of assistance being extinct, the president negotiated with the enemy for a safe conduct for his wife and family to Trim, which was honourably granted; and so forcibly did Lady Ranelagh, at Dublin, urge the necessities of the deserted English in this town, that a convoy was sent to bring the inhabitants away. This convoy, which consisted of 1100 foot and a few horse summoned from the garrisons around Dublin, under the command of Sir Richard Grenville, arrived at Athlone in the latter part of February, 1643, and found the English there so much reduced in numbers as scarcely to muster more than 450 men, and many of these so wasted by famine and disease as to be unable to march. They fought their way home through the pass of Rochonell, and the custody of the castle was assumed by Viscount Dillon of Costelloe. After the victories obtained by Cromwell, the castle was taken on a second attack by Sir Charles Coote for the parliament; and during the fury of the war the town was burned: though restored, it never recovered its former strength or appearance; and in the reign of Charles II. the eastern portion of it was destroyed by an accidental fire.

During the war of the Revolution, the town was held for James II. by COL. RICHARD GRACE, an experienced officer, and a garrison consisting of three regiments of foot, with nine troops of dragoons and two troops of horse in and around Athlone. Immediately after the battle of the Boyne, Lieutenant-General Douglas was sent by William III. to assault the town. Colonel Grace, doubtful of his ability to defend the whole, burnt the eastern portion of it, and breaking down some of the arches of the bridge, fortified himself in the other part; Douglas, after battering the castle for eight days without success, withdrew his forces in the middle of the night. Towards the midsummer of 1691, the main body of William's army was led to the assault by DE GINKELL, who first made himself master of the eastern portion of the town, of which, after the retreat of Douglas, the Irish had taken possession, and which they had fortified with additional works. From the 30th till the 30th of June, a destructive cannonade was kept up across the river by both parties from batteries successively erected; during this period, after expending 13,000 cannon balls, many tons of stone shot, 600 shells, and more than 50 tons of powder, De Ginkell destroyed not only the castle but every house on the Roscommon side of the river. New works, however, were constantly thrown up by the garrison, assisted by the Irish army under Sr. RUTH, who had encamped at a short distance for the especial defence of the bridge, the passage of which was perseveringly contested with frequent destructive losses to William's army. On the last day of the siege a council of war was held, when it was resolved to storm the town; and the ringing of the bell of St. Mary's church was appointed as a signal for crossing the river. This was accordingly effected the same evening by the army in three divisions, and such was the simultaneous velocity of their movements, that after half an hour's sanguinary conflict the assailants became masters of the town, which was immediately evacuated by the garrison. A detachment which had been sent by St. Ruth to oppose them was repulsed by the victorious army, who turned the guns of the garrison against them; and St. Ruth, on De Ginkell taking possession of the place, decamped with his forces to Aughrim, fifteen miles distant. During this siege the loss of the defenders amounted to 1200; and their brave commander, Col. Grace, who had been chamberlain to James II. while Duke of York, and one of his most faithful adherents, was killed in the action. The English, on taking the town, immediately directed their attention to its restoration and the repair of its fortifications and works; and it soon became one of the principal military depôts for arms, stores, and ammunition. On the 27th of October, 1697, during one of the severest storms ever known here, the castle was struck by the electric fluid, which set fire to the magazine; and 260 barrels of gunpowder, 10,000 hand grenades charged, and a great quantity of match and other combustible stores, exploded with so violent a concussion, that all the houses in the town, except a few cottages near the gates, were shattered or destroyed. The loss of life, however, was comparatively small, only seven persons being killed and 36 wounded.

Though at present the largest town on the Shannon next to Limerick, Athlone retains much of its character as a MILITARY STATION. On the Leinster side, one of the principal entrances near the river was, till lately, through a gateway in one of the old square towers, now removed; and the ancient walls, though in a great measure concealed by buildings, extend for a considerable distance in that direction. On the Connaught side there are scarcely any traces of the walls or gates; but in this quarter are situated all the present military defences of the place. These consist principally of the castle, which forms a tête du pont, and of advanced forts and redoubts on the outside of the town to defend the main approaches along the great road from Galway by Ballinasloe, the most important line of communication with that part of the country which is most exposed to invasion. A short canal on this side of the river enables boats navigating the Shannon to avoid the rapids at the bridge of Athlone, and adds materially to the strength of the works: it is crossed by three bridges, one of which is falling into decay, and of which two are defended by palisades, those of the third having been taken down to facilitate the passing of the mail-coaches. This canal, however, is soon to be superseded by a sailing-course, and a fine new lock in the bed of the river. The bogs along the river are a sufficient protection to the town on the south side. The oldest of the works is a tower of decagonal form, which, from the massive structure of the walls, was probably the keep of the ancient castle, though having a new exterior; it is situated on a lofty mound supported on the side next the river by a stupendous wall, but overlooked on the opposite side by the houses in the upper part of the town. The platform on which this tower, now used as a barrack, is situated, is bounded on the side next the lower town by dwellings for the officers, and walls of imposing aspect; and on the other sides by modern works mounted with cannon, commanding not only the approach on the Connaught side of the river, but also the bridge itself; and the strong circular towers at irregular intervals, with the carefully fortified entrance, give to the whole place a very formidable appearance. To the north of the castle are the Barracks, formerly calculated only for the accommodation of 267 artillery, 592 infantry, and 187 horses; the accommodation has been since greatly increased: a pontoon establishment was attached, but has been broken up. There are two magazines, an extensive ordnance dépôt, and an hospital. The buildings occupy an elevated situation on the banks of the river, and comprise an area of about 15 statute acres, including spacious squares for exercise: besides the barracks for the men, there are within the inclosure detached houses for the officers of the different departments, store-houses, and an armoury. The armoury, a detached building, usually contains 15,000 stand of arms, including the muskets of eight regiments of militia of the central counties; the hospital is situated on the high ground a short distance from the river, and is calculated for the reception of 96 patients. Athlone is the head-quarters of the western district, and the residence of the major-general and staff of the district.

The town is divided into two nearly equal portions by the river Shannon, over which is a stone bridge of nine arches, erected in the reign of Elizabeth. This bridge, though 100 yards in length, is only twelve feet wide; the passage, therefore, is often attended with difficulty. It is further obstructed by the traffic of three flour-mills, one at each end and the other on the bridge; the narrowness of the arches, which are ten in number, and the width of the piers between them, prevent the free course of the water, and in time of flood cause an inundation on the shores of Lough Ree. On the south side are various sculptured tablets inserted in a wall, about nine feet broad, rising above the parapet and surmounted by a pediment ornamented with mouldings; their inscriptions afford a curious history of its erection. A new bridge, which had been some time in contemplation, has recently been completed, and the town has been greatly improved by the taking down of many of the old houses to make suitable approaches to it; half of the expenses was paid by a grant from government, the other half by a cess collected from the neighbouring counties. The total number of houses within the limits of the town is 1078, of which about half are slated and the remainder thatched; they are built chiefly of limestone, though bricks of excellent quality are made in great quantities a little below the town. Prior to the dissolution of the corporation in 1840, the town had been brought under the operation of the Lighting and Paving act of 9th George IV. cap. 82, but for paving and cleansing only. A regatta is annually held on Lough Ree in August, and continues for four days; races take place occasionally at Ballykeran. About a mile and a half from Athlone, on the Leinster side of the Shannon, is Moydrum Castle, the handsome residence of Viscount Castlemaine, a solid castellated mansion with square turrets at each angle, beautifully situated on the edge of a small lake, and surrounded by an extensive and richly-wooded demesne. The manufacture of felt hats was formerly carried on in Athlone to a great extent, but only a few are now made for the supply of the immediate neighbourhood. There are two extensive distilleries, each producing from 40,000 to 50,000 gallons of whisky annually; two tanneries, two soap and candle manufactories, two public breweries on a large scale, and several corn-mills. In the excise arrangements, Athlone gives name to, and is the head of, a district, which comprises the towns of Mohill and Carrick-on-Shannon, in the county of Leitrim; Longford, Granard, and Ballymahon, in the county of Longford; Castlepollard, in the county of Westmeath; and Roscommon, in the county of that name. The Shannon is navigable above and below the town, the communication between the two parts of the river being by a canal more than a mile in length; a communication by steam-boat between this place and Limerick has been established, and passage-boats meet the steamers at Shannon-Harbour and proceed to Dublin by the Grand Canal. The market is held on Tuesday and Saturday, of which days the latter is the principal, when sheep, swine, and great quantities of grain are exposed for sale. It is held in an open space under the wall supporting the castle mound, but the principal meat-market is at the shambles near the river, which are abundantly supplied with provisions of all kinds; fish is procured in the lake and the river Shannon, and salt-water fish is brought from Galway. The fairs, to which is attached a court of pie poudre, are on the Monday after Epiphany, March 10th, Holy-Thursday, and Aug. 24th; each is by the charters ordained to last three days. A branch of the Provincial Bank of Ireland has been established here, as also a branch of the National Bank; and there is a constabulary police station.

Athlone was incorporated by charter dated Dec. 16th, 4th of James I. (1606). This charter was seized by James II. on a judgment of forfeiture obtained in the court of exchequer, and a new one was granted in the 3rd of that monarch's reign; but the judgment being subsequently declared void, the former became the governing charter, and the latter was not acted upon after the accession of William III. Other charters, confirming and extending the privileges of the corporation, were granted in the 16th of James I. and 17th of Charles II.; and the "New Rules" made by the lord-lieutenant and privy council, in the 25th of Charles II., provided that the appointment of the sovereign, recorder, and town-clerk should be subject to their approval. The style of the corporation until its dissolution was, "The Sovereign, Bailiffs, Burgesses, and Freemen of the Town of Athlone;" and the officers were, a sovereign, two bailiffs, thirteen burgesses, a recorder, town-clerk, serjeant-at-mace, and billet-master. There was also a select body called the common council. The sovereign was elected by the common council from among the burgesses, annually on the 29th of June, and had the privilege of appointing a vice-sovereign with the approbation of the bailiffs and a majority of the burgesses; the bailiffs were elected from the freemen by the common council, on the same day as the sovereign, and were ex officio members of the council. The burgesses were elected for life from among the freemen, and the freemen also for life, by the common council, of which body, according to the practice of the corporation, twelve had to be present to constitute an election. The recorder and the town-clerk (who was also deputy-recorder) were appointed by the common council; and the serjeant-at-mace and billet-master, the former of whom acted as constable in the borough, were appointed by the sovereign. The common council were unlimited in number, but usually consisted of not more than twenty persons, including the sovereign, vice-sovereign, and two bailiffs; they held their office for life, and vacancies were filled up by themselves from among the burgesses and freemen. By the act of the 3rd and 4th of Victoria the corporation was dissolved, and the property became vested in the commissioners under the Lighting and Paving act, before mentioned, to be applied by them to aid in defraying the rates, and for improving the borough.

The borough sent two representatives to the Irish parliament prior to the Union, since which period it has sent one to the imperial parliament. The right of election was formerly vested in the burgesses and freemen, amounting, in April 1831, to 71; but by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 88, the non-resident freemen, except within seven miles, were disfranchised, and the privilege was extended to the £10 householders. The limits of the borough comprehend under the charter a circle of a mile and a half radius from the centre of the bridge, but, as regards electoral purposes, were diminished by the enactments of William's reign, and now include only the town and a very small surrounding district, comprising 485 statute acres. The sovereign or vice-sovereign and the recorder were justices of the peace within the borough, having exclusive jurisdiction under the charter; the sovereign was also coroner, escheator, and clerk of the market. The civil court of the borough, which had jurisdiction in pleas not exceeding £5 late currency, was held under the sovereign every third Thursday, but has been discontinued for more than twenty-four years. The sovereign, or his deputy, sat thrice a week to hear complaints on matters arising within the borough. Quarter-sessions for the Athlone division of the county of Roscommon are held here in March and October, and at Roscommon in June and December. The portion of the borough on the Westmeath side of the river is in the Moat division of that county; the quarter-sessions are held regularly four times a year. Petty-sessions for the adjacent rural districts are held within the limits of the borough on both sides of the river, on alternate Saturdays, the county magistrates respectively presiding. By letters-patent in the 27th of Charles II., the half-quarter of land of Athlone, otherwise Beallagh, with the manor and castle, was granted to Richard, Lord Ranelagh, with power to hold courts leet and baron: these courts are not now held; but the seneschal of the manor of Twyford, who holds his courts at Moat, claims jurisdiction over that part of the borough which is in the county of Westmeath. The court-house, or Tholsel, was built in 1703; it was partly occupied as a guard-room, and partly for holding the sovereign's court, but has been taken down. There is a borough prison, to which, from its infirmity, offenders are only committed for a few hours prior to their removal; and within the corporation district is a hidewell belonging to the county of Roscommon, containing four cells, two day-rooms, and four yards.

The town is included in the parishes of St. Peter and St. Mary, the former containing the western, and the latter the eastern, portion of Athlone: St. Peter's comprises 7617 statute acres, with 5734 inhabitants; and St. Mary's 11,456 statute acres, with 7264 inhabitants. The living of St. Peter's is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Elphin, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is wholly inappropriate, belonging to the Incorporated Society, and amounts to £35; the stipend of the perpetual curate amounts to £96. The old church, which was situated on the site of the ancient monastery of St. Peter, was built in 1804, by aid of a gift of £500, and a loan of £300, from the late Board of First Fruits; and was subsequently repaired by a grant of £344 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It has been lately taken down, and a new church erected on an entirely new site given by Colonel Lloyd: of the expense, £2047, about £1897 were a grant from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built by a loan of £312 and a gift of £100 from the Board; the glebe comprises five acres, in three lots near the church. The living of St. Mary's is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £238. 9. The rectory was granted by Charles I., in 1636, to Richard Linguard, together with a portion of the tithes of the parish of Ratoath, in the county of Meath, for the augmentation of the vicarage; these tithes now amount to £75. The church was rebuilt in 1837, by a loan of £2300 from the Board of First Fruits; it is a neat edifice, with a square embattled tower. The tower of the old church is still standing, and contains the bell which gave the signal for William's army to cross the river at the siege of Athlone. The glebe-house was built in 1812, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £500 from the Board, and has been since enlarged and beautified, the incumbent having received permission from the bishop to expend £600 upon it, to be repaid to him or his heirs. The glebe comprises eight acres, on a moiety of which houses in the town are built; and is valued at £125 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish of St. Peter is united with that of Drum, and contains three chapels, besides a small religious house of the Augustinian order, now falling into decay; the Roman Catholic parish of St. Mary is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, but in the diocese of Ardagh, and contains a spacious chapel, erected in 1794, and also a chapel attached to a religious house of the Franciscan order, rebuilt in 1825. There are places of worship for Baptists, Wesleyans, and Primitive Methodists.

"The Ranelagh school" was founded pursuant to a grant, in 1708, by Richard, Lord Ranelagh, of the castle, manor, town, and lauds of Athlone, with the customs belonging thereto, together with the lands of Clonarke, stated to contain 427 acres, and of Gortnanganhan or Gortecorson, containing 43 acres, in trust for the erection (contingent on the death of his daughter Lady Catherine Jones without issue) of two schools at Athlone for 30 boys and 30 girls, and two at Roscommon, with chapels attached; and also for the payment of £20 per annum to the minister of Athlone. Lady Jones dying without issue in 1740, the estates were, about 20 years after, vested by act in the Incorporated Society for promoting charter schools; and a school for the maintenance, instruction, clothing, and apprenticing of boys was founded in the parish of St. Peter. The number of boys was fixed at 40, with each of whom, on being apprenticed, a premium of £10 was paid; but from a considerable diminution of the income the school has been for some years declining, and now only £7 are paid as an apprentice fee. There are various other schools; a dispensary in the parish of St. Peter, and another in that of St. Mary. Robert Sherwood bequeathed the interest of £50 to the poor; and William Handcock, Esq., ancestor of Lord Castlemaine, by deed in 1705, gave lands now producing a rental of £46 per annum, to be distributed by his representatives among the poor of both parishes, on the recommendation of the ministers and churchwardens. He also bequeathed £20 per annum for the support of a schoolmaster, who must have taken the degree of A. B. The sum of £8 late currency, called the Dodwell grant, is annually distributed among a number of poor women; and £13 per annum, paid by a Mr. Evans, of Dublin, to the rector, are divided among old men. The workhouse, on a site of 7½ acres purchased for £650, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £7500; it has all the necessary accommodations for the board of guardians and its officers, and is constructed to contain the paupers in a population of 72,168. At Courson, about a mile from Athlone, in the parish of St. Mary, are some small vestiges of an ancient castle formerly belonging to the O'Briens; on opening the ground near the ruins, a gold chain was found some years since. At Cloonakilla, in the parish of St. Peter, are the remains of an old chapel; and at Cloonoe, on the banks of the Shannon, about three miles below the town, is a more considerable ruin with a cemetery attached. There are numerous chalybeate springs in the neighbourhood. Athlone gave the title of Viscount to the Earl of Ranelagh, and since 1691-2 has given that of Earl to the family of De Glackell.

ATHLUMNEY, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of SKREEN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER; containing, with part of the town of Navan, 1969 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Boyne, by which it is separated from the parish of Navan, and over which are two bridges of stone; it is intersected by the roads leading respectively from Navan and Trim to Drogheda, and is skirted on the south by the road from Dublin to Enniskillen. An old castle, situated on the right bank of the river, was formerly the property of the Dowdell family, by whom it was destroyed, to prevent its falling into the hands of Cromwell. The remains consist of an extensive and irregular pile of building of an oblong form, with two projecting square towers apparently of more ancient foundation than the remainder, which, with its gabled windows, appears to be in the Elizabethan style. The parish comprises 2453 statute acres: the land is of excellent quality, and mostly under tillage; limestone abounds, and is quarried to a considerable extent. Athlumney, a seat, is beautifully situated on the banks of the Boyne, commanding some pleasing views, and the demesne is well planted and tastefully embellished. There are extensive flour and oatmeal mills on the river, and a flax-mill in which upon the average 260 men are employed. The Boyne navigation from Navan to Drogheda passes through the parish. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of P. P. Metge, Esq., in whom the rectory is inappropriate; the title rent-charge is £207. 10., of which £135 are payable to the proprietor. The church is in ruins, and there is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district called Johnstown, comprising the parishes of Athlumney, Kilcara, Follistown, Gerrardstown, and Staffordstown, and containing two chapels, situated at Johnstown and Walterstown; the chapel at Johnstown has been lately rebuilt.

ATHNASSEY, or ATHENEASY, a parish, partly in the barony of SMALL COUNTY, but chiefly in that of COSTLEA, union of KILMALLOCK, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Kilmallock; containing 1503 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Kilmallock to Hospital, and comprises 2837 statute acres. The land is good; about one-half is under tillage, and the remainder is meadow chiefly attached to dairy-farms, except a small tract of very valuable bog, which is rapidly diminishing. The parish is in the diocese of Limerick, and is a rectory forming part of the union of Kilmallock belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Limerick: the title rent-charge is £169. 3. 5., and constitutes part of the economy fund of the cathedral; the glebe comprises 27 acres of profitable land. In the Roman Catholic divisions Athnassey is the head of a district sometimes called Ballinvana, comprising the parishes of Athnassey, Bulgadine, Emly-Grenan, Kilbreedy-Major, and Ballinvana; the chapel, built in 1834, is near the verge of the Red bog. Some fragments of the church are still remaining in the burial-ground: it is supposed to have been founded in the 7th century, and was dedicated to St. Athanasius, from which circumstance probably the parish derived its name. There are traces of ancient military works within the parish, and several military weapons of rude workmanship have been found; in the parish are also the ruins of a small religious house called Adam's Church, and fragments of castles or buildings at Fauntstown, Gormanstown, and Stephenson. The ruins of Fauntstown Castle, erected by the Faunt family in the reign of James I., are situated on the summit of a gentle eminence; and not far distant are the remains of an old church, near which is a holy well, much frequented on the 25th March, the patron day: close to the well is an ash-tree, the branches of which are weighed down by the numerous offerings placed on them.

ATHNEIT.—See ANBID.

ATHNOWEN, ST. MARY, or OVENS, a parish, in the poor-law union of MACROOM, barony of EAST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (W.) from Ballincollig; containing 1925 inhabitants. This parish, which is generally called Ovens, is situated on the south line of road from Cork to Macroom, and is bounded on the north by the river Lee, and intersected by the Bride. It comprises 4838 statute acres: the soil in the northern or hilly part is rather poor and stony, but in the vales extremely rich, lying on a substratum of limestone forming part of the great limestone district extending to Castlemore on the west, and to Blackrock on the east. The limestone is quarried to some extent for burning into lime, for the supply of the hilly districts to the north and south for a distance of several miles. The principal seats are, Grange, a modern residence which occupies the site of Grange abbey (said to have been founded by St. Cera, who died in 679), and includes part of the ancient walls; and Sirmount, which occupies an elevated site commanding an extensive prospect over a highly interesting and richly cultivated tract of country. There are two mills on the river Bride, one at Killumney and the other at Ovens. The petty-sessions for the district are held every alternate week at Carroghally and Lisheens. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, united by diocesan authority, in 1785, to the prebend of Kilnagorry in the cathedral of St. Finbarr, Cork: the title rent-charge is £318. 15. The church is a neat ancient structure, with a square tower crowned with pinnacles. The glebe-house was built in 1810, at a cost exceeding £1000, chiefly by the then incumbent, aided by a gift of £100 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 14 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district called Ovens, which includes also the parishes of Desertmore and Aglish, and the ploughlands of Milane and Killumney in the parish of St. Finbarr, Cork: the chapel, erected in 1835, is a handsome edifice of hewn limestone, in the mixed Gothic and Grecian styles of architecture. The male and female parochial schools are supported partly at the expense of the rector. Near the bridge of Owens over the river Bride is the entrance to the celebrated limestone caves, which Smith, in his History of Cork, describes as 18 feet in height; but from the accumulation of rubbish they are now not more than three feet high, and are nearly filled with water. They branch off into several ramifications, and from the roofs of some of them depend stalactites of various forms: their dimensions have never been satisfactorily ascertained. There are some remains of an ancient castle, called Castle Inch.

ATHSY.—See ASSEY.

ATHY, a market and post town, and the head of a union, in the barony of WEST NARRAGH and RHEBAN, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 17½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Naas, and 3½ (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 4698 inhabitants. This place derives its name from an old ford called Athelehoc, or anciently Athleger, the "ford towards the west," which led from the territory of Leix to that of Callegagh or Caellan, and near which a great battle was fought between the people of Munster and those of Leix under Lavisagh Cean Morda, in the 3rd century. Donogh O'Brien and his forces crossed the river Barrow at this ford, on their retreat from the battle of Clontarf. The town appears to have originated in the foundation of two monasteries, soon after the English invasion; one on the west bank of the Barrow, by Richard de St. Michael, Lord of Rheban, in 1253, for Crouched friars; and the other on the east bank, by the families of Boisle or Boyle and Hogan, some time in the 13th century, for Dominican or Preaching friars. It was frequently exposed to the assaults of the neighbouring septs, especially of the O'Kellys, whose territories, then called Caellan, are included in the modern county of Kildare. In 1308 the town was burnt by the Irish, and in 1315 was plundered by the Scots under Robert Bruce, who gained the battle of Ardsicull, in which were killed, on the side of the English, Raymond le Gros and Sir William Prendergast, and on the side of the Scots, Sir Fergus Andressan and Sir Walter Murray, all of whom were buried in the Dominican monastery. In 1493, the Lord Justice of Ireland, considering Athy, from its situation on the Irish frontier, to be one of the keys of the Marches of Kildare, and necessary to be maintained for the defence of those parts, placed it in the custody of a military governor; and about the year 1506, a castle was built on the eastern side of the river, by Gerald, eighth earl of Kildare, for the protection of the town. This fortress, having been enlarged in 1575 by one of the family of White, has since obtained the name of White's Castle: in 1648 it was held by the Irish under O'Neal, but was taken in 1650 by the parliamentary forces under Colonels Hewson and Reynolds.

The town is pleasantly situated on the river Barrow at its junction with the Grand Canal, and on the road from Dublin, through Cashel, to Cork; the surrounding country is remarkably open and healthy. It comprises 844 houses, and consists chiefly of one long street divided into two parts by the river, over which is a neat stone bridge of five arches, built in 1796. On the east side of the bridge the road from Monastereven to Carlow intersects the main street at right angles, forming, on the Carlow side, a neat square called the Market-square. The streets are well paved, and partly lighted under the provisions of the 9th of George IV., cap. 82, which came into operation here, on 16th Feb. 1849. The only trade is in corn, of which a very considerable quantity is sold in the market, for the supply of some extensive mills on the Barrow, and of the Dublin market, the portion destined for which is sent thither by the Grand Canal in boats and barges; there is also a daily fly-boat, for the conveyance of passengers to and from the metropolis. The situation of Athy in the neighbourhood of an exhaustless turbary, affording fuel at a low price, is advantageous for the establishment of manufactures; and its facility of communication by water with Dublin and other parts of the kingdom admirably adapts it for carrying on an extensive inland trade. In the excise arrangements, it is within the district of Naas. The market is on Tuesday and Saturday, and, in addition to an ample supply of corn, is well furnished with meat, poultry, butter, and other provisions. Fairs are held on the 25th of April and July, under patent granted August 17th, 1756, by George II.; also on March 17th, June 9th, Oct. 10th, and Dec. 11th, for cattle, sheep, and pigs. There is a chief station of the constabulary police, also a barrack capable of accommodating a troop of cavalry.

The inhabitants were incorporated in 1613, at the instance of Sir Robert Digby, Kat., by a charter in which the CORPORATION is entitled "the Sovereign, Bailiffs, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Athy." The officers of the late corporation were, a sovereign (who was a justice of the peace), 2 bailiffs, 12 free burgesses, a recorder, and several inferior officers. The sovereign and bailiffs were elected annually, on June 24th, by the sovereign, bailiffs, and burgesses, out of the body of burgesses, and were sworn into office on Sept. 29th; the burgesses were elected for life, out of the body of the freemen; the latter, in recent instances, were nominated by the sovereign. The governing body consisted of the sovereign, bailiffs, and burgesses: the recorder, treasurer, and inferior officers were appointed either by the sovereign or the governing body. By the act of the 3rd and 4th of Victoria, cap. 108, the corporation was dissolved, and the management of the property of the borough became vested in the commissioners of lighting and paving, to aid in defraying the rates. The borough returned two members to the Irish parliament until the Union, when, of the £15,000 awarded as compensation for the abolition of the elective franchise, £13,800 were paid to the Duke of Leinster, as proprietor of the borough, and £1900 to Lord Ennismore. A court of record was held here until 1897, for determining pleas to any amount arising within the borough and its liberties, which extend half a mile in every direction from White's Tower. A curl court, for the recovery of debts under 40s. late currency, was also formerly held, on the 1st Monday in every month; the sovereign presided. The summer assizes for the county, and the Epiphany and Midsummer quarter-sessions for the division, and also a weekly petty-session on Tuesday, are held in the court-house, which is a neat and commodious building in the market-square. A court, called a "presenting court," is held annually in the month of October, to make presentments for the ensuing year; and a market jury of 12 persons is also chosen as inspectors of the markets, weights, and measures. The county gaol is situated outside the town, on the road to Carlow: it was completed in 1830, at an expense of £6000, of which £2000 were given by the Duke of Leinster, in addition to the site, and the remainder was paid by the county; it is a well-arranged building on the radiating principle, the governor's house being in the centre, and comprises 6 airing-yards, 6 day-rooms, 2 work-rooms, and 32 sleeping and 3 solitary cells, with a matron's room, 2 hospitals, and a chapel.

The town comprises the greater part of the parishes of St. John and St. Michael, which, together with the rural parishes of Ardrie and Churchtown, constitute the vicarage of St. Nicholas, or Nicolastown, united by act of council in 1804 to the rectory and vicarage of Tankardstown, in the diocese of Dublin, and in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Archbishop; the tithe rent-charge of the several parishes is £408. The church of the union, a plain edifice, is in the parish of St. Michael; and a new church, a handsome edifice, has been built at a cost of £2228, whereof the Ecclesiastical Commissioners provided £1260, on a site given by the Duke of Leinster, who also gave a site for the glebe-house, and subscribed £600 towards the erection of the church. The glebe contains six and a half acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this town is the head of a district, comprising the same parishes as the Protestant union, together with that of Killyberry, and containing two chapels, one in St. Michael's and the other at Tankardstown; the former is a spacious edifice, built in 1796, principally by a donation from Maurice Keating, Esq., of Narragbmore, on an acre of land given by the Duke of Leinster, who also contributed towards its erection. There are places of worship for Calvinists and Wesleyan Methodists. The parochial school is held in a room behind the court-house. Contiguous to the Roman Catholic chapel are two large schoolrooms: one of them for boys, was built in 1826 by voluntary subscription, aided by a donation of £100 from the Duke of Leinster, who also gave the site and erected a convenient residence for the parish priest, at a nominal rent; the other, for girls, was built by a donation from the late Mrs. Dooley. Here are likewise a fever hospital, built and partly supported by subscription, and a dispensary. The workhouse, on a site of six and a half acres given free, has all the accommodation necessary for the board of guardians and its officers, and is constructed to contain 500 paupers; it was opened January 9, 1844.

There are several remains of ANTIQUITY; but of the monasteries little is left besides a gateway on the Carlow road, which, when seen in connexion with the plantations intervening between it and the river, forms a picturesque and interesting feature in the landscape. Near the entrance from the Dublin road is a modern building occupied by two Dominican friars, with a small domestic chapel, near which is the ancient burial-ground of St. Michael's. The remains of White's Castle, which is situated close to the bridge, consist only of a massive square and embattled tower, now used as the police barrack. On the western bank of the river, a quarter of a mile above the town, stand the remains of Woodstock Castle: the date of its erection is unknown, but it is supposed to have been built, about 1290, by a descendant of the Earl of Pembroke, or more probably at a later period by Thomas Fitzgerald, seventh earl of Kildare, who, on marrying Dorothea, daughter of Anthony O'Moore, of Leix, in 1434, received the manors of Woodstock and Rheban as her dower. The walls are very thick and in moderately good preservation, and the mullioned windows are much admired for the elegance of their execution; a fine arched gateway and part of the outer court yet remain. The castle was taken from the insurgents, in 1642, by the Marquess of Ormonde, who made it a halting-place for his troops; and, in 1647, Owen Roe O'Nial surprised it and put the garrison to the sword, but Lord Inchiquin compelled him soon afterwards to surrender both it and Athy. Rheban Castle is on the west bank of the Barrow, above two miles from the town. In the 2nd century Rheban was one of the inland towns, and it is found in Ptolemy's map. The castle was built, or greatly enlarged, in the 13th century, by Richard de St. Michael, when it and an adjoining district named Dunamase were erected into a barony, of which he was created baron. The first English settlers strengthened and repaired this castle, as also the opposite one of Killyberry. Its name was formerly Raba or Righban, "the habitation of the King;" and though now in ruins, its massive walls, mullioned windows, and imposing position, shew that it was intended to awe the surrounding country. In 1325, Rheban, Dunamase, and all their dependencies, were taken by O'Moore, whose descendant, Anthony O'Moore, gave it in dower to the Earl of Kildare, through whom it has descended to the dukes of Leinster. About three miles from the town, on the Dublin road, and in a most commanding position, is a rude and very extensive ancient fortification constructed entirely of earth raised so high as to command all the adjacent country: it is called the Moot of Ardscull, and if not raised on the occasion of the battle already noticed, was probably the scene of it; it was inclosed and planted about the year 1825 by the Duke of Leinster, and is a conspicuous landmark.

ATTANAGH, a parish, in the unions of KILKENNY and ABBEYLEIX, partly in the barony of CLARMALLAGH, QUEEN'S COUNTY, but chiefly in that of FASSADING, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. S. E.) from Durrow; containing 919 inhabitants. This parish, formerly called Rathanna and Attier, is situated on the river Nore, and comprises 2560 $\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, of which 630 $\frac{1}{4}$ are in the Queen's county. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory; the rectory is united to that of Abarney, and in the patronage of the Crown; the vicarage is united by act of council to the vicarage of Abarney and the rectories of Kilmenan and Rosconnell, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of Attansgh is £103. 17., of which £69. 5. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar; the gross rent-charge payable to the vicar is £270, and the tithes of the rectorial union amount to £239. 5. The church, a plain neat edifice, was erected by aid of a loan of £850 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1821. The glebe-house is situated on a glebe of 44 acres, on which also the church is built, and there is another glebe of 100 acres in Rosconnell. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is one of the nine denominations that form the district of Ballyragget.

ATTYMASS, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of GALEN, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Foxford; containing 3435 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the south by the river Moy, and on the east by the Ox mountains, and comprises 11,154 statute acres. The lands are partly under tillage, but the system of agriculture is not in a very improved state; there are, moreover, large tracts of waste land, which are chiefly irreclaimable bog and mountain. Freestone abounds, but limestone is rather scarce, being found only in some parts of the parish. The surface is interspersed with several lakes, which, being surrounded with mountains, have a beautifully picturesque appearance. Fairs are held at Bonnefinglass on May 24th, July 7th, Nov. 15th, and Dec. 15th. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, and forms part of the union of Ardagh; the rectory is inappropriate in Sir W. H. Palmer, Bart. The tithe rent-charge is £135. 5. 8., which is equally divided between the proprietor and the vicar. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a neat slated building. On the edge of a lake at Kildermot is a picturesque ruin of an ancient convent.

AUBURN, a village, in the parish and barony of KILKENNY WEST, union of ATHLONE, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E.) from Athlone: the population is returned with the parish. It is a very small place, but is celebrated as being the spot from which, from real life, Oliver Goldsmith drew his enchanting description of rural scenery in the Deserted Village: the house in which the poet resided is now in ruins; and the hawthorn-tree, round which a wall was built to preserve it, has been carried away piecemeal as relics. Near the village is Lissoy, which is described as "the modest mansion," in his tale of the Picar of Wakefield, in which it is known he gave an accurate picture of his sister, and brother-in-law, Daniel Hodson, Esq., who resided there.—See KILKENNY WEST.

AUDLEY.—See SKULL.

AUGHACREW.—See AGHACREW.

AUGHADOWN, or AGHADOWN, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, East Division of the barony of WEST CARBERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Skibberreen; containing, with several inhabited islands, 5757 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the north bank of the river Ilan, and comprises 8952 statute acres. Its surface is very uneven; in some parts, especially towards the north, it is rocky and unproductive; but near its southern boundary, towards the Ilan, the land is good and produces excellent crops. About two-thirds are under cultivation; the remainder is rocky ground and bog, of which latter there is a considerable extent near Newcourt. The state of agriculture is not much improved; the old heavy wooden plough is still used, and some of the land is cultivated by spade labour; the fences are every where much neglected. Several good roads intersect the parish, one of which is a new line from Skibberreen to Crookhaven, and of considerable advantage. The Ilan is navigable for vessels of 200 tons' burthen nearly to its eastern extremity: a quay and some storehouses have been constructed at Newcourt, but are entirely neglected, and the harbour is only frequented by a few sand-boats, which discharge their cargoes there for the convenience of the farmers. Aghadown House occupies an elevated site in the midst of flourishing plantations, and commands a fine view of the western coast. Fairs for the sale of cattle, sheep, pigs, &c., are held on May 6th and October 2nd. A manor court is held monthly, by a seneschal appointed by Lord Carbery, for the recovery of debts under 40s.; and here is a constabulary police station. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is partly inappropriate in Lord Audley, and partly forms the corps of the arch-deaconry of Ross. The tithe rent-charge is £450, half of which is payable to the proprietor and appropriator, and half to the vicar. The church, situated on the margin of the river, is a small neat edifice with a square tower, built by aid of a loan of £500, in 1813, from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house, built in 1784, and enlarged in 1817 by the then incumbent at a cost of £500, is handsome and commodious, and is situated on a glebe of 45½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parish of Kilcoe and part of Abbeystrowry, and contains two chapels, situated in Aghadown and Kilcoe, the former of which is a large and handsome edifice, occupying an elevated site near Curragh. In the demesne of Whitehall are the ruins of Kincoo or Kincolinsky Castle, built by the O'Driscolls in 1495; and on the grounds of Lake View are some remains of an ecclesiastical edifice, called by the people of the neighbourhood the Abbey of Our Lady.

AUGHAGOWER, or AYLE, a parish, in the union of WESTPORT, partly in the barony of BURRISHOOLE, but chiefly in that of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S.E. by 8.) from Westport; containing 12,335 inhabitants, of whom 176 are in the village. This parish is situated on the confines of the county of Galway, on the road from Westport to Ballinrobe, and comprises 55,047½ statute acres: the greater portion is mountain, about one-tenth only being under tillage; about 100 acres are woodland, and there are large tracts of bog. The system of agriculture is in a very rude and unimproved state, spade husbandry being still prevalent to a considerable extent. Lead-mines have been opened in the mountains, which are the property of the Marquess of Sligo, but they are not worked at present; and there is a large quarry of slate of a very heavy quality, which, also, is not now in operation. Mount-Browne House, now the seat of J. Browne, Esq., was, during the disturbances of 1798, the seat of the Right Hon. Denis Browne, brother of the Marquess of Sligo, and was for some time in the possession of the insurgents. The linen manufacture is partially carried on, but is diminishing every year, and at present affords employment only to a small number of persons. Fairs are held on June 24th, July 21st, August 6th, and September 29th. The parish is in the diocese of Tuam; the rectory is appropriate to the archdeaconry, and also to the prebend of Faldown in the cathedral of Tournai; the vicarage forms part of the union of Westport. The tithe rent-charge is £337. 10., of which £266. 5. are payable to the vicar. The church, which has a square tower, was erected in 1827, by a loan of £767 from the Board of First Fruits. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the chapel is a small thatched building, and there is also a chapel at Erriff of similar character, both inadequate to the accommodation of their respective congregations. The only antiquities are, a round tower in the village, and the remains of an old castle at Doone. St. Patrick founded here the monastery of Achafobhair, and placed St. Senach over it; it afterwards became the parish church.

AUGHALOO, AUGHLOE, or AGHALOO, a parish, in the union of ARMAGH, barony of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Caledon, 9867 inhabitants. This parish, which is the most eastern in the county, is bounded on the east by the river Blackwater, and situated on the road from Armagh to Aughnacloy; it contains 19,583½ statute acres, of which 140 are under water. The surface is pleasingly undulated, and well planted and watered; the lands are in a high state of cultivation, the system of agriculture is greatly improved, and there is little waste land and only a small portion of bog. Here are several gentlemen's seats, the principal of which is Caledon Hill, the seat of the Earl of Caledon. Aughaloo is in the diocese of Armagh, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the corps of the archdeaconry of Armagh and the union of Carrenteel or Carnteel; the tithe rent-charge is £456. 18. 6. The church is situated in the town of Caledon. A perpetual curacy was founded here in 1807, by the archdeacon, who endowed it with £50 per annum and 26½ acres of glebe; it has also an augmentation from Primate Boulter's fund, and is in the gift of the Archdeacon. The district of Brantry was formed in 1844, and a church built at the sole expense of the Dowager Lady Caledon. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Aughaloo and Carrenteel; the chapel is at Caledon. There are three places of worship for Presbyterians, at Minterburn, Crilly, and Caledon; there is also an Independent meeting-house, but no regular service is performed in it. Close to a stream that separates the ecclesiastical union of Carrenteel from the parish of Errigal-Kerogue is a sulphuric spring, resembling in its properties the Harrogate waters, but wanting their purgative quality: it has been inclosed in a small house erected over it by an individual who had received benefit from the use of the water. At Glenarb are the remains of a monastery with a burial-ground, and numerous stone crosses have been discovered.—See CALEDON.

AUGHAMACART, or AGHAMACART, a parish, in the union of ABBEYLEIX, barony of CLERMALLAGH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (W.S.W.) from Durrow; containing 3667 inhabitants. This place is situated on the confines of the county of Kilkenny, and on the road from Durrow to Johnstown, which forms part of that from Dublin to Cork. A priory of Augustine canons was founded here in 550 by O'Dempsey, under the invocation of St. Tighearnach, and soon afterwards became the burial-place of the Fitzpatricks, princes of Ossory, who were its patrons. In the 43rd of Elizabeth it was granted to the descendants of that family, then barons of Upper Ossory, who erected a castle at Culla Hill, which is now a picturesque ruin; the principal remains are a lofty rectangular tower very much broken, and fragments of various outer walls surrounded by a moat. The parish comprises 9600½ statute acres: the lands are in general fertile and in a good state of cultivation; the system of agriculture is much improving; the waste land consists of mountain. Fairs are held at Culla Hill on May 27th and Oct. 2nd, the latter of which is a large sheep-fair. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, with the vicarages of Cahir and Killeen united episcopally and by act of council, and in the patronage of John Wilson Fitzpatrick, Esq., in whom the rectory is inappropriate: the tithe rent-charge of the union is £350, of which £295 are payable to the impropricators, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is old, but in tolerable repair. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 38 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Durrow; the chapel is at Culla Hill. Of the ancient priory, only portions of the chapel walls and of the belfry remain, the latter having an arched doorway of good design.

AUGHANAGH, or AGRANAGH, a parish, in the union of BOYLE, barony of TRAGHILL, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (N.W.) from Boyle, on Lough Arrow, and on the road from Boyle to Sligo; containing 2714 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the Curlew mountains, and comprises 8638½ statute acres, including a considerable extent of mountain and bog. There are quarries of excellent limestone, resembling marble, and much used for building. The residence of Hollybrook is beautifully situated on the shore of Lough Arrow; the grounds are well planted, and contribute in a pleasing manner to embellish the scenery of the lake. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of Boyle: the tithe rent-charge is £63. 1. 6., of which £46. 14. 8. are payable to the impropricators, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Aughanagh is included in the district of Riverstown: the chapel, at Greyfort, is a good slated building. On the lands of Aughda are the remains of an abbey.

AUGHANLOO.—See AGHANLOO.

AUGHANUNCHON, or AGRANINSHON, a parish, in the union of LETTERKENNY, barony of KILMACRENNAN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 1½ mile (N.E.) from Letterkenny; containing 1649 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on Lough Swilly, and on the road from Letterkenny to Ramelton, comprises 4011½ statute acres, including 184½ acres of tideway. A sea line of two miles, taking in the bends of the Lough, is now embarked; a wharf is about to be built, and steamers to England and Scotland will be enabled to ply, and thus increase the traffic of the district. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £110. 5. A new church has been built at an expense of £759, of which £659 were provided by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. A glebe-house was built in 1790, at an expense exceeding £1000, of which £100 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits; and in 1832 it was rebuilt by the Rev. J. Irwin, the incumbent. The glebe comprises 296 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Aughaunchoy forms part of the district of Anghuish.

AUGHAVALL, or OUGHAVALL, a parish, in the union of WESTPORT, barony of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the market and post town of Westport, 13,441 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the bay of Westport, and on the road from Castlebar to Lewisburgh; it is partly bounded by the celebrated mountain of Croagh Patrick, rising 2499 feet above the level of the sea, and comprises 33,695 statute acres. The land is chiefly under tillage; the system of agriculture is improving, but there are still large tracts of bog, which, lying on an inclined plane, might be easily reclaimed and rendered productive. Limestone of good quality abounds, and is quarried for building, for mending the roads, and for burning into lime. Lead-mines were formerly worked, but are now disused; and in the mountain of Sheffrey a copper-mine was opened, but has long been discontinued. The principal seat is Westport House, the mansion of the Marquess of Sligo. Besides the market at Westport, fairs are held there and at Murrisk. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, with the vicarages of Aughagower, Kilmaclassar, and Kilgavower united by act of council, constituting the union of Aughaval, or Westport, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is partly appropriate to the archdeaconry of Tuam. The tithe rent-charge of Aughaval is £225, of which £168. 15. are payable to the vicar; and the entire union produces a vicarial rent-charge of £663. 7. 6. The church, an old building in the demesne of the Marquess of Sligo, was erected by aid of a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, and was lately repaired by a grant of £166 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £300 and a loan of £500 from the same Board, in 1815; the glebe comprises five acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: there are three chapels, one of which, in Westport, is spacious, and ornamented with a handsome front; the other two are at Thornhill and Drummish, and are new slated buildings, but quite inadequate to the accommodation of their respective congregations. There are also places of worship at Westport for Presbyterians and Wesleyan Methodists, the former in connexion with the General Assembly. The remains of an ancient abbey still exist at Murrisk; and in the parish are some chalybeate springs. A large patron is held annually at Murrisk on the 28th of August.—See WESTPORT.

AUGHAVEA, or AGHAVEAGH, a parish, in the union of LISNABEEKE, barony of MAGHERASTEPHENA, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, on the road from LISNABEEKE to Five-mile-town; containing, with the post-town of Brookborough, 6281 inhabitants. It comprises 17,143 statute acres, of which about 17½ are water. Nearly one-fourth of the land is bog or mountain, the former affording good fuel, and the latter pasturage for cattle; there is, strictly speaking, no waste land but what may occur from neglect or from bad cultivation. The greater portion of the surface is under tillage, and the system of agriculture is improving. There are some excellent quarries of freestone, which is raised for building and for other uses. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £225. There are 14 townlands in the parish, the tithes of which are annexed to the old abbey of Lisdowne, in the possession of the Leonard family, and are not included in the applotment under the rent-charge act. The church is a plain edifice, erected by the parishioners at an expense of £705; a tower was added in 1810, by a loan of £300 from the Board of First Fruits. Divine service is also performed every Sunday in the school-house at Brookborough. The glebe-house is a handsome building erected in 1825, at a cost of £876, of which £692 were a loan, also, from the Board: the glebe comprises 45½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Aughurcher, and has a chapel. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists at Brookborough, which see.

AUGHAVILLER, or AGHAVILLER, a parish, in the union of CALLAN, barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.W.) from Knocktopher, on the road from Kilkenny to Carrick-on-Suir; containing 1987 inhabitants. It comprises 5670½ statute acres. The farmhouses, being well built and slated, present a neat and comfortable appearance; there is a good freestone quarry in the parish. Castle Morres, the splendid mansion of the De Montmorency family, occupies an elevated site, and has been recently much enlarged and improved. The estate confers the titles of Baron and Viscount Mountmorres in the peerage of Ireland, which are now held by a relation of the present proprietor. Three fairs, called the "fairs of Harvey," are held at Hugginstown. The parish is in the diocese of Ossory, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the union of Kilgobann; the tithe rent-charge is £150. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is included within the union of Knocktopher, or Ballyhale; it contains two chapels, situated respectively at Newmarket and Hugginstown. Near Castle Morres, within a few yards of the site of the old church, is the lower part of an ancient round tower of brick, measuring 50 feet in circumference above the base.

AUGHER, a market-town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish, union, and barony of CLOGHER, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Clogher, and 75½ (N. W.) from Dublin; containing 753 inhabitants. Of the origin and early history of this place but very little is known. In the reign of Elizabeth, Lord-Deputy Mountjoy placed in it a powerful garrison to defend the pass through the valley in which it is situated, and the garrison retained possession for some time, constantly harassing the army of the Earl of Tyrone till his final surrender at Mellifont. From this place, also, the queen's army marched when it crossed the mountains to give battle to the earl at Magheraloney, where that chieftain's principal magazine was taken, in June 1602. At the time of the English settlement of Ulster, by virtue of a decree by James I. in 1611, Sir Thomas Ridgway, Knt., Treasurer-at-War for Ireland, received in 1613 a grant of 315 acres of land in the barony of Clogher, under an agreement that he should, within four years, settle on a parcel of land called Agher twenty Englishmen or Scots, chiefly artificers and tradesmen, to be incorporated as burgesses and made a body politic within the said four years. He was to set apart convenient places for the site of the town, churchyard, market-place, and public school; and was likewise to assign to the burgesses houses and lands, and 30 acres of commons. Sir Thomas had previously obtained, in 1611, the grant of a market and two fairs to be held here; and in 1613, the town and precincts, with the exception of a fort and bawn called Spur Royal Castle, which had been erected, were created a borough. Besides the 315 acres of land on which he was to found the borough, Sir Thomas Ridgway received a grant of 8000 acres called Portclare; and according to Pynnar's report in 1619, it appears that, besides the fort and bawn, he had built 16 houses of stone in the town, which were inhabited by English artificers, who were burgesses, and had each two acres of land, and commons for their cattle.

In 1630, Sir James Erskine, Knt., then proprietor of the manor, procured a grant of two additional fairs. On the breaking out of the war in 1641, a garrison was stationed here by Col. Chichester and Sir Arthur Tyringham, and the castle was gallantly defended against the insurgent forces, who, in an attempt to take it by storm, were repulsed. This defeat so exasperated their leader, Sir Phelim O'Neil, that in revenge he ordered his agent, Mac Donnell, to massacre all the English Protestants in three adjacent parishes. Sir James Erskine dying without male issue, the extensive manor of Portclare, which in 1665 was confirmed in the family by Charles II., under its present name of Favour Royal, was divided between his two daughters, who married into the families of Richardson and Moutray; and the respective portions are still in the possession of their descendants, of whom the present proprietor of Augher Castle has assumed the additional surname and arms of Bunbury. The castle was finally dismantled by order of parliament, and continued in a state of dilapidation and neglect till 1832, when it was restored, and a large and handsome mansion built adjoining it, by Sir J. M. Richardson Bunbury, Bart. The ancient building consisted of a pentagonal tower, surrounded by a wall 12 feet high, flanked by four circular towers. The wall has been removed, but one of the round towers has been restored; the entrance gateway has also been removed, and rebuilt on an elevated situation commanding some fine views, in which the remains of the old castle form an interesting object. The mansion stands in a well-wooded demesne of 220 acres, and upon the margin of a beautiful lake.

The town is situated on the river Blackwater, over which is a bridge adjoining it, and in a fertile valley between two ridges of lofty mountains clothed with verdure to the summit, and the highest of which, Knockmany, is covered on its south side with thriving plantations. It consists of one principal street, from which another branches at right angles on the south, leading to Clogher. There is a receiving-house for letters. Several new roads have been formed; and not far distant is an excellent bog. The lands in the neighbourhood are well cultivated, and besides Augher Castle, there are several gentlemen's seats near the town. The market is on Monday, and has become a good market for oats; fairs, also, for the sale of cattle, sheep, pigs, and other commodities, are held on the last Monday in every month, in the market-place set apart under the original grant at the bottom of Clogher-street: the market-house is the only public building in the town. The collection of tolls and customs has been discontinued by the proprietors of the manor. Here is a chief station of the constabulary police.

The charter granted in 1613 incorporated the inhabitants under the style of "The Burgomaster, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Augher," with the privilege of holding a civil court of record with jurisdiction to the extent of five marks, and the privilege of returning two members to the Irish parliament, which latter they continued to exercise till the Union, when the £15,000 compensation money for the abolition of its franchise, was awarded to James, Marquess of Abercorn. Since that period no corporate officers have been appointed, and the town is now entirely within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty-sessions irregularly. The seneschal of the manor holds a court here every third Monday, for the recovery of debts to the amount of 40s., the jurisdiction of which extends into the parishes of Errigal-Kerogue, Errigal-Through, Ballygawley, and Clogher; and a manorial court leet is held once in the year. Divine service is performed in the market-house every Sunday by the officiating clergyman of Clogher. A school for boys was built on part of the Commons hill, or Fair green, granted by the proprietors of the manor to the deans of Clogher, in trust for a school-house: the funds were provided from the "Lord-Lieutenant's School Fund."

AUGHNACLOY, a market and post town, in the parish of CARRETEEL, union of CLOGHER, barony of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 16 miles (S. E.) from Omagh, and 75½ (N. N. W.) from Dublin; containing 1841 inhabitants. This place, which is on the confines of the county of Monaghan, is situated on the river Blackwater, and on the road from Dublin to Londonderry. The town was built by Acheson Moore, Esq., who also erected the parish church, and it is now the property of his descendant. It consists of one principal street of considerable length, from which three smaller streets branch off, and contains 351 houses, the greater number of which are thatched buildings, although there are several good houses of brick roofed with slate: in the immediate neighbourhood are some gentlemen's seats. The market is on Wednesday, and is very well attended; fairs for live stock are held on the first Wednesday in every month. There is a convenient market-house. In the excise arrangements, the town is within the district of Armagh: a constabulary police station has been established here; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Monday. The church, a spacious and handsome edifice, was erected in 1736. There are also places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists; a Roman Catholic chapel stands about half a mile from the town. A fever hospital was erected in 1843. At Garvey, two miles distant, is a very valuable mineral spring, which has been found efficacious in dyspeptic and cutaneous diseases; it is inclosed within a building, and near it is a house affording accommodation to those who may frequent it for the benefit of their health. Dr. Thomas Campbell, author of Strictures on the History of Ireland, was a native of this place.

AUGHNAMULLEN, a parish, in the unions of CASTLE-BLAYNEY and COOTERHILL, barony of CREMORNE, county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER

3 miles (S. by W.) from Ballibay, on the road to Dublin; containing 18,219 inhabitants. It comprises, according to the Ordnance survey, 30,710 statute acres, including 1643½ under water: there are large tracts of mountain and bog. The mountain of Bunnanimma is an isolated mass about six miles in circumference, and its summit rises 886 feet above the level of the sea, constituting the highest point of land in the county: the waters flow from this mountain on the south-east to the sea at Dundalk, and on the west-north-west to Ballyshannon. On the south-east part of it is Lough Eagish, or Crieve Lough, partly supplied by springs, and partly by rain water, which descends from the heights by which it is flanked on the east and west. A stream issuing from it presents by its rapid fall and constant supply, together with the abundance of fuel furnished by the bogs in the vicinity, such favourable sites for bleaching-mills that not less than fourteen mills are situated on its short course northward to Ballibay water, the tail race of one serving as the head of the next below it: the lake is under the care of an engineer or waterman, to regulate the flow of water, so that a deficiency is seldom experienced even in the driest seasons. There are many other lakes in the parish, the principal of which are Lough Avcan, Lough Chantinee, and Lough Ballytrain. A battle is said to have been fought on an island in the lough opposite the glebe-house, where large bridles and battle-axes have been found: this island comprises several acres of very excellent land, mostly in pasture. Of the entire extent of the parish, 25,008 acres are arable and pasture, and 1503 bog and waste land. The soil is of an average quality, and the system of agriculture is capable of much improvement: flax of a good description is cultivated to a great extent, and wheat, oats, barley, and rye are also grown. There are very extensive bleach-greens at Crieve, near Ballibay, and similar establishments at Drumfaltra, Cremorne, and Chantinee. Flax-mills are in operation at Crieve and Laragh, and the latter, in which machinery for spinning has been erected, afford employment, with a weaving factory and bleach-green, to more than 300 persons; a large corn-mill at Rea, and two others at Derrygooney, are also well supplied with water from the lakes. Some slate-quarries of an inferior description, and a lead-mine, were formerly worked, but have been discontinued. Among the principal seats are Mountain Lodge, situated in a beautiful demesne, and Chantinee, in the demesne of which are some fine waterfalls.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £675. The church is an old and plain, but neat edifice, with a tower, and occupies a picturesque situation: it was repaired in 1830 by parochial assessment, and a loan of £150 from the Board of First Fruits; and an aisle, in the style of the 14th century, was added in 1845. Near Ballytrain is a chapel of ease, a very neat structure, for the eastern division of the parish, built in 1828, by a gift from the same Board, of £900. The glebe-house is handsome and commodious, and the glebe comprises 46 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is divided into two districts, east and west, having separate parochial clergy: there are five chapels, one of which, at Luttin, was built in 1822, at an expense of £800; another, at Loughbawn, a spacious slated edifice, was built in 1833, at an expense of £1000. There are also two places of worship for Presbyterians; one at Ballytrain, and the other at Crieve. On the summit of a hill overlooking Lough Eagish, about 35 years since, an urn was found in a rude tomb covered with a stone which weighed about two tons, supposed to be the burial-place of some prince or chief. The townland of Cremorne gives the title of Baron to the family of Dawson, of Dawson's Grove, in this county.

AUGHNISH, a village, in a detached portion of the parish of OUGHTMANNA, union of ENNISTYMON, barony of BURKEN, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N.W.) from Burren; containing 313 inhabitants. This village, like others on this part of the coast, is frequented during the summer for bathing; it is situated on the bay of Galway, and near Aughnish Point, a headland on the north side of the harbour of New Quay, projecting into the bay from the peninsula formed by the parish of Duras, in the county of Galway, and forming the northern extremity of the county of Clare. On this point is a martello tower, and there is also one on Finvarra Point, to the south-west, in another detached portion of the parish.

AUGHNISH, a parish, in the union of MILFORD, barony of KILMACRENNAN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER; containing, with part of the post-town of Ramelton, 4974 inhabitants. This parish is situated on Lough Swilly, and on the road from Letterkenny to Rathmullen; it comprises 9194½ statute acres. The land is principally arable and pasture, with a small quantity of bog; agriculture is improving, and the waste lands are being reclaimed. There are extensive bleach-greens and flour-mills; and the parish is benefited by its vicinity to the river Lannon, which is navigable for vessels of 150 tons' burthen to Ramelton. Fairs are held on the Tuesday after May 20th and Dec. 11th, and on the 17th of July; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Thursday at Ramelton. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Raphoe, united subsequently to the 15th of James I. to the rectory of Tully or Tullaferne, together forming the union of Aughnish or Tully-anghnish, which is in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge of Aughnish is £382. 0. 6., and of the entire union £825. The church, which is at Ramelton, is a plain structure rebuilt in 1825, at a cost of more than £2300, of which £600 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits, £200 a gift from the university, as patrons, £50 from the late Archbishop of Dublin, £50 from the late Sir James Stewart, £25 from the late Thomas Brookes, Esq., and the remainder from Dr. Usher, the then incumbent. The glebe-house, in the centre of the parish, one mile from the church, was built in 1828, at an expense of £3600, of which £1384. 12. were a loan from the same Board, and the remainder was either charged on the revenues of the living or contributed by the incumbent. The glebe lands in Aughnish consist of 389a. 3r., and those in Tullaferne of 512a. 15p., each portion valued at 10s. per acre. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is held by the Bishop of Raphoe; the chapel is a spacious building. There are places of worship for Presbyterians of the General Assembly, and for Wesleyans; also a dispensary, a loan fund, a fund for supplying flax, and a Ladies' Society.—See RAMELTON.

AUGHORE.—See FRESHFORD.

AUGHRIM, a post-town and parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, partly in the barony of CLONMACNOON, but chiefly in that of KILCONNELL, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 99 miles (E.) from Galway, and 75½ miles (W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 2127 inhabitants, of whom 458 are within the town. This place is celebrated for the memorable and decisive BATTLE fought in its immediate vicinity on the 19th of July, 1691, between the forces of William III., consisting of 18,000 men under the command of General De Ginkell, and the Irish army of James II., consisting of 25,000 men under General St. Ruth. Each general having taken up his position (that of St. Ruth, on Kilcommodon hill, being very strong), the action commenced at noon by a detachment from the English lines crossing a wide bog, and forcing, after a very sharp skirmish, the pass on the right of the Irish camp. About five o'clock the left wing of the English, both infantry and cavalry, advanced against the Irish; and after the engagement had continued more than an hour and a half with various success, St. Ruth detached a considerable part of the cavalry of his left wing to the support of the right, which was severely pressed. General Mackay, who was on the English right, availing himself of this opportunity, and while his cavalry were forcing the pass of Aughrim Castle, ordered several regiments of infantry to pass the bog, and wait till the cavalry wheeled from the right to sustain them. Harried on by their impetuosity, these regiments approached almost to the main body of the Irish army, and being encountered by the enemy's horse and foot were, after a severe conflict, partly driven back to the bog; but General Talmash, who commanded the English cavalry of the left wing, assisted by Generals Mackay and Rouvigny from near Aughrim Castle on the right, advancing to their support, bore down all opposition, and enabled the infantry of the centre to rally and repossess themselves of their former ground. St. Ruth, seeing that the result of the battle depended on his making a powerful impression on the English cavalry, advanced against them with a body of the Irish cavalry, but being killed by a cannon ball, his whole army was thrown into confusion and retreated with precipitation. The pursuit was continued for three miles with the greatest activity; and the Irish lost 7000 men slain and 450 taken prisoners, besides their cannon, ammunition, and baggage; while, on the side of the English, only 700 were killed and 1000 wounded. General De Ginkell, after his victory, remained here for a few days to refresh his forces.

The town, which is situated on the road from Ballinasloe to Galway, and contains 110 houses, was anciently called Eachraim, or Aghrim O'Many, and was the site of a priory of Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, said to have been founded in the thirteenth century, and to have been dedicated to St. Catherine, by Theobald, first Butler of Ireland. The establishment continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when it was given to Richard, Earl of Clanrickarde. The market has fallen into disuse: fairs, however, are held on June 21st and Oct. 14th, and the October fair is noted for the number of turkeys which are sold, in general not less than 20,000; they are smaller than those of other parts of Ireland. A constabulary police force is stationed here. The Grand Canal comes up to Ballinasloe, within three miles. The parish comprises 7252 statute acres: about half a mile from the town, on the Ballinasloe road, is an extensive bog. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, with part of the rectory united, and to which also the rectories and vicarages of Killaghton, Kilgerrill, and Killmore-daly, were episcopally united in 1735, together constituting the union of Aughrim, in the patronage of the Bishop; the remainder of the rectory is partly appropriate to the see and partly to the deanery. The tithe rent-charge of Aughrim is £110. 17., of which £24. 6. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who now receive the episcopal income, £6. 18. 6. to the dean, and the rest to the vicar; the vicar's total rent-charge from the union is £306. 6. The church is a neat edifice, erected in 1819, at a cost exceeding £1700, of which £1500 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £340 from the same Board, in 1826: the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kileconnell; the chapel here is a neat building. There are places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. Some remains yet exist of the castle of Aughrim, which, about the time of the battle, was the residence of the family of O'Kelly. Swords, spear-heads, and cannon balls, with coins of James II., are frequently dug up. Aughrim gives the title of Viscount to the family of De Ginkell, descendants of General De Ginkell, on whom it was conferred by William III., together with that of Earl of Athlone, March 4th, 1692, for his important services here and at Athlone, and to whom he subsequently granted all the forfeited estates of William Dongan, the attainted Earl of Limerick, comprising 26,480 acres of profitable land.

AUGHRIM, a parish, in the union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3½ miles (S.) from Carrick-on-Shannon; containing 4469 inhabitants. This parish, anciently called Tirebrine, is situated on the road from Dramsna to Elphin, and on the river Shannon: it comprises 8254½ statute acres, principally under tillage; there are about 130 acres of woodland, some small detached tracts of bog, and several inferior lakes. Within its limits are quarries of excellent limestone for building. Petty-sessions are held here on alternate Thursdays; and there is a fair at Ardsallagh on the 21st of December. The living is a vicarage, with the rectory and vicarage of Cloonaff and the vicarage of Killmoad episcopally united in 1811, in the diocese of Elphin; the rectory forms the corps of the prebend of Tirebrine in the cathedral of Elphin. Both the vicarage and the prebend are in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of Aughrim is £142. 10., payable in moieties to the prebendary and the vicar; and the entire amount of rent-charge payable to the incumbent is £117. 15. The church, built by subscription in 1753, is a neat plain building with a small spire, and has been repaired by a grant of £154 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is no glebe-house: the glebe comprises 18a. 2r. 25p., and is subject to a rent of £15. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is situated on the townland of Rodeen. The ruins of the old church, in which some of the earls of Roscommon were interred, yet exist. On the summit of a high hill on the estate of Rockville, which commands extensive views of the surrounding country, is a very large fort, containing in the middle a heap of stones, said to be the place of interment of some native chief.

BADONY, LOWER, a parish, in the union of GORTIN, barony of STRABANE, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Omagh; containing, with the village of Gortin, 7784 inhabitants. This place is situated on the Gortin water, and is bounded on the north by the Spereen mountains, which are the highest in the county, and among which the mountain of Sawil rises 2235 feet above the level of the sea. The base of this mountain is a vast accumulation of sand and water-worn stones, rising to an elevation of 900 feet. The parish comprises 47,921½ statute acres, including 178½ under water; the greater portion is mountain and bog, but the former affords good pasturage and the latter an abundance of fuel. On the road from Sawil to Gortin is a pass called Barnes Gap, in which various indications of copper-ore have been discovered. The mountain of Mullaghecairn, 1178 feet high, is on the other side of Gortin, towards Omagh, but rather to the east, and the beautiful and romantic glen called Gortin Gap is at its base: through this glen, which is fertile and well cultivated, the road from Omagh winds for two miles. In a large bog is the ancient fortress of Loughnacranagh, where the Earl of Tyrone sheltered himself from the British troops under Lord-Deputy Mountjoy, who despatched Sir Henry Dockwra from Omagh, in June 1602, to give battle to the Irish prince, whom he defeated. The inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture and in the breeding of cattle; and the weaving of linen-cloth is carried on in several of the farmhouses. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, separated from Upper Badony by order of council in 1706, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £562. The church, situated in the village of Gortin, and built in 1706, is now in a dilapidated state, and about to be rebuilt. A chapel of ease has been lately built in the townland of Grenan, about four miles distant from the church, on a site presented by Mr. Hamilton. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains two chapels, one at Roosky, the other at Greencastle. There are also two places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly.

BADONY, UPPER, a parish, in the union of GORTIN, barony of STRABANE, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Newtown-Stewart; containing 5822 inhabitants. A monastery for Franciscans of the third order was founded at Corrick, in this parish, about the year 1465. It continued to flourish till the dissolution, and in the reign of James I. was given, with all its possessions, to Sir Henry Piers, who soon after sold it to Sir Arthur Chichester; it was subsequently granted to the Hamilton family, whose descendant is the present proprietor. There are some highly picturesque remains of this abbey, affording an idea of the original extent and elegance of the buildings. Here was also a strong fortress, of which there are some remains. The district appears to have been distinguished at an early period as the scene of various important battles, and in the fastnesses of its mountains the lawless and daring found a secure asylum. In the reign of Elizabeth, O'Neil was defeated here with the loss of all his baggage, plate, and treasures, and compelled to make his escape across the river Bann to his castle of Roe. The parish comprises 38,208½ statute acres, including 150½ under water: nearly three-fourths are mountain and bog, and the remainder, with the exception of a small portion of woodland, is arable. The state of agriculture is progressively improving; extensive tracts of mountain have been recently inclosed and brought into cultivation, and great portions of bog and mountain may still be reclaimed. Part of the Sawil mountain is within the limits of the parish, and rises to an elevation of 2235 feet above the level of the sea. Most of the farmers and cottagers unite with agricultural pursuits the weaving of linen; and great numbers of cattle and horses are bred, and pastured in the extensive mountain tracts. Fairs are held on the 16th of every month for the sale of cattle, horses, and pigs, and are in general numerously attended. A constabulary police force has been stationed here. A manorial court is held monthly, at which debts under £2 are recoverable; and a court of petty-sessions is held every alternate week at Gortin, in Lower Badony.

This parish was formerly much more extensive than it is at present; an act of council was obtained, by which it was divided into the parishes of Upper and Lower Badony, and a church was soon afterwards built for the latter at Gortin. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £297. 14. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style, for the repair of which a grant of £108 was lately made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house, a handsome residence, was built in 1826, at a cost of £1265, of which £830 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises 600 acres, of which 150 are profitable land; the remainder is mountainous, and of little value. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are two chapels, one of which, near the foot of the mountains, is a spacious building. There are also two places of worship for Presbyterians of the General Assembly; the minister of one of them officiates also in the adjoining parish of Lower Badony. The parochial male and female school is aided by a small annual payment bequeathed by the late C. Hamilton, Esq., but is chiefly supported by the rector.

BAGNALSTOWN, a post-town, in the parish of DUNLECKNEY, barony of IDROONE EAST, union and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 8 miles (S.) from Carlow, and 49 miles (S. S. W.) from Dublin; containing 2225 inhabitants. This town is beautifully situated on the river Barrow, and on one of the mail-coach roads from Dublin to Kilkenny; it is a place of considerable trade, and contains 370 houses, and some extensive corn-mills. It has a patent for two fairs, and ten other fairs have been established by the proprietors.

Quarter-sessions are held here in Jan., April, July, and October, and petty-sessions every Monday; there is a manorial court, but no seneschal is at present appointed. Here is a station of the constabulary police. The court-house is a handsome building in the Grecian style, in front of which is a portico with four Doric pillars. There are also a large Roman Catholic chapel, and a dispensary.

BAILIEBOROUGH, or MOYBLOGUE, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, partly in the barony of LOWER KELLS, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, and partly in that of CASTLERAMAN, but chiefly in that of CLONKEE, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Kells, and $42\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W.) from Dublin; containing 10,699 inhabitants, of whom 1203 are in the town. This town is situated on the road from Coochill to Kells, and consists of only one street, containing 196 houses. The market is the largest in the county, and is on Monday: fairs are held on Feb. 17th, May 17th, June 15th, Aug. 14th, Oct. 14th, and Nov. 17th. The Hilary and Midsummer general quarter-sessions are held here: the court-house was enlarged and improved in 1834. The bridewell was built in that year, and contains five cells and two yards, with separate day-rooms and yards for female prisoners. A manorial court is held yearly; and here is a station of the constabulary police. Under the excise arrangements, the town is within the district of Drogheda.

In the incumbent's title this PARISH is denominated "Moybologue otherwise Bailieborough:" it was formed by act of council in 1778, by separating from the parish of Killan, now called Sherecock, 29 townlands including the town of Bailieborough, and uniting them to the old parish of Moybologue. It comprises 17,152 statute acres. The land is generally of good quality: that part of the parish which is in the county of Meath is cultivated for all kinds of grain. Several small bogs are scattered over the surface, which are diminishing in extent either by draining or by digging for fuel. There are some quarries of an inferior kind of stone, chiefly used for building; and about a mile from the town is an extensive bleach-green, with a comfortable house and small demesne. Bailieborough Castle, the seat of Sir Wm. Young, Bart., is situated in a fine demesne, and occupies the site of an ancient fortress described in Pynnar's Surrey, under the head of Tonregie, as a vaulted castle, with a bawn 90 feet square, and two flanking towers, attached to which were 1000 acres of land: this ancient castle remained standing till within a few years, when it was pulled down to make room for additions and improvements in the present house. The living is a united rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £414. 16s., of which £235. 11s. are payable by the Moybologue portion of the parish, and the remainder by the townlands added to it. The old church being a dilapidated building, a new one has lately been erected. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £100 and a loan of £900, in 1811, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe consists of two farms near the church, comprising 132 acres of arable and pasture land, and 39 acres of bog. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Killan or Sherecock, and partly in that of Kilmainham and Tivorchur: the chapel of the former portion is situated in the town of Bailieborough, and that of the latter at Tivorchur. There are two meeting-houses for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and the Wesleyan Methodists have also a place of worship, in which divine service is performed every alternate Sunday. A dispensary was established in 1822. The workhouse, on a site of six acres purchased for £340, was completed in 1842, at a cost of £6000, and is constructed to contain 600 paupers.

BALBRIGGAN, a sea-port, market, and post town, and a chapelry, in the parish and union of BALROTHERY, barony of BALROTHERY EAST, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 15 miles (N. by E.) from Dublin; containing 2959 inhabitants. According to Ware, a sanguinary conflict took place here on Whit-sun-eve, 1329, between John de Bermingham, Earl of Louth, who had been elevated to the palatine dignity of that county, Richard, Lord De Malahide, and several of their kindred, in array against the partisans of the Verduns, Gernons, and Savages, who were opposed to the elevation of the earl to the palatinate of their county; the former, with 60 of their English followers, were killed. After the battle of the Boyne, William III. encamped at Balbriggan on the 3rd of July, 1690. The town, which is situated on the eastern coast and on the road from Dublin to the north of Ireland, owes its rise, from a small fishing village to a place of manufacturing and commercial importance, to Baron Hamilton, who in 1780 introduced the cotton manufacture, for which he erected factories, and who may justly be regarded as its founder. It contains 624 houses, many of which are well built; hot baths have been constructed for visitors who frequent the place during the bathing season. In the environs are several gentlemen's seats, the principal of which is Hampton Hall, the residence of the Hamilton family. The inhabitants are partly employed in the fishery, but principally in the cotton manufacture; there are two large factories, the machinery of which is worked by steam-engines and water-wheels of the aggregate power of 84 horses, giving motion to 7500 spindles, and spinning upon the average about 7400lb. of cotton-yarn per week. More than 300 persons are occupied in these factories, to which are attached blue-dye works; and in the town and neighbourhood are 942 hand-looms employed in the weaving department. The principal articles made at present are checks, jeans, calicoes, and fustians. The town is also celebrated for the manufacture of the finest cotton-stockings, which has been carried on successfully since its first establishment about 50 years since; 60 frames are employed in this trade, and the average produce is about 60 dozen per week. There are on the quay a large corn-store, and some extensive salt-works; and in the town is a tanyard. The fishery, since the withdrawing of the bounty, has very much diminished: there are at present only 10 wherries or small fishing-boats belonging to the port.

The town carries on a tolerably brisk coasting-trade: in a recent year, 134 coal vessels, of the aggregate burthen of 11,566 tons, and 29 coasting-vessels of 1795 tons, entered inwards, and 17 coasters of 1034 tons cleared outwards, from and to ports in Great Britain. The exports consist chiefly of corn, meal, and flour, and the chief import is coal. The harbour is rendered safe for vessels of 150 tons' burthen by an excellent pier, completed in 1763, principally by Baron Hamilton, aided by a parliamentary grant; and is a place of refuge for vessels of that burthen at $\frac{1}{2}$ tide. A jetty or pier, 420 feet long from the N.W. part of the harbour, with a curve of 105 feet in a western direction, forms an inner harbour in which at high tide are 14 feet of water, and affords complete shelter from all winds; it was commenced in 1826 and completed in 1829, at an expense of £2912, of which the late Fishery Board gave £1569, the Marquess of Lansdowne £100, and the remainder was subscribed by the late Rev. Geo. Hamilton, proprietor of the town. At the end of the old pier is a lighthouse. The Drogheda or Grand Northern Trunk railway from Dublin passes along the shore close to the town, and to the east of the church. The market is on Monday, and is abundantly supplied with corn, great quantities of which are sent to Dublin and to Liverpool; there is a market for provisions on Saturday; and fairs are held on the 29th of April and September, chiefly for cattle. A market-house was erected in 1811, partly by subscription and partly at the expense of the Hamilton family. The town, in the excise arrangements, is within the district of Drogheda; it is the head-quarters of the constabulary police force of the county; and near it is a martello tower with a coast-guard station, which is one of the nine stations within the district of Swords. Petty-sessions for the north-east division of the county are held here every alternate Tuesday.

The CHAPELRY of St. George, Balbriggan, was founded by the Rev. G. Hamilton, of Hampton Hall, who in 1813 granted some land and settled an endowment, under the 11th and 12th of George III., for the establishment of a perpetual curacy; and an augmentation of £25 per annum has been recently granted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners from Primate Boulter's fund. In 1816 a chapel was completed, at an expense of £3018, of which £1400 were given by the Board of First Fruits, £479 were raised by voluntary subscriptions of the inhabitants, and £1139 were given by the founder and his family. This chapel, which was a handsome edifice with a square embattled tower, and contained monuments to the memory of R. Hamilton, Esq., and the Rev. G. Hamilton, was burned by accident in 1835, and the congregation assembled for divine service in a schoolroom till it was restored, for which purpose the Ecclesiastical Commissioners granted £785: the total cost of restoring and enlarging the building was £966. The living is in the patronage of G. A. Hamilton, Esq. There is a chapel belonging to the Roman Catholic district of Balrothery and Balbriggan; also a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parochial school and a dispensary are in the town.—See BALROOTHERY.

BALDOYLE, a parish, in the union of NORTH DUBLIN, barony of COOLLOCK, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (N.E.) from Dublin; containing 1100 inhabitants, of whom 835 are in the village. Sir W. de Windsor, lord-justice of Ireland, held a parliament here in 1369. The village is pleasantly situated on an inlet or creek of the Irish Sea, to the north of the low isthmus that connects Howth with the main land: it comprises 174 houses, and is much frequented in summer for sea-bathing. Some of the inhabitants are engaged in the fishery, which at the commencement of the present century employed nine wherries belonging to this place, averaging seven or eight men each; at present nearly 100 men are so engaged. The creek is formed between the mainland and the long tract of sand on the north of Howth, at the point of which, near that port, a white bnoy is placed; it is fit only for small craft. The manor was granted to the priory of All Saints, Dublin, by Diarmit, the son of Murchard, King of Leinster, who founded that house in 1166. The corporation of Dublin now own the entire parish, which comprises 1235½ statute acres, about two-thirds whereof are arable: the system of agriculture is improving, and the general routine of crops is pursued with success. The village has a receiving-house for letters under Dublin, and is a chief station of the constabulary police, and also a coast-guard station, forming one of the nine that constitute the district of Swords. The Drogheda or Grand Northern Trunk railway, from Dublin to that town, passes through the Grange of Baldoyle. The parish is in the diocese of Dublin, and is a curacy forming part of the union of Howth. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is included in the district of Baldoyle and Howth, which comprises also the parishes of Kinsealy and Kilbarrack, and contains three chapels, situate respectively at Howth, Kinsealy, and Baldoyle: the last has been rebuilt by subscription, and has a portico of four Tuscan pillars surmounted by a pediment, above which rises a turret supporting a dome and cross. At the Grange are the picturesque ruins of the ancient church, surrounded by horse-chestnut, lime, and sycamore trees; and in the grounds of Donaghmede is a holy well, resorted to on St. John's eve.

BALDUNGAN, a parish, in the union of BALROOTHERY, barony of BALROOTHERY EAST, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 14 miles (N.N.E.) from Dublin; containing 118 inhabitants. A strong fortress was erected here, in the 13th century, by the Barnewall family. It subsequently became the property of the lords of Howth, and in the civil war of 1641 was defended for the parliament by Col. Fitzwilliam, but was ultimately surrendered to the royalists, by whom it was dismantled, and a great portion of the building destroyed. The remains, which were very extensive, have, within the last few years, been almost wholly taken down by the tenant. Near the site are still some remains of a church, more than 80 feet in length, with a tower of ten sides, of durable materials and excellent workmanship. According to Archdall, here was a preceptory of Knights Templars, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and of which the building just described was probably the church. The parish comprises 858 statute acres; the prevailing substratum is limestone, but the hill of Baldungan is chiefly composed of Lydian stone and flinty slate. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Dublin, and in the patronage of the Earl of Howth: the tithe rent-charge is £39. 3. The church is in ruins, and there is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Skerries.

BALDWINSTOWN, a village, in the parish of GARISTOWN, union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, barony of BALROOTHERY, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N.W.) from Asbourne; containing 133 inhabitants. It lies on the Dublin road.

BALEEK, or BELLEK, a parish, in the union of NEWRY, partly in the barony of LOWER FRYS, and partly in that of LOWER ORION, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (S.E.) from Market-Hill. The village contains 112 inhabitants, and is on the road from Newry to Newtown-Hamilton. In the reign of Elizabeth an English garrison was stationed at this place; but it was besieged and taken by O'Donnell, of Tyrconnell, who put every individual to the sword. The parish was constituted in 1826, by the separation of twelve townlands, comprising 5509 statute acres, from the parish of Loughgilly; eight pay tithes to the perpetual curate, and four to the rector of Loughgilly. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Rector of Loughgilly: the tithe rent-charge is £348. 8., of which £134. 8. are payable to the curate, and the remainder to the patron. The church, built in 1827, by a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits, is a plain small edifice in the ancient style, with a lofty square tower. There is no glebe-house: the glebe comprises 21 acres in the townland of Lisnalee. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is one of three forming the district of Loughgilly, and contains a chapel. There is also a place of worship for Presbyterians.

BALFEIGHAN, a parish, in the union of CLBRIDGE, barony of UPPER DUCK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (N.) from Kilcock; containing 152 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Kilcock to Summerhill, is one mile and a half in length and one mile in breadth, and comprises 1617 statute acres: the Royal Canal runs through the southern verge of the parish. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and forms part of the union of Raddonstown: the tithe rent-charge is £65. 15. In the Roman Catholic divisions Balfeghan is part of the district of Batters-town. There are some remains of the old church.

BALGRIFFIN.—See BALGRIFFIN.

BALLAGH, or BAL, a market-town and parish, in the union of CASTLEBAR, barony of CLANMORRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (S.E. by E.) from Castlebar; containing 1934 inhabitants, of whom 562 are in the town. This town is situated on the road from Castlebar to Claremorris, and is intersected by a small river which has its source in the vicinity: it consists of one long street containing 166 houses, all of modern erection, and has a cheerful and pleasing appearance. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs are held on June 11th, Aug. 12th, Sept. 26th, and Oct. 15th, which are among the largest in the county for cattle and sheep; there are two smaller fairs on the 1st of May and 7th of October. A receiving-house for letters is in connexion with the post-office at Ballyglass. Here is a constabulary police station; and petty-sessions for the district are held every Tuesday in the court-house, a neat building of modern erection. The parish comprises 5509½ statute acres: the lands are partly under tillage and partly in pasture, and for fertility are thought equal, if not superior, to any in the county. Limestone abounds, and is quarried for building and agricultural purposes. Athevalla is a handsome mansion nearly adjoining the town.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, with the rectories and vicarages of Rosleece and Minola episcopally united, forming the union of Ballagh, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory constitutes the corps of the prebend of Ballagh in the cathedral of St. Mary, Tuam. The tithe rent-charge of Ballagh is £131, and the prebend is retained as of the value of £146 per annum; the rent-charge of the whole, both rectorial and vicarial, amounts to £296. 5., which is received by the prebendary, who is also rector of the union. There is neither church nor glebe-house; the glebe comprises six acres. Divine service is occasionally performed in the court-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Drum, Rosleece, and Minola, and containing two chapels: one in the town, a good slated building; and the other situated at Balcarru. St. Mochua, or Cronan, who died in 637, founded a monastery here, of which he became the first abbot. Ballagh is at present distinguished for the remains of an ancient round tower, which, though the upper part is wanting, is still about 50 feet high. Near it are the ruins of a small church, of the same kind of stone, and apparently of similar workmanship, in one of the walls of which is a monumental inscription of great antiquity. In the town are two chapels, built on arches over the river, and numbers of people resort thither annually to perform special devotions. A well, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, with a small chapel attached, is also attended by the peasantry, at patrons held on the 15th of August and 8th of September. About two miles from the town is Castle Derowil, and three miles distant is Briaze Castle, both square buildings of the ordinary character.

BALLAGH.—See BELLOUGH.

BALLAGHADIREEN, a market and post town, in the parish of KILCOLEMAN, union of CASTLEREA, barony of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 12 miles (W.S.W.) from Boyle, and 97½ miles (W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 1342 inhabitants. This town is situated on the new mail-coach road from Ballina to Longford, and consists of three streets, containing 224 houses, nearly all of which are neatly built and slated. Here are infantry barracks, adapted to the accommodation of 4 officers and 92 non-commissioned officers and privates. Many improvements have recently taken place in the town, which is rapidly rising into importance. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on March 25th and 26th, May 1st, June 25th, Aug. 1st, Sept. 8th, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 22nd. The market-house is a commodious building; and a court-house has been erected, in which petty-sessions are held every Tuesday. A chief constabulary police station and a coast-guard station have been established here; there is also a Roman Catholic chapel. Within a mile of the town are the ruins of Castlemore.—See KILCOLEMAN.

BALLAGHKEEN, a village, in the parish of BALLYRUSKARD, union of ENNISCORRY, barony of BALLAGREEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (S.S.W.) from Oulart; containing 132 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Sow.

BALLAGHMEIHAN.—See ROSSINIVER.

BALLAGHMOON, a parish, in the union of ATHY, barony of KILKEA and MOONE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.W. by S.) from Castledermot; containing 308 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the confines of the county of Carlow, and comprises 2178 statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, and forms part of the union of Castledermot: the tithe rent-charge is £82. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, it forms part of the union or district of Castledermot.

BALLAGHTOBIN.—See BALLYTOBIN.

BALLEE, or BALLY, a parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of LECALE, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Downpatrick, on the road to Ardglass; containing 2255 inhabitants. It formerly comprised 6427½ statute acres, but the townlands of Jordan's Crew and Kildare's Crew have been severed from it under the Church Temporalities act, and united to the parish of Ardglass, and Ballystokes has been annexed to Saul, all three with their tithes and cure of souls; the tithes of Ballyhosit have been also appropriated to the incumbent of Ardglass, but the cure of souls remains to the rector of Ballee. It is wholly under cultivation; the land is very good, and there is neither waste nor bog. Until lately Ballee formed part of the corps of the deanery of Down, but the union was dissolved under the provisions of the Church Temporalities act, which came into operation on the 1st of November, 1834; and on the preferment of the late dean, a new arrangement was effected by act of council. The living is now an independent rectory, in the diocese of Down, and in the gift of the Crown. The entire tithes of the parish, before the passing of the rent-charge act, amounted to £598. 14. 3., of which, under the new arrangement, £340. 13. were payable to the rector of Ballee, subject to a deduction of £25. 3. appropriated to the economy fund of the cathedral; and of the remainder, £146 were payable to the dean, £97 to the rector of Ardglass, and £14 to the rector of Saul. These sums are now, of course, reduced one-fourth under the rent-charge act. The church is a large plain edifice without a tower, built on the foundations of a former structure in 1740. The glebe-house was built at an expense of £500, of which £450 were a gift and £50 a loan from the Board of First Fruits, in 1816; there is a glebe of seven acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballee is the head of a district, which also comprises the parish of Ballyculter, and contains three chapels, situated respectively at Ballycrottle in Ballee, and at Strangford and Cargagh in Ballyculter. There is also a large meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the Remonstrant Synod. J. Dunn, an eccentric itinerant dealer, by will in 1798, gave £100 in trust to A. Gracy, Esq., who purchased with it a chief-rent at Ballymote, in the parish of Downpatrick, which is divided annually between the Presbyterian poor of Down and Ballee. R. Glenny left £100, the interest to be equally divided among the poor Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Presbyterians of the parish, but it is not now available; and Mrs. Kelly, of Loughkeland, by will in 1805, gave £100 in trust to Mr. Gracy, who purchased a house in Downpatrick, now let on lease at an annual rent of £10, which is distributed among the poor at Christmas. Near the mountain of Slieve-na-Gridel, which rises 414 feet above the level of the sea, is a remarkable Druidical altar, the table-stone of which is 11 feet long and 9 broad; and on the townland of Ballyalton is an ancient burial-ground, in which are some curiously inscribed stones. A splendid golden torques, richly ornamented and set with gems, was found near the glebe in 1834.

BALLEEK.—See BALEEK.

BALLEEN, a parish, in the union of KILKENNY, barony of GALMOY, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (W. N. W.) from Freshford; containing 637 inhabitants. It comprises about 1409 statute acres, and is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Freshford or Agboure; the rectory is appropriate to the Dean and Chapter of St. Canice, Kilkenny. The tithe rent-charge is £76. 0. 6., of which £50. 13. 8. are payable to the appropriators. In the Roman Catholic divisions Balleen is included in the district of Lisdowney. Here are the picturesque ruins of a castle, on a stone of which is inscribed the date 1455.

BALLIBAY, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of CASTLE-BLAYNEY, partly in the barony of MONAGHAN, but chiefly in that of CREMORNE, county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER, 8 miles (S. by E.) from Monaghan, and 50 miles (N. W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 6606 inhabitants, of whom 1768 are in the town. This place, which is situated at the intersection of the roads from Castle-Blayney to Cote-hill and from Carrickmacross to Monaghan, derives its name from a pass between the lakes at the southern extremity of the town. A battle was fought in the vicinity, at Ballydian, between De Courcy, first earl of Ulster, and the Mac Mahons and O'Carrolls. Prior to the introduction of the linen manufacture the town was of very little importance; but since the establishment of its linen market about the middle of the last century, it has rapidly advanced, and at present it contains 344 houses, many of which are respectable, and comfortably built. It has become the principal mart for the inhabitants of the surrounding country, and the facilities of communication have been increased by the Dundalk and Enniskillen railway, which passes through the town, and has a station here. The manufacture of linen, of a texture from nine to fourteen hunders, is extensively carried on throughout the parish. The market is on Saturday, and is amply supplied; great quantities of butter are sold, and from October to February inclusive not less than from 6000 to 12,000 stone of flax are sold weekly: there are also extensive markets for grain on Tuesday and Friday. Fairs are held on the third Saturday in every month, and are remarkable for large sales of horses, horned-cattle, and pigs. In the excise arrangements, the town is within the district of Dundalk. A reading society was established in 1816, and is supported by a proprietary of annual subscribers; the library contains nearly 1000 volumes. Petty-sessions are held in the market-house every second Thursday; and here is a constabulary police station.

The parish comprises 6741½ statute acres, of which 161 are in the barony of Monaghan, and 5580½ in that of Cremorne; 180 acres are under water. It was formed by act of council in 1796, by separating several townlands from the parishes of Tullycorbet and Aughnamullen. Its surface is studded with lakes, and boldly diversified with hills and dales: about four miles from the town is the mountain of Bunnamimma, 886 feet above the level of the sea, and at the base of which are bleach-grounds and mills. The approach to the town opens upon an extremely beautiful and picturesque tract of country. To the east are seen, at the distance of 30 miles, the deep-blue summits of the lofty Slievegullion, with a village, about a quarter of a mile beneath, apparently embosomed in hills and situated on the margin of a lake a mile in diameter, which forms its boundary on the east and south, and is itself bounded by a rich amphitheatre of woods. The soil of the parish is of a fair average quality, and the state of agriculture has latterly been improved by the introduction of thorough-draining and green crops; the growth of flax has been much encouraged, and large quantities of very good quality are raised. There is no waste land. Very extensive tracts of bog supply the inhabitants and the various works with abundance of fuel; so great is the quantity consumed that many of the manufacturers employ from 60 to 100 persons for three months every year to dig and prepare it. The draining of these bogs, and the numerous population collected around the works, have caused a great change in the climate of the Bunnaninmma mountain, which formerly was liable to be enveloped in thick fogs for ten or twelve days successively; but now the drying of the turf is seldom interrupted for a single day. The mountain lands, though naturally very poor, have on this side been nearly reclaimed. The prevailing substratum of the parish is whinstone; slate also exists, and was formerly quarried for roofing; and there are extensive quarries of greenstone, called "Ribbil," of which the town is built. A lead-mine was opened at Laragh, about half a mile from the town, but it has not been worked since 1826; it is very rich in ore, and from silver found in it some plate has been manufactured. About half a mile from the town is Leslie House, the seat of Mrs. C. Leslie, on whose estate the town is built; it is a handsome and spacious mansion, beautifully situated on the border of a lake, and backed by some extensive plantations.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £287, 8 s. The church, erected in 1798, and enlarged in 1823 by aid of a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, is a neat edifice occupying a romantic situation on an eminence rising abruptly from the lake; the east window is embellished with stained glass, and there are some tablets to the memory of the Leslie family. The glebe-house, built at the same time as the church, at a cost of £1239, is a handsome residence, towards the erection of which the Board gave £100; it stands in grounds beautifully planted by the present rector. The glebe comprises 16 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Tullycorbet: the chapel is situated at Ballintra, about a mile and a half from the town; and there is a small chapel of ease in the town, connected with the clergyman's residence. There are also two places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, one of which, in the town, is a handsome building in the later English style; the other is about a mile distant. A dispensary is open two days in the week for the gratuitous aid of the poor.

BALLIBOFEY, a village, in the parish and union of STRANORLAR, barony of RAPHOE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 10½ miles (W. by S.) from Lifford, and 118 miles (N. W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 782 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Finn, and on the road from Donegal to Strabane, and consists principally of one street, the entire village containing 152 houses. A market for grain and provisions is held in a market-house every Thursday; and cattle fairs are held on May 21st and Dec. 20th. Here is a station of the constabulary police.—See STRANORLAR.

BALLICKMOYLER, a village, in the parish of KILLEBAN, union of ATHY, barony of SLIEFEMARGE, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 7½ miles (S. S. W.) from Athy, on the road from Maryborough to Carlow; containing 294 inhabitants. Previously to the disturbances in 1798 this place was rapidly increasing in extent and prosperity, and had obtained a patent for holding a weekly market; but during that calamitous period more than half of it was laid in ruins, and its market was abandoned. The village now contains 52 houses; and there are some gentlemen's seats in the vicinity. Fairs are held on March 16th and Nov. 11th, and petty-sessions every Wednesday; the village is the chief constabulary police station for the barony, and contains a dispensary.

BALLINA, a sea-port, market, and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of KILMOREMOV, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 17¼ miles (N. N. E.) from Castlebar, and 125 miles (W. N. W.) from Dublin; containing 5313 inhabitants. This town, originally called Beltelek, or the "Ford of the Flax," owes its origin to O'Hara, Lord Tyrawley, who built the first street, of which some houses are still remaining; and is indebted for the commencement of its commercial importance to the establishment of a cotton-factory here, in 1729, by that nobleman, who also obtained for the inhabitants the privilege of a weekly market and a fair. During the disturbances of 1798 the town was attacked by the French under General Humbert, who, having landed on the 22nd of August in Kilcummin bay, and made themselves masters of that village, sent forward on the day following a detachment to assault this place. This detachment, on its approach to the town, affecting to retreat from a reconnoitring party that had been sent out by the garrison, led it into an ambushade, where the Rev. G. Fortescue, nephew of Lord Clermont and rector of the parish, who had volunteered his services, was shot by a party of the French that had concealed themselves under a bridge. On the 24th, the main body of Humbert's forces advanced to the town, of which they took possession on the evening of the 24th, when the garrison, under Colonel Sir T. Chapman and Major Keir of the Carbineers, retreated to Foxford, a village about eight miles distant.

The town is beautifully situated on the river Moy, by which it is separated from the county of Sligo, and on the mail-coach road from Sligo to Castlebar; it consists of several streets, and contains 1012 houses, most of which are regular and well built. The river, over which are two stone bridges, is navigable from the sea, about six miles distant, for vessels not drawing more than 11 feet of water, to within a mile and a half of the town. Barracks have been erected, and have lately undergone considerable repair. Races are held at Mount Falcon, generally in May, on a fine course. Within the last 20 years great improvements have taken place in the town; many new houses have been built, and are inhabited by merchants and others engaged in trade and commerce. A line of road leading to Killala, and continued to Foxford and Swinford, with the intention of completing it to Longford, has been constructed by aid of £8000 from government, and shortens the distance between Ballina and Dublin at least 10 miles. A line of road along the bank of the river, leading to the quay at Ardunaree, has also been made, at an expense of £1500, one-half of which was paid by the merchants of this place and the other by the county of Sligo; and another line of road on the Ballina side of the river, intended to communicate with the quay at Belleek, has been formed at an expense of £700 raised by subscription, towards which Messrs. Armstrong and West largely contributed. A bridge communicating with the lower part of the town, at a short distance from the old bridge, was erected in 1837, at an estimated expense of £1200, defrayed by subscription, towards which the Earl of Arran, proprietor of a large portion of the town, contributed £100; it is called Arran Bridge. Other improvements are also in progress and in contemplation; the grand juries of the counties of Mayo and Sligo lately presented £3000 towards the erection of a handsome bridge on the site of the present old bridge, which is inconveniently narrow. A ship-canal was formerly commenced by government, under the superintendence of Mr. Nimmo, for bringing vessels up to the town, instead of landing their cargoes at the present quay; but after £1000 had been expended, the works were discontinued, and they have been since falling into decay. A communication by canal to Lough Conn, and thence to Galway, was projected by Mr. Bald, the late county surveyor, which would open an abundant source of industry and wealth to the inhabitants of these mountain districts, at present inaccessible from want of roads, and would greatly increase the commercial interests of the town. The environs are pleasantly diversified; and near the town are numerous gentlemen's seats.

A very extensive tobacco and snuff manufactory was established in 1801, by Mr. Malley, who first persevered in opening the navigation of the river Moy, and thus gave a powerful impulse to the commercial prosperity of the town: the manufacture continued to flourish, and in 1809 the duties paid to government amounted to £8000. In 1834, Mr. J. Brennan, a merchant from Belfast, introduced the provision trade, which was previously unknown in this neighbourhood, and erected spacious premises adjoining the river, and commodious stores 350 feet long and 140 feet wide, with complete apparatus adapted to a peculiar method of curing. In this concern 10,000 pigs are annually killed, and after being cured are sent to London; other firms also carry on an extensive provision trade. There are two large ale and porter breweries, and two large oatmeal and flour mills. The weaving of linen is carried on to a small extent by weavers who work in their own houses. This is the principal port in the county: the exports consist chiefly of corn and provisions, and the imports of cotton and woollen goods, iron, coal, sugar, &c. Even in 1829 there were 119 vessels, of the aggregate burthen of 11,097 tons, employed in the exportation of grain, to the extent, in the course of that year, of 10,831 tons of oats, 130 tons of wheat, 106 tons of barley, and 30 tons of meal; and during the same period, 66 vessels, of the aggregate burthen of 5479 tons, were employed in the importation of British and foreign goods. In 1835 the exports amounted to £70,568, and the imports to £13,532: at present the trade of the port is still more extensive. The fishery is carried on with success; at the falls of the river are salmon-weirs, which have been rebuilt by Messrs. Little at an expense of £1500, and in which great quantities of fish are taken to be shipped for Dublin and Liverpool. Farther down the river, near the quay, are placed drafting-nets, in which numbers are also taken; the whole fishery is rented at £1500 per annum. The market is on Monday; and fairs are held on the 12th of May and the 12th of August: commodious shambles have been erected in Mill-street for the use of the market. The Provincial Bank and the National Bank have each established a branch here. In the excise arrangements Ballina is within the district of Foxford; and it is a chief station of the constabulary police. Courts of petty-sessions are held every Tuesday, and a quarter-session in July every year: the court-house, a neat plain building, was erected at an expense of £1000, paid by the county. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists, and a dispensary. The work-house, on a site of eight acres purchased for £640, was completed in 1842, at an expense of £9400, and is constructed to contain 1200 paupers. On the eastern bank of the river are the remains of an abbey, founded by St. Olcan or Bolcan, a disciple of St. Patrick; they have a large ancient doorway of beautiful design.—See KILMOREMOY and ARDUNAREE.

BALLINA, a village, in the parish of TEMPLECHALLY, union of NENAGH, barony of OWNEY and ARRA, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER; containing 774 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Killaloe to Nenagh, and on the river Shannon, over which is a bridge of nineteen arches connecting it with the town of Killaloe, in the county of Clare. It contains 105 houses; has a fair on the 24th of March, chiefly for pigs; and is a constabulary police station. One of the chapels belonging to the Roman Catholic district of Templechally and Kilmastulla, otherwise called the union of Ballina and Boher, is also situated in the village. Near the bridge were some remains of an ancient castle, probably erected to defend the passage of the river; they were removed by the Shannon Commissioners when the bed of the river was lately deepened here eight feet by them.—See TEMPLECHALLY.

BALLINABOY, a parish, partly in the barony of CORK, and partly in the baronies of EAST MUSKERRY and KERRYCURRIGH, but chiefly in the barony of KINNALLEA, union of KINSALE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Cork, on the road to Kinsale; containing 2749 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the river Awinaboy, formerly belonged to the abbey of St. Finbarr, and, in 1592, was, with other lands, granted by Queen Elizabeth to Henry Davells; it subsequently became part of the estate of the first earl of Cork, from whom the property descended to the Earl of Shannon, the present owner. In 1600, Florence McCarthy assembled here 9000 of his followers, and made a desperate attack on the English, whom he compelled to take refuge within the walls of an old castle. During their retreat, however, a party of English musketeers, having concealed themselves behind the bank of a ditch, fired upon the Irish forces; and the English cavalry, charging them at the same time, put them completely to the rout.

The parish comprises 7973 statute acres, of which five-sixths are arable. The land on the north side of the river is cold and mountainous, and 500 or 600 acres are covered principally with heath; the system of agriculture is in a very unimproved state. As there is no bog, fuel is obtained from the bog of Annagh, in the adjoining parish. Ballinaboy House is a handsome modern mansion, surrounded with young and thriving plantations. There is a flour-mill at Five-mile-bridge, and another in the village of Ballinahassig. At a short distance from the latter place, a fine arch, 50 feet in height and nearly of the same span, has been thrown over the glen, at the back of Mount-Mary: over this arch passes the high road from Ballinahassig to Innishannon. A new road from Cork to Kinsale has also contributed to the improvement of the place. At the Half-way House is a constabulary police station. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Earl of Shannon, the proprietor, who contributes £25 per annum towards the curate's stipend, which is augmented to £75 from Primate Boulter's fund: the tithes, estimated at £500, long since merged into the rent. The church is a small dilapidated building, said to have been new-roofed about 70 years ago. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Ballinahassig, in which there are two chapels.—See BALLINAHASSIG.

BALLINACALLY, a village, in the parish of KILCHRIST, union of ENNIS, barony of CLONDERLAW, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (N.N.E.) from Kildysart; containing 194 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Kildysart to Ennis, and near the river Fergus, on the banks of which is a small quay of rude construction, from which corn, butter, pork, and other agricultural produce are sent to Limerick, in boats of 10 or 12 tons burthen, and where limestone and sea manure are landed for the supply of the neighbourhood. It has a receiving-house for letters under Ennis and Kilrosh, and a public dispensary: fairs are held on June 14th, Sept. 16th, and Nov. 8th, chiefly for cattle. A little to the north of the village is the ruined tower or castle of Dangan, the upper part of which is supported only by the winding stone staircase.—See KILCHRIST.

BALLINACARGY, or BALNACARRIG, a market and port town, in the parish of KILBIXY, union of MULLINGAR, barony of MOYGOISH, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Mullingar, and $45\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 483 inhabitants. The town is situated on the road from Mullingar to Colehill in the county of Longford, and near the Royal Canal; it contains 75 houses, neatly built, and roofed with slate. Nearly adjoining it is an extensive deer-park. The markets are on Wednesday for corn and butter, and on Saturday for provisions; fairs are held on the 9th of May and Oct. 20th. It is a constabulary police station; and petty-sessions are held every Wednesday. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel for the district of Kilbixy is situated in the town; also a large school-house built by Lord Sunderlin, and a dispensary.—See KILBIXY.

BALLINACARRIG, otherwise STAPLESTOWN, a parish, partly in the barony of RATHVILLY, but chiefly in that of CARLOW, union and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (E. N.E.) from Carlow; containing 692 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Burren, and on the road from Carlow to Tullow, comprises $2605\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. Two-thirds of the land are arable, and nearly one-third pasture or wet grazing land; there is little waste or unprofitable bog; the state of agriculture is improving. Here are some quarries of excellent granite for building, and some mills at which about 10,000 barrels of flour are annually made. The living is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Leighlin, united by act of council in 1804 to the rectories of Tullowmagrath and Ballycrogue, constituting the union of Staplestown, in the gift of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the Dean and Chapter of Leighlin. The tithe rent-charge of Ballinacarrig is £127. 10., of which £75 are payable to the dean and chapter, and £52. 10. to the impropriate curate; the entire rent-charge of the benefice payable to the incumbent is £308. 18. The church, situated in Staplestown, is a small neat edifice, erected in 1821, at an expense of £1000, of which £900 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits; it contains a tablet to the memory of Walter Bagenal, the last male representative of that ancient family. The glebe-house was built in 1809, at a cost exceeding £600, the greater part of which was a loan from the same Board; the glebe consists of three acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the district of Tullowmagrath, also called Tiriland. Some remains of the old church yet exist. Sir Wm. Temple resided at Staplestown, from which many of his letters are dated; there are still some remains of the house in which he lived.

BALLINACLASH, a district parish, in the union of RATHDRUM, barony of BALLINACOR, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W. by S.) from Rathdrum. This district is situated on the river Avonbeg, over which is a bridge, and on the road from Rathdrum to Glenmalur; about two-thirds of the land are mountainous, and the remainder arable and pasture. It is of recent creation as a parish, and comprehends the constabularies of Ballykine and Ballinacor, forming a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Dublin, and in the patronage of the Rector of Rathdrum, who pays the curate's stipend, £50 per annum. The church is a neat building with a square tower, in the later English style of architecture, erected in 1834, at an expense of £1000, of which £900 were a gift from the Church Temporalities Commission. There is no glebe-house or glebe.—See BALLYKINE and BALLINACOR.

BALLINACLOUGH.—See BALLYNACLOUGH.

BALLINACOR, a constabulary, or sub-denomination of the parish of RATHDRUM, barony of SOUTH BALLINACOR, union of RATHDRUM, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Rathdrum; containing 1359 inhabitants. This place is situated in the mountain district leading to Glenmalur, in the centre of which is Croaghmoira, 2175 feet above the level of the sea. It comprises 17,448 acres, of which about three-fourths are mountain, and the remainder arable and pasture land. Ballinacor, the seat of W. Kemmis, Esq., is beautifully situated on the side of a hill commanding an extensive view of the vale towards the Connoree copper-mines. The military road intersects the constabulary, in which are the barracks of Drumgoff and Aughavanah. Fairs are held on Feb. 4th, May 1st, Aug. 4th, and Nov. 4th. This is one of the denominations that constitute the union or benefice of Rathdrum; it also forms, with the constablewick of Ballykine, the perpetual cure of Ballinaclash, in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, and in the patronage of the Incumbent of Rathdrum. The tithe rent-charge is £78.

BALLINACOURTY, a parish, in the union of GALWAY, barony of DUNKELLIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Oranmore; containing 3407 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the eastern shore of the bay of Galway, and on the road from Oranmore to an inlet of the bay forming the approach to Claren-Bridge; it comprises 6993 statute acres. The inlet of Tyrone or Ballinacourty is well sheltered, and has good anchorage for vessels drawing not more than ten feet of water, which, however, must not venture in within two hours of low water of spring tides, as there are then only nine feet in the channel. Westerly winds, also, sometimes occasion a great swell at the entrance, in which case it should not be attempted before half flood, nor after half ebb. On the south side of the haven is a small pier called St. Kitt's, built by the Fishery Board, but never properly finished, and now in a ruinous condition. Small craft sail up three miles further, to a point near Claren-Bridge and Kilcolgan. Fairs for pigs and horses are held four times in the year at Claren-Bridge. The living consists of a rectory and a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Tuam; the former is part of the union of St Nicholas and corps of the wardenship of Galway; the latter is one of four which constitute the union of Kileummin. The tithe rent-charge is £180, of which £135 are payable to the warden, and £45 to the perpetual curate. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the diocese of Galway, and forms part of the district of Oranmore; the chapel is a large thatched building, capable of accommodating 1000 persons. At the village of Ballinacourty are the remains of an old church.

BALLINACOURTY, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CORKAGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 8½ miles (E. by N.) from Dingle, on the road to Tralee; containing 1472 inhabitants. It comprises 5318 statute acres: a considerable portion is rough mountain pasture, with some bog, but mostly reclaimable; the remainder is under cultivation. Some boats are employed in fishing in the bay of Dingle, but for want of proper shelter the fishery is very limited. The construction of a small pier on this side of the bay would be of great advantage, and it is in contemplation to build one. Fairs are held at Ballinclare on the 1st of May and 4th of October, for black-cattle and pigs. At Annascall, or Ounescall, is a constabulary police station; and petty-sessions are also held there. A senechal's court for the barony is held at Ballintarmin, generally on the last Wednesday in the month: debts not exceeding £10 late currency are recoverable. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardferd and Aghadoe, forming part of the union of Kildfyn; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Cork. The tithe rent-charge is £141. 3s. The church, which is at Annascall, was erected by aid of a loan of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1816. The glebe-house of the union is situated here, and was built by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £300 from the same Board, in 1818: the glebe comprises 10 plantation acres, exclusively of an old glebe of four acres about a mile distant. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Ballinvoahir; a chapel has been erected at Annascall. There are still some remains of the old church in the burial-ground.

BALLINACURRA, a village, in the parish of MIDDLETON, partly in the barony of IMOKILLY, but chiefly in that of BARRYMORE, union of MIDDLETON, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (S.) from Middleton; containing 802 inhabitants. This place is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Middleton river, and contains 152 houses. It is well situated for trade; and several large grain stores and malt-houses have been built, and some excellent quays constructed. A bridge has been thrown across the creek, forming part of the road to Restellan; and other improvements are in contemplation. A considerable trade is carried on in the exportation of grain, chiefly to Liverpool, Bristol, and London; and in the importation of coal, timber, iron, slate, and other heavy goods for the supply of the flourishing town of Middleton, to which place the navigation might be extended at a small expense. Limestone is very abundant throughout the vicinity, and great quantities are quarried for building, and burnt for agricultural purposes. The harbour communicates with that of Cove by a passage called the East Ferry; the tide rises here from eight to twelve feet, and brigs of 300 tons' burthen can safely sail up to the quay. In the neighbourhood are several handsome houses, occupied by wealthy individuals; nearly adjoining the village are the ruins of the ancient parish church.—See MIDDLETON.

BALLINADEE, a parish, in the union of BANDON, East Division of the barony of EAST CARRERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S.E.) from Bandon; containing, with the merged parish of Kilgoban, 3038 inhabitants, of whom 284 are in the village. It comprises 8334 statute acres, nearly the whole under tillage: the land is generally good, and the system of agriculture has very much improved; the cultivation of turnips, vetches, and other green crops, has been introduced with advantage. Slate-quarries in different parts are worked, but not to a great extent, for the supply of the neighbourhood and of the town of Bandon; the produce is also sent down the river Bandon to be shipped to Cork and other ports. The village consists of about 60 houses, most of which are small but well built, and it contains a large flour-mill, which was much improved in 1836. A new line of road has been constructed, within the last twelve years, to Ballinspittle, a distance of three miles and a half; and another road is now being made from the town of Bandon to the deep water of the river at Kilmacsimon, where vessels of larger tonnage can discharge than at Colliers Quay, about a mile higher up. There are several small quays on the river, at which great quantities of sea-sand for manure are landed for the supply of the adjacent parishes: more than 100 boats are engaged in raising it, about 80 of which belong to this parish. Among the gentlemen's seats is Rock House, on the side of a romantic glen, in the centre of some highly improved grounds. Kilgoban Castle, at present untenanted, is situated near the river Bandon, and is in good preservation, forming a striking feature in the surrounding scenery, which in many parts is picturesque and very interesting, particularly in the vicinity of the glens near the village of Ballinadee. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, united at a period prior to any existing record with the denominations of Kilgoban, Rathdownlan, and Mackloneigh, which constitute the corps of the treasurership in the cathedral of St. Finbarr, Cork, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £462. 8. The church is a neat edifice, rebuilt in 1839. The glebe comprises 5 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Courceys, and contains a chapel, a large plain edifice, rebuilt within the last 15 years, at an expense of £400. On the lands of Kilgoban is the ruined tower of an ancient castle, which belonged to the family of McCarthy; beneath this tower, by the river's side, a great quantity of gold and silver coins, with numerous gold rings, was dug up in 1824.

BALLINAFAD, a village, in the parish of AUGHANAGH, union of BOYLE, barony of TIRAGHRILL, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Boyle, on the road to Sligo; containing 32 houses and 155 inhabitants. Here is a receiving-house for letters under the Boyle post-office. A fair is held on the 29th of August; and in the village is a station of the constabulary police.—See AUGHANAGH.

BALLINAFAGH.—See BALLYNEFAGH.

BALLINAGAR, a village, in the parish and barony of GRASHILL, union of TULLAMORE, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Philipstown, on the road from Edenderry to Tullamore; containing 22 houses and 107 inhabitants. A large and handsome Roman Catholic chapel for the district of Ballykean was lately erected, in the ancient English style of architecture.—See GRASHILL.

BALLINAGERAGH, a village, in the parish of KILCARRAGH, union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (S. W. by S.) from Listowel, on the road to Tralee; containing 23 houses and 139 inhabitants. A patron fair, one of the largest in the county, is held here on Sept. 29th.—See KILCARRAGH.

BALLINAGH, or BELLANANAGH, a market-town, in the parish of KILMORE, barony of CLONMAHON, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Cavan, on the road to Granard; containing 636 inhabitants. This town was entirely destroyed by fire in a disturbance which took place in 1794; it consists at present of two streets crossing each other at right angles, and contains 153 houses, the greater part of which are thatched. The market is on Saturday, and is held in a neat plain market-house: fairs are held on March 31st, June 6th, August 5th, Oct. 3rd, and Dec. 21st. There is a receiving-house for letters under Cavan; the town is a station of the constabulary police; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Wednesday. The town contains a Roman Catholic chapel; also a good slated school-house, having on the ground floor a schoolroom for boys, and on the upper story one for girls.—See KILMORE.

BALLINAGLERAGH.—See DRUMREILLY.

BALLINAGORE, a village, in the parish of NEWTOWN, union of MULLINGAR, barony of MOYCARHEL, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Kilsbeggan, on the road to Mullingar; containing 28 houses and 125 inhabitants. The river Brusna flows through the village, and is crossed by a bridge of four arches: on its banks is an extensive bleach-green, with a fulling-mill. There are also some large flour-mills, capable of grinding 40,000 barrels of wheat annually, and affording employment to 70 men. Here is a station of the constabulary police.—See NEWTOWN.

BALLINAHAGLISH.—See BALLYNAHAGLISH.

BALLINAHASSIG, a village, in that part of the parish of BALLINABOY which is in the barony of KERICURRIHY, union of KINSALE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S.) from Cork, on the road to Kinsale; containing 152 inhabitants. It is distinguished as the scene of a battle which took place in 1600, between a party of English and the insurgent forces under the command of Florence McCarthy. Some employment is afforded to the population by mills capable of making 7000 barrels of flour annually. There is a receiving-house for letters under Cork and Kinsale: fairs are held on May 1st, June 29th, Aug. 10th, and Sept. 29th; and here is a dispensary. Ballinahassig is the head of a Roman Catholic district, comprising the parishes of Ballinaboy, Dnnderrow, and Templemichael-de-Dungh, and containing chapels at Ballyheedy and Killeedy Hill.—See BALLINABOY.

BALLINAHINCH, a market and post town, in the parish of MAGHERADROLLO, union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of KINELARTY, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 8 miles (E.) from Dromore, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ (N. by E.) from Dublin; containing 911 inhabitants. This town was founded by Sir George Rawdon, Bart., after the insurrection of 1641, as appears by a patent of Charles II., granting the lands of Kinelarty to the Rawdon family. The patent, after reciting that Sir George had built a town and two mills and had repaired the church, and that a large space had been appropriated for holding markets and fairs, created the manor of Kinelarty, with a demesne of 1000 acres and regular courts leet and baron, and granted the privilege of a market to be held on Thursday, and two fairs annually. During the disturbances of 1799, the main body of the insurgents, after being repulsed near Saintfield, took post here on Windmill-hill and on some high ground in the demesne of the Earl of Moira, a descendant of Sir G. Rawdon. On the 12th of June, General Nugent marched against them from Belfast with the Monaghan regiment of militia, part of the 22nd dragoons, and some yeomanry infantry and cavalry; and he was joined near this place by Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart with his party from Downpatrick, making in all about 1500 men. The insurgents were soon driven from their post on the Windmill-hill, and the king's troops set fire to the town. Both parties spent the night in preparations for a general action, which took place at an early hour on the following morning, and was maintained about three hours with artillery, but with little effect. At length the Monaghan regiment of militia, posted with two field-pieces at Lord Moira's gate, was attacked with such determined fury by the pikemen of the insurgents that it fell back in confusion on the Hillsborough cavalry, which retreated in disorder. These troops, however, rallied; and while the Argyshire fencibles, entering the demesne, were making their attack on another side, the insurgents retired to a kind of fortification on the top of the hill. This they for some time defended with great courage, but at length they gave way, and dispersed in all directions; the main body fled to the mountains of Slieve Croob, where they soon surrendered, or retired to their several homes, and thus was the insurrection terminated in this quarter.

The town is situated on the road from Dromore to Saintfield, and consists of a square and four streets, comprising 155 houses, many of which are well built. There is a post-office under the offices of Comber and Dromore. The market is on Thursday, and is well supplied; fairs are held on the first Thursday in January, Feb. 12th, March 3rd, April 5th, May 19th, July 10th, Aug. 18th, Oct. 6th, and Nov. 17th. A linen-hall was built by the Earl of Moira, but it is now in ruins. Here is a station of the constabulary police. A court for the manor of Kinelarty was formerly held, in which debts to the amount of £10 were recoverable; it has fallen into complete disuse. In the square is a large court-house, built by Lord Moira in 1795, but now, like the linen-hall, in a dilapidated state. The same nobleman also built a church in 1773, which, having fallen into decay, was taken down in 1839, and a new edifice was erected on its site, towards which £850 were granted by the Board of First Fruits; the tower and spire of the old building remain on the west side of the present church. Opposite to it is a spacious Roman Catholic chapel; and there are three places of worship for Presbyterians, in connexion with the General Assembly. In a picturesque and fertile valley, two miles south of the town, is a powerful sulphureous chalybeate spring, which is much resorted to during summer, and has been highly efficacious in scrofulous disorders: there are two wells, one for drinking and the other for bathing, kept in good order by the proprietor of the soil, D. S. Ker, Esq., M.P. The grounds adjoining are tastefully laid out in walks, parterres, &c. An assembly-room and news-room have been erected by Mr. Ker, and the neat cottages in the vicinity of the "Spa" afford comfortable accommodation, on moderate terms, to the visitors.—See MAGHERADROLL.

BALLINAKILL.—See BALLYNAKILL.

BALLINAKILL, a market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of DYSARTGALLEN, union of ABBEYLEIX, barony of CULINAGH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 10 miles (S. E.) from Maryborough, and 50 miles (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 1540 inhabitants. This is a place of some antiquity, but was not created a market-town till the year 1606, when a grant of a market and fair was made to Sir T. Coatch, proprietor of the manor of Galline. In 1612 it was incorporated by James I., and invested with considerable privileges, to foster the plantation here by Sir T. Ridgway, Bart. The castle, of which there are still some remains, fell into the possession of the Roman Catholic party during the insurrection of 1641; and when Cromwell's troops overran the island, being bravely defended by its garrison, it was cannonaded from the Warren-Hill, adjoining Heywood demesne, by General Fairfax, and the garrison was at length compelled to surrender. The town is situated in a fertile district, the soil of which is principally composed of a deep clay adapted both for the dairy and for tillage. To the east is Heywood, a richly varied demesne, ornamented with plantations and with artificial sheets of water. The manufacture of woollen stuffs, formerly more extensive, is still carried on to a considerable extent, and is on the increase: a brewery has been established more than sixty years. The market is on Saturday, and has somewhat declined since the establishment of a market on the same day at Abbeyleix, a few years since: there is a good market for butter on Tuesday. The market-house is kept in repair by Earl Stanhope, the lord of the manor. Fairs are held on the 16th of Jan. and Feb., 22nd of March and April, 13th of May, first Thursday after Whit-Sunday, 13th of June and July, 12th of Aug., and 16th of Sept., Oct., Nov., and Dec.; that in Nov. is a large fair for bullocks. A sub-office here is in connexion with the post-office of Abbeyleix. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Kilkenny; and it is a station of the constabulary police. Under the charter of James I., the corporation consisted of a sovereign, twelve burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen; and returned two members to the Irish parliament until the Union. Quarter and petty sessions were formerly held in the town, but have been removed to Abbeyleix, about three miles distant. The parish church, situated here, is a handsome edifice with a tower and spire; the east window, which is of stained glass and very handsome, was purchased on the continent, and presented by the late Frederick Trench, Esq. Ballinakill is the head of a Roman Catholic district, comprising the parish of Dysartgalen and parts of Abbeyleix and Ballyroan, and containing chapels at Ballinakill (a spacious edifice) and Knockardigur. Here is also a dispensary.

BALLINAKILLY, or BALLYNAKILTY, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, barony of KILLIAN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Ballinamore, on the road from Tuam to Ballinasloe; containing, with the parish of Aghiert, 1762 inhabitants. The area of this parish is 5920½ statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and forms part of the union of Moylough; the tithe rent-charge, including Aghiert, is £111. 8. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballinakilly is part of the district of Mount-Bellew.

BALLINALACK, a village, in the parish of LENEY, union of MULLINGAR, barony of CORKAREE, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 8 miles (N. W. by N.) from Mullingar; containing 59 houses and 312 inhabitants. This place is situated on the banks of the river Inny, over which is a bridge of five arches, and on the road from Mullingar to Longford. It is a chief constabulary police station.

BALLINALEE, LONGFORD.—See JOHNSTOWN, ST.

BALLINAMALLARD.—See MAGHERACROSS.

BALLINAMARA.—See BALLYNAMARA.

BALLINAMEEN, a village, in the parish of DESERT-OGHILL, barony and union of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 1 mile (S.) from Garvaghy; containing 192 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Dublin to Coleraire.

BALLINAMONA, a village, in the parish of DUNKITT, union of WATERFORD, barony of INA, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Waterford; containing 125 inhabitants. It is situated on a branch of the road from Waterford to New Ross.

BALLINAMONA, county CORK.—See MOURNE.

BALLINAMORE, co. GALWAY.—See KILLIAN.

BALLINAMORE, a market and post town, in the parish of OUTRAGH, union of MOHILL, barony of CARRIGALLAN, county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, $19\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from CAVAN, and $77\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 946 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the road from Killesnandra and intersected by a small river, consists of 162 houses, many of which are neatly built. It was formerly a seat of the iron manufacture, and works were established for smelting the ore found in the vicinity. The market, which is on Tuesday, is one of the largest in the county for grain and provisions; and fairs are held on the 15th of February, May 12th, Aug. 16th, and Nov. 12th. Ballinamore is a constabulary police station; petty-sessions are held irregularly; and the quarter-sessions for the southern division of the county are held here in April and October. A court-house has been erected, to which is attached a bridewell containing four cells, with apartments for the keeper; the cost of the building was £2200, of which £1200 were lent by government, to be repaid by instalments. The parish church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a place of worship for Methodists, are situated in the town. Near it is Garadise Lough, a considerable sheet of water, and there are several other lakes in the vicinity.—See OUTRAGH.

BALLINAMUCK, late a village, in that part of the parish of KILLOE, which is in the barony of LONGFORD, union and county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 8 miles (N.) from the town of Longford, on the road from Newtown-Forbes to Arvaagh. A portion of the French army under General Humbert, which had landed in Kileummin bay on the 22nd of August, 1798, to assist the insurgent forces, made a final stand in this neighbourhood, where, being surrounded by the English army under Lord Cornwallis, they were compelled to surrender on the 8th of the following month. Having arrived on the preceding evening, the French forces were closely pursued by Colonel Crawford and General Lake; while Lord Cornwallis, crossing the river at Carrick-on-Shannon, advanced to St. Johnstown to intercept their progress to Granard. Colonel Crawford having attacked their rear, about 300 of the infantry surrendered themselves prisoners; the remainder continued to defend themselves for about half an hour, when, on the appearance of the main body of the army under General Lake, they also surrendered. In consequence of the disturbed state of the neighbourhood and the disaffection of the people, this village was levelled to the ground by the landlord in 1841.—See KILLOE.

BALLINARD.—See BALLYNARD.

BALLINASAGGART.—See ENRIGALL-KEROGUE.

BALLINASLOE, a market and post town, and the head of a union, partly in the parish of CREAGH, barony of MOYCARNON, county of ROSCOMMON, but chiefly in the parish of KILCLOONY, barony of CLONMACNOON, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 12 miles (W. by S.) from Athlone, and $71\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Dublin, on the road to Galway; containing 4934 inhabitants. This town is situated on the river Suck, which divides it into two unequal parts, the larger of which is in the county of Galway. It appears to have arisen under the protection of its castle, which in the reign of Elizabeth was one of the strongest fortresses in Connaught, and the ruins of which are situated on the Roscommon side of the river. The town is now one of the most flourishing in the south and west of Ireland: it comprises 657 houses, nearly all slated, and is under the management of commissioners appointed agreeably with the provisions of the act 9th George IV. c. 82. The two portions are connected by a line of two bridges and causeways, crossing some small islands, and about 500 yards in length, in which are 16 arches. Here are three tanyards, a flour and three oatmeal mills, a manufactory for felt hats, a coach-manufactory, two breweries, and a large establishment for curing bacon: in the vicinity are some quarries of excellent limestone. An extension of the Grand Canal has been formed within the last few years from Shannon harbour to this town, through the bogs on the south side of the river Suck, and not only affords a regular conveyance for passengers to Dublin and other places, but greatly facilitates the trade of the town. The Ballinasloe Horticultural Society for the province of Connaught was founded in 1833, under the patronage of the Earl of Clancarty, and holds its annual meetings on the first Monday in March; three public shows take place in the year, when prizes are awarded for the best specimens of various kinds of fruit, flowers, and vegetables. The annual meetings of an agricultural society are also held here, in October. Garbally Park, in the immediate vicinity, is the seat of the Earl of Clancarty, the proprietor of the town: the mansion is situated in a well-wooded demesne, and was rebuilt in 1819; it contains a good collection of paintings, and the public are allowed free access both to the house and grounds. Near the town, also, is the residence of Mackna. The market is on Saturday, and is well supplied with corn. The celebrated fair of Ballinasloe is the greatest cattle mart in the kingdom; it is held on the Galway side of the river, from the 5th to the 9th of October. The black or horned cattle are exhibited in an extensive area set apart for the fair, outside the town; and a plot of ground in Garbally Park is appropriated to the show of sheep on the day before the fair, when very extensive purchases are made, and those that remain unsold are driven to the fair-green. Great quantities of wool were formerly sold, but the establishment of factories in Dublin and other large towns, has altered the channel of this branch of trade. The number and variety of goods exhibited for sale render the fair a great resort for all classes of dealers. The number of sheep exhibited in a recent year was 61,632, of which 54,974 were sold; and of cattle, 7443, of which 6927 were sold: the numbers have since much increased. Fairs for live stock are also held on May 7th and July 4th; and on the 6th of July there is a large fair for wool, which has been lately revived, and lasts four days: the wool fairs formerly continued from two to five weeks. Branches of the Bank of Ireland and the National Bank are established. Petty-sessions are held every Wednesday and Saturday in a court-house attached to the bridewell. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Galway; it is the head-quarters of the Galway constabulary police; and a company of infantry, for whose accommodation there is a barrack for 56 men, and two companies of cavalry, are occasionally stationed here.

The church of the union of Creagh occupies an elevated site in the town. In the Roman Catholic divisions

Ballinasloe is the head of a district comprising the parishes of Killoony and Creagh, and containing a chapel in each; that of Killoony is situated at the extremity of the market-square. There are also places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. The lunatic asylum for the province of Connaught, situated here, was opened in 1833, and is capable of accommodating 150 inmates; it is built of limestone, in the form of the letter X, with a handsome cupola, and the ground attached to it comprises 14 plantation acres inclosed by a wall: the entire expenditure, including cost of building and purchase of site and furniture, was £27,130. Here is also a dispensary, and a Benevolent Society has been formed. The workhouse, on a site of 5½ acres rented at £10. 13., was completed in 1841, at a cost of £7600, and is constructed to contain 1000 paupers. The remains of the castle consist of the outer walls only, inclosing a square area, with a round tower in one angle, which has been converted into a neat residence called Ivy Castle; the most picturesque portion is a bridge across the fosse to a gateway. The townland of Dunlo, on which the Galway portion of the town is built, gives the inferior title of Viscount to the Earl of Clancarty.—See KILLOONY and CREAGH.

BALLINCALLA, or BALLINCROLLA, a parish, in the union of BALLINROSE, partly in the barony of ROSS, county of GALWAY, but chiefly in that of KILMAINE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (S. W.) from Ballinrobe, on the road to Cong; containing 9165 inhabitants. It comprises 15,195½ statute acres, whereof 3196 are in Lough Mask; about one-half of the land is under tillage, one-fourth is pasture, and the remainder waste mountain and bog. A fair is held at Lough Mask, on the 30th of September. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and forms part of the union of Kilmolara: the tithe rent-charge is £246. The glebe-house of the union, situated here, was erected by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £398 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1819; the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballincalla is part of the district called the Neale. On the borders of Lough Mask are some remains of an old castle.

BALLINCOLLIG, a post-town, in the parish of CARRIGORMANE, union of COAK, barony of BARRETTES, county of COAK, and province of MUNSTER, 5½ miles (W.) from Cork, and 130½ miles (S. W.) from Dublin, on the road from Cork to Macroom; containing 1287 inhabitants. This place is chiefly distinguished as a military depot, and for its extensive gunpowder-mills, formerly carried on under the superintendence of government, but, after having been for some years discontinued, recently purchased by the present proprietors, and now in full operation. The Artillery Barracks form a quadrangular pile of buildings, having in the eastern range the officers' apartments, and on the western side an hospital, and a neat church built in 1814, in which divine service is regularly performed by a resident chaplain. The buildings contain accommodation for 18 officers and 242 non-commissioned officers and privates, and are adapted to receive eight field batteries, though at present only one is stationed here, to which are attached 95 men and 44 horses: in the centre of the quadrangle eight gun-sheds are placed in two parallel lines, and near them are the stables and offices; within the walls is also a large and commodious schoolroom. Immediately adjoining the barracks, and occupying a space nearly four miles in extent, are situated the Gunpowder Mills, 16 in number. At convenient distances are the different establishments for granulating and drying the gunpowder, making charcoal, refining sulphur and saltpetre, and making casks and hoops and the various machinery connected with the works; the whole communicating with each other, and with the mills, by means of small canals constructed for facility of carriage, and for preventing such accidents as might occur from other modes of conveyance. In appropriate situations, and near these establishments, are the residences of the different persons superintending the works; and at the eastern extremity of the ground, but at a considerable distance from the mills, are two ranges of comfortable cottages for a portion of the workpeople, now tenanted by 54 families, who obtain a comfortable livelihood. The number of persons employed is about 200, and the quantity of gunpowder manufactured annually is about 16,000 barrels. The police depot for the province of Munster is also situated here; the men are drilled till they become efficient, and then drafted off to the different stations in the province. There is a Roman Catholic chapel. To the south of the town, and on a limestone rock rising abruptly from the surrounding meadows, are the remains of Ballincollig Castle, one of the towers of which is in tolerable preservation.—See CARRIGORMANE.

BALLINCREE, a village, in the parish of KILCOLLUM, union of WATERFORD, barony of IDA, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N.) from Waterford; containing 197 inhabitants. It is situated near Lough Cullin.

BALLINUSLANE, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACRE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Castleisland; containing 5701 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the west bank of the river Blackwater, and on the confines of the county of Cork, is intersected by the old and new roads from Castleisland into that county, and by another road lately made by the Board of Works from Ballinahalla to the village of Brosna, through the mountains. It comprises 39,740 statute acres, a large portion of which consists of rough mountain pasture and of bog that is mostly reclaimable: the arable land is of good quality, and limestone is found in abundance in many places, and used principally for manure. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ardferd and Aghadoe, and till lately was one of the four that constituted the union of Castleisland, in the patronage of the proprietors of that seignory; but the union has been divided into three separate livings, confirmed by act of council in 1836: the tithe rent-charge is £345. The church, an extremely neat edifice, lately built by a grant from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and by subscription, is situated near Ardnagrath. In the Roman Catholic divisions, the parish, with the exception of a small portion attached to Knocknashel, forms part of the district of Castleisland; the chapel, a plain but commodious building, is situated at Cordel, near Ardnagrath. At Ardnagrath are the ruins of Desmond's chapel, with a burial-ground attached, now called Kilnanimans; here were interred the remains of "The Great" Earl of Desmond, who was slain in 1583. In the demesne of Kilmurry House, lately built by the Rev.

A. Macintosh, incumbent of the parish, is Kilmurry Castle, which was taken by Colonel Phaire, of Cork, in 1650; it is still in a good state of preservation. This castle, and those of Kilcushnan and Bally-Mac-Adam, all situated within half a mile of each other, were inhabited by three brothers named Fitzgerald, of the Desmond family, between whom such enmity subsisted that none of them would suffer the others to pass unmolested through his lands.

BALLINDANGAN.—See CROSSBOYNE.

BALLINDERRY, a parish, in the union of LURGAN, barony of UPPER MASSAREENE, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Moira; containing 5679 inhabitants. At Portmore, in this parish, an extensive castle was erected by Lord Conway, in 1664, on the site of a more ancient fortress: it contained accommodation for two troops of horse, with a range of stabling 140 feet in length, 35 feet in breadth, and 40 feet in height; the remains consist of the garden wall, part of the stables, and the ruins of one of the bastions. During the Protectorate the learned Jeremy Taylor retired to this place, and remained at the seat of Lord Conway till the Restoration, when he was promoted to the bishopric of Down and Connor. On a small island in the lough at Portmore are some remains of a summer-house, in which he is said to have written some of the most important of his works; and in the neighbourhood his memory is still held in great respect. THE PARISH is situated on the road from Antrim to Dublin, and is intersected by the mail-coach road from Lurgan to Antrim, to the former of which places here is a sub-office for letters: it comprises 10,891 statute acres, of which $283\frac{1}{2}$ are in Portmore Lough. The land is almost all arable and in a good state of cultivation; the system of tillage is still improving. There is, strictly speaking, little or no waste; in the north-east and south-west parts are some valuable hogs. The weaving of linen and cotton affords employment to a considerable number of persons, but the greater number of the inhabitants are engaged in agriculture. The Lagan canal from Lough Neagh, on the north-west, to Belfast, passes within the distance of a mile. The parish is within the jurisdiction of the manorial court of Killultagh, held at Lishurn.

THE LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Hertford, in whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £360, of which £300 are paid to the vicar, and £60 to the impropriator. The church was erected in 1821, through the exertions of Dean Stannus, at an expense of £2300, of which the Marquess of Hertford gave £1000, and the Board of First Fruits lent the remainder; it is a handsome edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a tower and spire 128 feet in height, and is beautifully situated on rising ground near the village of Upper Ballinderry. There is a glebe of $7\frac{1}{2}$ acres, not a glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Aughagallon and Ballinderry; the chapel is a small building. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly; also a Moravian meeting-house. Mr. Murray bequeathed £100 British; J. Moore Johnston, Esq., £83. 6 s., and Hugh Casement, Esq., £25, Irish currency, to the poor. The old parish church, built after the Restoration of Charles II., still remains; and on the eastern side of it is a burial-place called Templecormack, in the centre of which the foundations of a small building may be traced. There are also some remains of an ancient church close to Portmore Lough, at the western extremity of the parish. The manor of Killultagh gives the title of Baron Conway of Killultagh to the Seymour family.

BALLINDERRY, or BALLYBERRY, a parish, in the union of MONEYMORE, partly in the barony of DUNGAN-NON, county of TYRONE, but chiefly in the barony of LOUGHINSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from Money-more; containing 3362 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the Ballinderry river, which here separates the above-named baronies and counties, and falls into the north-western portion of Lough Neagh. It comprises 8177 statute acres, of which $2268\frac{1}{2}$ are in the county of Tyrone, and $5908\frac{1}{2}$ in Londonderry; 2978 acres form a portion of Lough Neagh. The greater part belongs to the Salters' Company, of London; the townland of Ardagh is held under Cromwellian debentures, and is the only land in the county of Londonderry, west of the river Bann, that is held by that tenure. A castle was built by the company at Salterstown, in 1615, soon after they had obtained the grant of those lands from James I.; and in the insurrection of 1641 it was surprised by Sir Phelim O'Neill, who put all the inmates to death, with the exception of the keeper, who, with his wife and family, effected their escape to Carrickfergus, where, taking refuge in the church, they were finally starved to death. It continued for some time in the possession of the insurgents, who, being ultimately driven from their post, destroyed it, together with the church adjoining.

Nearly the whole of the land in the parish is arable, and under an excellent system of cultivation; a valuable tract of bog produces excellent fuel, and there is no waste land. The inhabitants combine with agricultural pursuits the weaving of linen and cotton cloth; and at Ballyronan, an extensive distillery has been established on the shore of Lough Neagh, close to the little port of Ballyronan. THE LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Lord-Primate: the tithe rent-charge is £144. The church, an edifice in the later English style of architecture, was erected in 1707. The glebe-house was built in 1800, at an expense of £900, of which £100 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 256 acres of well-cultivated arable land. The Roman Catholic parish is joined to the parish of Tamaght: the old chapel at Ballylifford is no longer used, a new chapel having lately been built near the road side, in the same townland; at Derryaghlin is an altar in the open air. Near the church is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The ruins of the castle at Salterstown, situated on the margin of the lake, present a picturesque and interesting appearance, but are fast mouldering away. Adjoining the bridge over the river are the remains of an iron forge, erected by the Salters' Company in 1626, but which soon after fell into disuse. At Salterstown, near the site of the old church and close to the shore of Lough Neagh, is a chalybeate spring, which has been found efficacious in cutaneous disorders, and was formerly much resorted to; but having become mixed with other water, its efficacy is greatly diminished.

BALLINDERRY, WICKLOW.—See RATHDRUM.

BALLINDOON, a parish, in the union of CLIFDEN, barony of BALLINAHINCH, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (S.W.) from Clifden; containing 5615 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the Connemara or western coast, and comprises 20,033 statute acres; within its limits are the bays of Mannin and Bunowen, Slyne Head, and the islands of Innisdonrow, Innisdoogan, Innisinnan, Llyn, Carrigaroon, Doonglass, Immul, Duck, Horse, Islannora, and Fox. In the famine that prevailed on this part of the coast, in 1831, the inhabitants were reduced to extreme want and destitution, and but for the timely aid of the London Relief Committee, it would have been, in the words of the parish priest, "a desert and uninhabited country." The manufacture of kelp was formerly carried on to a very great extent, and was a source of lucrative employment till the alteration in the duties took place, since which time it has been altogether discontinued. At present, agriculture and fishing are the chief occupations of the inhabitants, almost all of whom have portions of land; the females make a red flannel for domestic use, and many are employed in knitting woolen-stockings, which are celebrated as the Connemara hose, but the price is so low as scarcely to repay their labour, they being unable to earn more than three-halfpence daily. In Bunowen bay a vessel may ride in moderate weather; the entrance is on either side of a rock called Carrigascuity. From Ross Point, on the main land, a range of rocks extends to Slyne Head, which is situated in latitude $53^{\circ} 24' 30''$ (N.) and longitude $10^{\circ} 7' 40''$ (W.), and runs off to the westward in five or six small islets, the outermost of which is Island Immul, which has deep water close in shore; there are two sounds among these isles that may be passed by boats. On this Head the commissioners for improving the port of Dublin have erected a light-house. Rounding the Head are Mannin bay and the harbour of Ardbear or Clifden. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and forms part of the union of Ballynakill: the tithe rent-charge is £30. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Clifden; the chapel is a neat building.

BALLINDRAIT, a village, in the parish and union of LIFFORD, barony of RAPHOE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.N.W.) from Lifford, containing 174 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Lifford to Raphoe.

BALLINECARGY, a village, in the parish of DRUNG, union of COOTEHILL, barony of TULLAGH-GARVEY, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (S.W.) from Cootehill, on the road to CAVAN; containing 85 inhabitants.

BALLINGADDY, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Kilmallock, on the road to Kilkenny; containing 1761 inhabitants. It comprises 5999 statute acres, of which about 400 are mountain, and the remainder generally in a good state of cultivation. The residence of Mount Russell is beautifully situated at the foot of the mountain range, commanding an extensive view over a very rich vale. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and forms part of the union of Kilmallock: the tithe rent-charge is £210. The ruins of the old church are situated near Riverfield; and adjoining the churchyard are 24 acres of excellent glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballingaddy forms part of the district of Kilmallock; the chapel is a small thatched building.

BALLINGARRY, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, three miles (N.E.) from Kilkenny, on the road to Galbally; containing 2834 inhabitants. It comprises 6114 statute acres: the land is generally good, and some recent improvements in tillage have been introduced. The surface is varied, and there are some hills of considerable elevation, of which the Black mountain and Slieve-Reagh are the principal, stretching westward towards Kilkenny, and every where affording excellent pasture for numerous herds of young cattle and flocks of sheep. Near Grierston, on the border of the parish, is a very extensive and valuable bog; in the midst of it rises a copious stream flowing southward towards Mitchelstown, and also another flowing northward and forming part of the Daun. Fairs are held at Ballinivreena, also on the border of the parish, on April 21st, June 21st, Aug. 31st, and Nov. 19th, for horses, cattle, and pigs. There are several large and handsome houses, among which are Annagurra and Grierston, the latter the fine old family mansion of the Masseys. Ballingarry is a rectory, in the diocese of Emly, and forms part of the union and corps of the prebend of Kilkennick in the cathedral of Emly: the tithe rent-charge is £187. 10. The church is a ruin situated on a gentle elevation, and forming a conspicuous object. The glebe comprises six plantation acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the chapel is a large modern edifice in the village of Glenbrohane.

BALLINGARRY, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of NEWCASTLE, barony of UPPER CONNELLO, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 16 miles (S.W. by S.) from Limerick, and $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 8679 inhabitants, of whom 1690 are in the town. Several religious houses appear to have been founded here at a very early period, and have been greatly confounded with each other by various writers. The earliest of which any account is preserved was one founded by Donough Carbrae O'Brien, for Conventual Franciscans, a little eastward of the town, but generally attributed to Fitzgerald, Lord of Glenis; the walls, which are tolerably perfect, and a beautiful square tower, are still remaining. A preceptory of Knights Templars was founded in 1172, which, after the suppression of that order in 1304, was granted to the Knights Hospitallers; and in the immediate vicinity was a Cistercian abbey, founded by the Fitzgeralds, in 1198, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin: this afterwards became a cell to the abbey of Corcomroe; it was sometimes called Kilon, and from the similarity of the name, has often been mistaken for the abbey of Kilsane. There was also a convent for sisters of the order of St. Augustine, of which no vestiges can be traced. The town is situated on the road from Rathkeale to Charleville, and in a pleasing and sheltered valley that opens towards the west; it consists of one long irregular street and several smaller streets, and contains about 300 houses, the greater number of which are small but tolerably well built. A building called the Turret was erected by a branch of the De Laey family, and repaired by Colonel O'Dell in 1693, as appears by a stone in the chimney; it was lately the residence of Major O'Dell. The flannel trade flourishes remarkably well here, 120 looms affording constant employment to as many families, and a great impulse being given to the trade by a well-managed loan fund, under the control of the vicar and the principal gentry of the parish. Near the town are the Fort-William flour-mills, and a factory for carding and spinning wool; and three miles to the east are the Kilmore flour-mills, adjacent to which is a good bridge. The markets are on Tuesday and Friday, and chiefly for the sale of vegetables; there is no market-house, and the public scales are in the open street. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday, Whit-Monday, July 4th, and Dec. 5th, for the sale of horses, horned-cattle, and pigs, and four new fairs have been established. Petty-sessions are held every Saturday.

The parish comprises 17,732 statute acres. About 100 acres are common lands; and of the remainder, a large portion is good arable land under an improved state of agriculture, but the greater portion is pasture; there is scarcely any bog or waste. The soil is very variable, in some places remarkably fertile, and in others rocky, sterile, and cold; it is for the greater part based on a substratum of silicious grit rising from the limestone vales into hills of considerable elevation in three different parts of the parish. To the south-west of the town is the hill of Kilnamona, on which is a lake, supposed to have been formed by the excavation of a coal-mine, and called Lough-na-Gual, or "the lake of coal." Directly opposite is Knockferna, 937 feet above the level of the sea, and which commands a most extensive prospect. There are several handsome seats, and many neat villas in the parish. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Earl of Cork: the tithe rent-charge is £675, of which one-third is payable to the vicar. The church, a small but very neat edifice in the early English style, with a lofty square tower, was built in 1812, by parochial assessment. The glebe-house was built by aid of a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1822. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are two chapels, one in the town, and one near the south-eastern extremity of the parish. John Crow, Esq., bequeathed £70 Irish currency, to be annually paid out of certain lands, for the poor of the parish; and Myles Jackson, Esq., left about £20 per annum for a like purpose: a poor-shop and clothing-fund are aided by the former bequest, and a dispensary is supported by subscriptions. Adjoining the town are the remains of a very beautiful castle, of which the original name and the history are unknown: previously to the erection of the glebe-house, it was the residence of the rector. About a mile to the north are the ruins of Lisamoota Castle, and in the Grove demesne are those of Bonistoe (now commonly called Woodstock) Castle. Within the limits of the parish are slight traces of other castles, and of two small churches; on the summit of Lisduan hill are the remains of Jackson's Turret; and on Knockferna is a conical pile raised on the spot where stood the ancient temple of Stuaðhraicin.

BALLINGARRY, a parish, in the union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of LOWER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Burrisokane; containing 1963 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the high roads from Roscrea to Portumna and from Nenagh to Parsonstown, and comprises 6683 statute acres, divided into nearly equal portions of tillage and pasturage; the state of agriculture is much improved, and green crops are partially cultivated. There is a considerable extent of bog; and limestone of good quality abounds, and is used for building. Knockshagowna, or "the Hill of the Fairies," connected with which are some interesting legends, rises to a good height in the parish, and is an excellent landmark to the surrounding country. Its summit, on which is a small tower, commands a very extensive view into several counties; on the east and west sides it is well planted, and the land on its north-eastern declivity is of fine quality. A lake, surrounded by a large bog, and called Lough-na-Inch, is said to be very deep; near the centre is a small island, formed artificially by piles of wood, but for what purpose is matter of conjecture. Here is a receiving-house for letters in connexion with the post-office of Shinrone, also a station of the constabulary police. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, to which the vicarage of Uskeane was episcopally united in 1773 and 1809, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in M. Thompson, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of Ballingarry is £197. 7., of which £119. 5. are payable to the impropricator, and £78. 2. to the vicar; the entire rent-charge of the benefice, payable to the vicar, is £156. The church is an ancient edifice with a spire and minarets, for the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £157. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the union of Shinrone: the chapel is situated at the Pike, and is of recent erection. There are some remains of the castle of Ballingarry, from which it appears to have been of great strength and magnitude.

BALLINGARRY, of GARE, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of SLIEVARDAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Killenalee; containing 7062 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the great coal-field of Slievardagh, and comprises 13,714 statute acres, chiefly in pasture; there is neither bog nor waste land. The village has arisen within the last thirty years, and consists of 137 neatly built houses, inhabited principally by persons connected with the adjacent collieries. Fairs are held on Whit-Monday, July 23rd, Nov. 11th, and Dec. 19th, and are well supplied with cattle and pigs. There is a constabulary police station in the village. The principal seats are, Coal Brook, a handsome residence; Harley Park, pleasantly situated in a richly planted demesne; and Ballyphilip, the demesne of which is tastefully laid out. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in the Rev. John Hayden. The tithe rent-charge is £554, of which £369 are payable to the impropricator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, a neat plain edifice with a tower, was erected by aid of a gift of £470 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1811. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £350 and a loan of £450 from the same Board, in 1814; the glebe comprises $17\frac{1}{2}$ acres, subject to a rent of £46. 3. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the chapel, which is situated in the village, is a handsome and spacious edifice, erected in 1828 on a site of about two acres given by Colonel Pennefather. A school-house under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's foundation was erected at an expense of £300, and two acres of land were assigned to it by Colonel Pennefather.

The SLIEVARDAGH or Tipperary coal district extends throughout the entire area of the parish, and is 7 miles in length and 3 miles in breadth. The coal is found in three distinct seams, 12, 18, and 24 inches in thickness, lying above each other at intervening distances varying from 90 to 140 feet, dipping to a common centre, and appearing at the surface on all sides: the extreme depth of the lowest seam is about 700 feet. The beds lie about 1800 feet over a mass of limestone rock of great thickness, which shows itself at the surface all round on an average within two miles of the pits. The coal-field is divided among various proprietors in portions of from 1000 to 1500 acres, each proprietor being the owner of the coal upon his own land. Some of the mines have been drained and worked by the proprietors, by means of day levels or adits, for which the undulation of the surface is extremely favourable; and of late years, several of the collieries have been let on lease to the Mining Company of Ireland, who have erected steam-engines for raising the water from the deeper parts of the mines, and made various other improvements for working them to advantage. The collieries on the estate of Coalbrook were wrought upon a judicious plan and with great success by the late proprietor, for 30 years, and are still carried on in a similar manner by the present proprietor. On the estate of Killybeglavlin, also in this parish, and the property of Ambrose Goings, Esq., are mines under lease to the Mining Company, which were only lately opened; and on the estate of Boulintlea are others under lease to the same company, which are now in operation, and for working which, on a larger scale, preparations are in progress. The mines on the estate of Ballyphilip are very extensive, and the coal is of good quality; they have not long been worked to advantage, but arrangements were recently carried out for opening them to a greater extent, and working them on an improved plan. The average price of large coal at the pit is 15s. per ton, and of culm, 7s. The coal, which is of the non-flaming kind, similar to the Castlemore or "Kilkenny Stone Coal," is in great request with maltsters and millers for drying corn; and is also esteemed very profitable for culinary uses, for which it is carried to a great distance. About three-fourths of the produce of the mines is culm, which is used chiefly for burning lime. The entire yearly produce of the coal-field at present is about 50,000 tons; but the returns are likely to be much augmented by the more extensive working of the mines, and the increased demand arising from the progressive improvements in agriculture.

BALLINGLEY.—See BALLYINGLEY.

BALLINLOUGHY, or BALLINLOUGH, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of SMALL COUNTY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (E. N. E.) from Bruff; containing 1158 inhabitants.

This parish, which is situated on the road from Pallas-Greine to Bruff, comprises 2340 statute acres. The land is in general good, and is subdivided into a great number of small farms; the inhabitants are amply supplied with fuel from three bogs in the neighbourhood. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, and forms part of the union of Aney; the rectory is inappropriate in the Earl of Limerick. The tithe rent-charge is £182. 18., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballinloghy is part of the district of Hospital and Herbertstown. Here are two eminences, one called Cromwell's Hill and the other Cromwell's Moat; both have traces of works on them, but apparently of much greater antiquity than the time of Cromwell.

BALLINLONDERRY, or BALLYLANDERS, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (N. W.) from Galbally, on the road to Kilfrane; containing 4000 inhabitants, of whom 340 are in the village. The village consists of 65 houses, built of stone, and roofed with slate; it is a constabulary police station. The parish comprises 7717 statute acres; the land is generally good, and is mostly under tillage, producing abundant crops. There is a considerable tract of bog, in the centre of which rises a very copious spring supplying two streams, one flowing to the north and the other to the south, and both forming a boundary between this parish and that of Ballingarry. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, and forms part of the union of Duntrileague, and the corps of the prebend of Killenellick in the cathedral of Emly: the tithe rent-charge is £187. 10. The old church has long since fallen into decay, and is now a picturesque and venerable ruin near the village; in the churchyard is a remarkably fine ash-tree. The glebe comprises three acres of excellent land. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel, a large handsome building, is situated in the village. A dispensary is supported in the usual way.

BALLINLOUGH, a village, in the parish of KILTULLAGH, union and barony of CASTLEREA, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Castlereagh, containing 191 inhabitants. It is situated about half a mile from Lough Aelwyn, and consists of 34 houses and cabins, built in detached groups, and upon uneven ground. It has rather a picturesque appearance, and derives a considerable degree of interest from the parish church, a new edifice, situated upon an eminence immediately behind it. A fair is held on Sept. 29th: there is a market every Friday; and a sessions-house has been built by W. R. Wills, Esq., in which petty-sessions are held every alternate Wednesday. Ballinlough House is a handsome residence; and between the village and the lake is Willsborough House, a small ancient mansion, formerly the seat of the Wills family. A constabulary police force has been established here.

BALLINODE, a village, in the parish of TYDAVNET, union, barony, and county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N. W.) from Monaghan; containing 215 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Monaghan to Enniskillen, by way of Brookborough, and on a small river, over which there is a good stone bridge: it contains the parochial church and about 40 houses; the former is a neat edifice with a steeple. There is a patent for a cattle-fair on the first Saturday in every month, but no fairs are now held.

BALLINONTY, a village, in the parish of KILCOOLEY, union of THURLES, barony of SLIEVARDAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.) from Killenale. This place is situated on the north-west confines of the Slievardagh coal district, and is inhabited by persons employed in the mines. There is a good sessions-house in the hamlet, in which the road-sessions for the barony of Slievardagh, and the petty-sessions for the division, are held; the former as occasion requires, and the latter weekly. There is also a dispensary.

BALLINPHUIL, a village, in the parish of KILMAREEAN, or CUMMER, union of TUAM, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Tuam; containing 220 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Tuam to Athenry.

BALLINROBE, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, partly in the barony of ROSS, county of GALWAY, but chiefly in the barony of KILMAINE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 14 miles (S. by E.) from Castlebar, and $116\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 11,150 inhabitants, of whom 2678 are in the town. A monastery for friars of the order of St. Augustine was founded here some time prior to 1337, in which year it is mentioned in the registry of the Dominican friary of Athenry, under the name of the monastery de Roba. The town is situated on the river Robe, from which it derives its name, and on the road from Hollymount to Cong; it consists of one principal street, from which two others diverge, and contains 535 houses, of which nearly all are well built and slated, and several are of handsome appearance. There are barracks for cavalry and infantry; the former adapted to the accommodation of 8 officers and 106 non-commissioned officers and privates, with stabling for 84 horses; the latter for 6 officers and 96 non-commissioned officers and men, with an hospital for 20 patients. A considerable trade is carried on in corn; and large quantities of wheat and potatoes, the latter of excellent quality, are sold in the town. There are a large flour-mill, an extensive brewery and malting establishment, and a tanyard, all in full operation. The market is on Monday, and is well supplied with corn and provisions; fairs are held on Whit-Tuesday and the 5th of December, chiefly for sheep and cattle. In the excise arrangements, Ballinrobe is within the district of Foxford. A constabulary police station has been established here. There is a patent for a manorial court, but none is held; petty-sessions are held every Monday, and general-sessions take place in June and December. The court-house is a neat building well adapted to the purpose, and affording also accommodation for the market: the bridewell contains four cells, three day-rooms, and two airing-yards, with other requisite accommodation.

The PARISH is situated on the loughs Mask and Carra, and comprises 26,903 statute acres, of which 1958 are in Lough Mask; 7990 are arable, 3888 pasture, 324 woodland, and the remainder bog and waste. The land under cultivation has been greatly impoverished by burning and other defective modes of management, and the pastures might be much improved by draining; the system of agriculture, however, is gradually improving. The plantations are mostly on rushy land; and of the waste, about 400 acres are a limestone rock. Limestone of very good quality is quarried for building and for agricultural purposes. The surrounding scenery, particularly towards Lough Mask, is very pleasing; the mountains of Joyce's Country rising in the distance on the west side of the lake, and the east side being embellished with numerous handsome demesnes. Among the gentlemen's seats are, Curramore, pleasantly situated on Lough Mask; Cuslough House, formerly the seat of Lord Tyrawley; and Robe Villa, in the demesne of which, and on the bank of the river, are the remains of the abbey. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £360. The church is a neat plain building, erected about a century ago; a tower was added in 1816, towards which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £300; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £251 for repairs. The glebe-house, a handsome residence, was built in 1818, by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £1050 from the same Board; the glebe comprises 10 acres, valued at £30 per annum, besides some houses and gardens in the town let for £100. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the chapel, a large slated building with a lofty square tower, was erected in 1815 by subscription, towards which Lord Tyrawley gave £50 and one acre of land. There is a place of worship for Baptists; also a dispensary. The workhouse, on a site of $6\frac{1}{2}$ acres given free, was completed in 1841, at an expense of £7000, and with all necessary accommodation is constructed to contain 500 paupers. Numerous remains of ancient forts may be traced; and on the grounds of Mr. Clendinning and Mr. Rycroft are chalybeate springs.

BALLINSPIITTE, a village, in the parish of RINGRONE, union of KINSALE, barony of COURCEYS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Kinsale, on the road to Kilbrittain; containing 126 inhabitants. It was recently much improved by J. B. Gibbons, Esq., who erected a square of slated houses. There is a court-house, in which petty-sessions are held on alternate Tuesdays; and the village is a constabulary police station. Fairs are held on May 14th and Sept. 25th, and a large fair for pigs commences on St. Stephen's day, and is held every Monday for about a month. A road has been formed from the village to the ferry of Kinsale. The Roman Catholic chapel for the district of Courcays is situated here, and has been repaired by a bequest of £200 from the late T. Rochford, Esq., of Garretstown. Near it is a large school, built in 1833 by a gift of £200 from Mr. Rochford, on land given by Mr. Gibbons. A dispensary, also, has been erected, for the parishes of Ringrone, Kilbrittain, Ballinadee, and the remainder of the barony of Courcays. Around the village are scattered several handsome houses.

BALLINTEMPLE, a village, in the parish of AHAMPLISH, union of SLIGO, barony of LOWER CARRERY, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 13 miles (N.) from Sligo; containing 178 inhabitants. It is situated on the peninsula of Mullaghmore, and is a station of the coast-guard.

BALLINTEMPLE, a parish, in the union of CAVAN, barony of CLONMAHON, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 6½ miles (S. by W.) from Cavan; containing 5341 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Virginia to Killesandra, and comprises, with 54½ under water, 10,657½ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and forms part of the union and corps of the deanery of Kilmore; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Westmeath. The tithe rent-charge is £194. 5., of which £78 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church was erected in 1821, by aid of a loan of £1200 from the Board of First Fruits. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are three chapels, called respectively the Upper and Lower chapels and the Chapel of ease.—See BALLINAGH.

BALLINTEMPLE, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of LOWER KILMENAUGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (N. E.) from Tipperary, on the road to Thurles; containing 656 inhabitants. It comprises about 4208 statute acres, principally under an improved system of tillage. Dundrum, the handsome seat of Viscount Hawarden, who is proprietor in fee of the barony, is beautifully situated in a fine demesne comprising more than 2400 statute acres, of which nearly 800 are well planted; the grounds are tastefully laid out, and there is a profusion of fine old timber on the estate. A new road from Dundrum to Cappaghmore there unites with a road to Limerick, and thus opens a more direct line of communication with that city, by which a saving of about five miles is effected in the distance. At the junction of this road with that from Thurles to Tipperary, and at the base of the Kinemanagh hills, is situated the modern village of Dundrum or Newtown-Dundrum. Fairs are held here at Whitsuntide, and on the second Tuesday in October; and it is a station of the constabulary police. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, to which the rectories and vicarages of Rathlynan, Oughterleague, and Kilpatrick were united by act of council in 1795, forming the union of Ballintemple, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £180, and of the whole benefice £544. 19. 2. The church is a plain modern edifice, situated nearly in the centre of the union. There is a glebe-house, with a glebe of 20 acres. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel; also a dispensary.

BALLINTEMPLE, a village, in the parish of ST. FINBARR'S, union, barony, and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Cork; containing 455 inhabitants. It contains 192 houses, and lies on the road from Cork to Blackrock.

BALLINTEMPLE, CORK.—See CHURCHTOWN.

BALLINTEMPLE, a parish, in the union of RATDRUM, barony of ARKLOW, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Arklow; containing 1114 inhabitants. This parish comprises 4087½ statute acres, and is situated on the road from Arklow to Carlow, and on the river Derragh, which meets the Ovoca at the Wooden Bridge inn in the village, thence called the second "Meeting of the Waters," or, more properly, "Meeting of the Valleys," as the Irish name implies. The soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture improving. Some of the streams descending from the mountain Croghan-Kinshela, which towards the close of the last century was explored for gold, run through this parish; and shafts have been sunk for copper, with a prospect of success. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Dublin, and in the patronage of William Brian, Esq.; the tithe rent-charge is £77. 17. 8. The church, built by aid of a gift of £800 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1816, is in a state of dilapidation from the dry rot. The glebe-house, built in 1824, partly by a loan from the same Board, commands a beautifully picturesque view of the woods of Ballyarthur and Knockname, and from the upper grounds is an extensive and pleasing prospect over the Vale of Ovoca: the glebe comprises 19½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Arklow; the chapel is at Ballycougha. In the centre of the parish is an ancient cemetery.

BALLINTOBBER, a parish, in the union of CASTLE-REE, partly in the barony of BURRISMOOLE, but chiefly in that of CARRA, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 8 miles (N. N. W.) from Ballinrobe; containing 7199 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which signifies in the Irish language the "town of the well," probably derived that appellation from a spring which descends from a natural arch in a rock with such force as to act like a shower bath, and near which is no other stream whatever. Cathol O'Conogher, King of Connaught, in 1216, founded an abbey here for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, which he dedicated to the Holy Trinity; it was burned in 1263, but was restored, and continued to flourish till the Dissolution. In 1605 a lease of it was granted in reversion for 50 years to Sir John King, Knt. This abbey is said to have been erected on the site of an ancient castle, in which were buried the former lords of Mayo; part of its remains are now converted into a Roman Catholic chapel. The buildings appear to have been truly magnificent, and many of the ruined portions are still entire in their chief features. Though the principal tower has fallen, the lofty arch on which it was sustained is still remaining, and nearly 50 feet high; the doorway is a beautiful specimen of the pointed reeding arch, supported on each side by a range of five columns. The parish is situated on the road from Castlebar to Ballinrobe, and comprises 22,966½ statute acres. There is a wide extent of mountain: the profitable land is nearly equally divided between arable and pasture; and there is a considerable tract of wood and flooded lands. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Tuam, entirely appropriate to the vicar-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin; the tithe rent-charge is £180. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united to those of Burriscarra and Towghaty; the chapel is at Killavalla.

BALLINTOBBER, a parish, in the union and barony of CASTLEREE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (S. E. by S.) from Castle-ree; containing 2616 inhabitants. This place is supposed to derive its name, signifying "the town of the wells," from some fine springs near the village. It is uncertain at what period the castle, now in ruins, was built: tradition ascribes its erection to Cathol Creud-farg O'Conor, in the 13th century; but Ledwich attributes it to Sir John King, to whom the property was granted in 1605. The same writer asserts that the place had its origin in an abbey founded in 1916 by O'Connor, King of Connaught. In 1590, Hugh O'Connor Don or Dun, having incurred the hatred of his sept by accepting an English knighthood and remaining in allegiance to Queen Elizabeth, was besieged in the ancient castle by Hugh Roe O'Donnell, and was taken prisoner and deprived of his chieftaincy. In the war of 1641, Lord Ranelagh, Lord-President of Connaught, led a force of 900 foot and two or three troops of horse against the castle, then the principal stronghold of the O'Connor Don, near which were assembled 3000 horse and foot of the Mayo forces under Butler, and the insurgents of this county under O'Connor himself. The lord-president, to draw them into the plain ground, feigned a retreat for about three miles, and was pursued by the enemy; then turning round, he charged and routed them.

The parish is situated on the river Suck, and on the road from Roscommon to Castlerea; it comprises 6351 statute acres. Considerable tracts of bog are spread over its service; and there is a quarry of excellent limestone. The village contains about twenty-six dwellings, all cabins except three; and behind it to the west, at the extremity of a limestone ridge, are the picturesque ruins of the castle. A large fair for horses, formerly much resorted to for the sale of yarn, is held on Aug. 25th: petty-sessions are also held here, generally monthly. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming the corps of the prebend of Ballintobber in the cathedral of Elphin, and united by act of parliament of the 9th of Queen Anne to the vicarages of Baslick and Killeevan: the three parishes constitute the union of Ballintobber or Killeevan, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of Ballintobber is £150, and the gross rent-charge of the union payable to the incumbent is £468. 15. The church of the union is in Killeevan; it is a neat edifice of ancient English architecture, built in 1818 by a loan of £2500 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house, also situated in that parish, was built by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £825 from the same Board; the glebe comprises 140. 3r. 37p. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is in the village. The remains of the castle consist of a quadrangular inclosure, 270 feet in length and 237 in breadth, defended by strong polygonal towers at each angle, and by two others, one on each side of the principal gateway, facing an esplanade at the end of the limestone ridge on which they are situated; they are surrounded by a deep fosse, over which was a drawbridge from a postern. The towers much resemble those of Caernarvon Castle, and that on the south-west is very imposing.

BALLINTOHER, a village, in the parish of KILLERY, union of SLIGO, barony of TIRAGHRILL, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Dromohair; containing 234 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the road from Dromohair to Collooney, comprises 48 thatched dwellings, and contains the parish church, a small plain building, and the parochial Roman Catholic chapel, a large and commodious edifice. Fairs are held on Jan. 22nd, June 8th, July 28th, Oct. 17th, and Dec. 8th; and here is a station of the constabulary police. Near the village is the residence of Oldcastle, occupying the site of the ancient castle of Kingsfort. Iron-ore has been found in the vicinity; and in the mountains of West Lough Gill are indications of coal, manganese, iron, and copper, besides a great variety of clays.—See KILLERY.

BALLINTOY, a parish, in the union of BALLYCASTLE, barony of CAREY, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (N. W.) from Ballycastle; containing 4816 inhabitants, of whom 310 are in the village. This parish is situated on the most northern part of the coast of Antrim, which is here diversified with creeks and bays, and with cliffs and headlands of singular and romantic appearance. It lies opposite to the north-west point of the island of Rathlin, and comprises $12,753\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which about one-half is arable, one-third pasture, and the remainder bog. The surface is boldly varied: immediately above the village rises the lofty hill of Knockoghy, covered with rock and furze. There is also a hill called Croaghmore, which rises to a considerable height, and may be seen at a great distance; its sides are arable, and on the summit, which is fine pasture without any heath, are a cairn of stones and some graves. The land about the village and near White Park bay is in a high state of cultivation: sea-weed, some of which is made into kelp, and shell-sand and lime, are the chief manures. The village contains 68 houses: the road from Ballycastle to Bushmills passes through it, and commands some pleasantly diversified scenery and some highly romantic views, among which are White Park bay and the beautiful windings of the shore studded with detached masses of basaltic rock and limestone. Near it is Mount Druid, a handsome mansion deriving its name from the Druidical relic on the hill above it.

In the hills are mines of wood-coal, a material which seems to be peculiar to this part of the coast. It is found in strata generally under basalt, varying from two inches to two feet in thickness, and displays the grain, knots, roots, and branches of timber; it is generally used as domestic fuel, but its disagreeable smell renders it very ineligible for that purpose. The mines belong of right to the Antrim family, who are lords in fee; but their claim has never been asserted to prevent the tenants raising as much coal as they require. There are also extensive quarries of good stone, which is obtained for building and also for repairing the roads; and limestone abounds in the parish. Some of the inhabitants are employed in spinning yarn and in weaving, but the greater number are engaged in agriculture. There are salmon-fisheries at Portbraddon, Carrickarede, and Laryban, on the coast. The insulated rock of Carrickarede is separated from the main land by a chasm 60 feet wide and more than 80 feet deep; at this place the salmon are intercepted in their retreat to the rivers. The fishing commences early in spring, and continues till August: a rude bridge of ropes is every year thrown across the chasm, which remains during the season, and a singular kind of fishery is carried on, which is generally very productive. The other fish taken off this coast are, glassen grey gurnet, cod, lythe, ling, sea-trout, mackerel, and turbot: a species of red cod, and a small thick red fish of indifferent quality, called murranno, are also found here. About 30 boats are employed in the fishery, which are drawn up in the creeks along the shore; there are also several bays, into one of which, called Port-Campy, vessels of light tonnage occasionally sail from the Scottish coast. At Port-Ballintoy is a coast-guard station, which is one of the eight stations that form the district of Ballycastle. Fairs are held in the village for horses, Scotch ponies, cattle, pigs, and pedlery, on June 3rd, Sept. 4th, and Oct. 14th. The parish is within the jurisdiction of the manorial court of Ballycastle, held every month.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £311. 11. The church, a neat edifice with a spire, was built on the site of the ancient structure, in 1814, partly by parochial assessment, but chiefly by aid of a gift of £400 from the Board of First Fruits; it is romantically situated on a plain on the sea-shore, backed by lofty hills. The glebe-house was built by the then incumbent in 1791, at an expense of nearly £1000, of which £100 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits; it stands on a glebe of 40 acres subject to a rent of £25. 5. late currency. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is united to that of Armoyn, and contains a small chapel. There is also a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. A parochial school was founded and endowed by Mrs. Jane Stewart, under whose will the master is appointed by the vestry held at Easter, and has a salary of £15 per annum. The splendid ruins of Dunseverick Castle, one of the earliest Scottish fortresses, situated on a bold and isolated rock projecting into the sea, at the north-west extremity of the parish, and anciently the seat of the O'Cahans, form an interesting feature on the coast. Traces of the outworks are still visible; and the remains of the keep, consisting of part of the shell crowning the summit of the rock, which has been rendered more inaccessible by clearing away immense masses from the base, in order to make it the more precipitous, derive much interest from the singularity of their situation. At Port-Coan, near the Giants' Causeway, is a singular cavern, the sides and roof of which are formed of round pebbles imbedded in a matrix of basalt of great hardness. At the other extremity of the parish, on the sea-coast to the east of the village, and about a mile from the road leading to Ballycastle, are the ruins of Mac Allister's Castle, a small fortress erected by the native chieftain whose name it bears, but at what precise period is not known. It is situated on the verge of a frightful chasm, on the lower extremity of an abrupt headland connected with the shore by a narrow isthmus: this headland is perforated at its base by several caverns, one of them containing some basaltic columns. There are some remains of the ancient church of Templestragh, the burial-ground of which is still in use.

BALLINTRA, a village, in the parish of DRUMHOLM, union of BALLYSHANNON, barony of TYRREUGH, county of DONEGAL, and province of MUNSTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Ballyshannon; containing 522 inhabitants. This village, which is situated on the road from Ballyshannon to Donegal, and at an equal distance from both those towns, consists of one street containing 106 houses, and has a receiving-house for letters under Donegal and Ballyshannon. Near the village is Brown Hall, a handsome mansion in a beautifully picturesque demesne, through the groves of which winds a river that in some parts rushes down thickly-wooded precipices; and within view of the house is a small lake. This scenery, which is called the Pullins, is strongly contrasted with the dreary tracts of country that surround it, especially on the south and east. Fairs are held on the 1st of February, March 25th, May 20th, June 24th, Aug. 1st, Oct. 3rd, and Nov. 30th, for general farming stock. This is a station of the constabulary police; petty-sessions are held on alternate Mondays; and in the village are situated the parish church, a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, and a dispensary.—See DRUMHOLM.

BALLINTUBBER, or FOSTOWN.—See BALLY-ADAMS.

BALLINURE.—See BALLYNUR.

BALLINVARRY.—See BALLYVARY.

BALLINVOHIR, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CORRAGHINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 12 miles (E.) from Dingle; containing 3579 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the bay of Dingle, and on the road from Dingle to Tralee; it comprises 16,661 statute acres, a large portion of which consists of coarse mountain pasture, with some patches of bog. The mountain of Lack, from whose summit is obtained a panoramic view of the various mountains on this side of the bay, and of the Iveragh mountains on the opposite shore, is within its limits; and at the foot of Acres mountain is a small portion of the parish, entirely detached from the rest. A new road has been completed, running along the cliffs of the bay from Inch, and crossing the river Annescall or Ouncescall by a bridge; it enters the Tralee and Dingle road a little above the village of Ouncescall, and forms part of a direct communication between Dingle and Killarney. The system of agriculture is gradually improving; and from the abundance of sea manure on the shores of the bay, for the conveyance of which this new road affords facility, there is every prospect that the greater portion of the waste land will be brought into cultivation. Some of the inhabitants are employed in the fishery. At Lack is a coast-guard station. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ardfer and Aghadoc, constituting the corps of the archdeaconry of Ardfer, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £152. 6.: there is a glebe of 10 acres. A house is licensed as a place of worship by the bishop, and service is performed on every Sabbath by the curate of Ballinacourty and Ballinvohir. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish partly forms the head of a district, in which is also included the parish of Ballinacourty, and is partly in the union of Cappaclogh or Kilgobbin: there is a chapel at Lack. At Inch are the ruins of a church or chapel, overshadowed by a white-thorn tree of large size; there are no remains of the parish church, but the old burial-ground near Annescall lake is still used.

BALLISAKEERY, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Killala; containing 6034 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Moy, and on the mail-coach road from Ballina to Killala, comprises 12,692 statute acres. The lands are principally under tillage; the system of agriculture is much improved, and there is little waste land but what is very deep and irreclaimable bog, of which there are large tracts. Limestone is found in some parts. The river, which is celebrated for the abundance and quality of its salmon, is navigable on the border of the parish, and forms the pool of Ballisakeery, accessible to vessels of small burthen. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, to which the vicarage of Rathrea was united by act of council in 1807, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the deanery and archdeaconry of Killala. The tithe rent-charge of Ballisakeery is £276. 9., of which £131. 11. are paid to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire rent-charge of the benefice payable to the vicar is £205. The church is a neat plain edifice, erected by a loan of £1025 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1810; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £131 for its repair. The glebe-house, a handsome residence, was built by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £400 from the same Board, in 1820; the glebe comprises 20 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; a chapel has been erected in the village of Cooncel. There are also places of worship for Presbyterians and Wesleyan Methodists. Near the river are some remains of the ancient abbey of Rosserick or Resek, founded by one of the sept of Joyce, for friars of the Franciscan order: they consist of the ruins of the church, and a burial-ground; in the centre of the gable end is a square tower, and the monastery contains a closet of hewn stone for two confessors.

BALLITORE.—See BALLYTORE.

BALLIVOR, a village, in the parish of KILLOGHCNOGHAN, barony of LUNE, union of TRIM, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{4}{5}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Trim; containing 158 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Trim to Mullingar.

BALLON, a parish, in the union of CARLOW, barony of FORTH, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Tullow; containing 1524 inhabitants, of whom 327 are in the village. This parish is situated on the road from Newtown-Barry to Carlow, and comprises 3700 statute acres, principally grazing land; the state of agriculture is much improved; and in Ballon hill is a quarry of fine granite. Fairs are held on March 28th and Aug. 12th. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, and is part of the union of Aghade; the rectory is inappropriate in Lord Cloncurry. The tithe rent-charge is £165, of which £105 are payable to the impropriator, and £60 to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions, this parish forms part of the district of Gilbertstown, called also Ballon and Ratoe; the chapel, situated in the village of Ballon, is in good repair.

BALL'S-BRIDGE, a village, in the parish of DONNYBROOK, union of SOUTH DUBLIN, barony and county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E.) from the Post-office, Dublin; containing 484 inhabitants. This place derives its name from a bridge of three arches erected here over the Dodder, in 1791, and rebuilt in 1835. It is pleasantly situated on the high road from Dublin to Kingstown and Bray, and on the left or west bank of the river, which issues from the mountains near Rockbrook, and falls into the Liffey near Ringsend. In the immediate vicinity, and on the right of the road from Dublin, stood Baggot-rath Castle, which was seized during the night by the forces of the Marquess of Ormonde, on his progress towards the city, in 1649; but soon after daybreak on the following morning, the assailants were driven out by the garrison of Dublin, and pursued and completely defeated. In 1651 the castle was taken by storm by Oliver Cromwell. All remains of it have long since disappeared; and within the last few years several handsome houses have been erected on its site. Adjoining the village, on the south, and along the banks of the Dodder, are works for printing linen, calico, and cotton, established about the year 1740, and since greatly extended and improved by Messrs. Duffy and Co. They are at present capable of finishing 100,000 pieces annually, are worked by the water of the Dodder and by steam-engines of 40-horse power, and afford constant employment to more than 400 persons. Near the village are also the Hammersmith iron-works, established in 1834 by Mr. R. Turner: the front of this extensive establishment is 200 feet long, presenting a handsome façade towards the road; and at the back are numerous dwelling-houses for the workmen, called the Hammersmith cottages. The road on which these works are situated has been much improved; wide footpaths have been formed, and the whole is lighted with gas. Nearly adjoining the works are the botanic gardens belonging to Trinity College. The village is within the jurisdiction of the Dublin Court of Conscience for the recovery of small debts, and for all criminal matters is within that of the metropolitan police. An infants' school, a neat building with apartments for the master and mistress, was erected chiefly at the expense of Mr. and Mrs. Patten: here is also a dispensary.—See DONNYBROOK.

BALLY.—See BALLIEE.

BALLYADAMS, a parish, in the union of ATHY, partly in the barony of STRADBALLY, but chiefly in that of BALLYADAMS, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Athy; containing, with the merged parish of Ballintubber, 2051 inhabitants. This parish gives name to the barony within which it is chiefly included, and is also called Kilmakedy; it is situated on the road from Carlow to Maryborough, and comprises 6908 statute acres, of which about 30 are woodland, 260 bog, and the remainder good arable land. The state of agriculture is improving; limestone is quarried for building and burning; there are some quarries of flag-stone, and coal is also found in the parish. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, with the rectory and vicarage of Ballintubber united from time immemorial; and is in the gift of the Bowen and Maguire families alternately. The tithe rent-charge of the united parishes is £437. 2. 1. The present church is a small neat edifice; the old church is a ruin situated on an eminence, and containing a monument with the recumbent effigies of Sir Robert Bowen, of Ballyadams Castle, and his lady, and one to the memory of Major-General Sir Edward Butler. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parishes of Tullowmoey and Kileenbrook, with parts of Rathaspeck, Tecolme, Killeban, and Fossy, and contains three chapels, one of them in this parish. Near the remains of the church are the ruins of the old castle of Ballyadams, which was besieged in 1641; they consist of embattled walls with projecting towers, and a lofty keep, and present a very interesting appearance.

Near the castle are two ancient wells, sunk a few feet in the solid limestone rock, the water of which is supposed to have had medicinal properties imparted to it by St. Patrick. Cohler's Castle, bordering on the barony of Stradally, was built on the summit of a lofty hill, to give employment to the neighbouring poor in a season of scarcity.

BALLYAGHIRAN.—See AGHERTON.

BALLYANE, or BALLYANNE, a parish, in the union of New Ross, barony of BANTRY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from New Ross; containing 1292 inhabitants. This place is memorable for a battle which occurred at Ballanveigga, in 1643, between the king's troops commanded by the Marquess of Ormonde, after their retreat from New Ross, and the insurgent forces under General Preston; the latter were defeated, and compelled to effect their escape across the river Barrow. The parish is situated on the high road from New Ross to Newtown-Barry, and is bounded on the west by the Barrow, from which a small creek navigable for lighters affords a facility of conveyance for limestone for the supply of the neighbouring country. It comprises 4577½ statute acres, consisting of nearly equal portions of arable and pasture land; there is a very little wood, no waste, and only about 40 acres of bog, situated at Gobbinstown. The soil is generally light, and on the higher grounds shingly, but fertile; the system of agriculture has been greatly improved. Ballyane House is finely situated on the brow of a richly wooded eminence, from which there is an extensive prospect; and Berkeley is a good mansion embosomed in thriving plantations, and commanding a distant view of the White mountains. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and is part of the union of St. Mary's, New Ross; the tithe rent-charge is £182. 7. 8. The church is in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballyane forms part of the district of Cushinstown, or Carnagh; the chapel is a neat building, and attached to it is a residence for the clergyman. At Rathganogue is a school founded by the late Henry Houghton, Esq., who endowed it with £15 per annum charged on the demesne of Ballyane; the school-house, a handsome building, was erected on a site given by Edmund Sweetman, of Sweetmonnt, Esq.

BALLYBACON, a parish, in the union of CLOGHEEN, barony of IFFA and OFFA WEST, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Clogheen; containing 3109 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Cork to Dublin, near the river Suir; and comprises 11,120 statute acres. The river Tarr flows through it. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore; the rectory is part of the union of Kilrush and corps of the arch-deaconry of Lismore, and the vicarage is united to that of Tubrid. The tithe rent-charge is £346, of which £212 are payable to the arch-deacon, and £134 to the vicar. There is no church: the glebe which belongs to the arch-deacon comprises 17½ acres; the vicarial glebe consists of 4½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the union of Ardinnan: two chapels were lately erected. Here is a well called Poula-Tarr, 48 feet in depth, from which there is a constant and copious flow of water.

BALLYBARRACK, a parish, in the union of DUNDALK, barony of UPPER DUNDALK, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 1¼ mile (S. S. W.) from Dundalk, on the road to Ardee; containing 301 inhabitants. It comprises 1018½ statute acres; the lands are principally under tillage, and there is neither bog nor waste. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and wholly inappropriate in P. Coleman, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge is £139. 12. There is no church, nor any provision for the cure of souls. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballybarrack is in the district of Kilcurry, or Haggardstown, where the chapels are situated.

BALLYBEG, or BALLYBEGHANAGH, a parish, in the union of MALLOW, barony of ORRERY and KILMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (S.) from Buttevant, with which parish its population is returned. This place appears to have merged into the parish of Buttevant. It is situated on the river Awbeg, and on the road from Cork to Limerick, which towards Mallow winds for some distance through a rocky glen, recently embellished with plantations, and at whose northern opening are the venerable remains of the abbey of St. Thomas. This establishment was a priory for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, founded by Philip de Barry, who, in 1229, endowed it with ample revenues, in remembrance of which his equestrian statue of brass was erected in the church. The endowment was augmented, in 1235, by Sir David de Barry, who founded the friary of Buttevant. The priory and its possessions were, in the 10th of James I., granted to Sir J. Jephson, whose descendants are the present proprietors of Ballybeg. The parish comprises 2045 statute acres, as apportioned under the Tithe act. The living is an inappropriate rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne: the occasional duties devolve on the incumbent of Buttevant. In the Roman Catholic divisions, the parish is also included in the district of Buttevant. The remains of the abbey consist of the steeple, part of the chancel with the east window, and a lofty tower detached from the rest of the building, of which it originally formed a part: this tower shows the whole to have been an extensive pile. Close to the abbey are the vestiges of an ancient round tower. Many years since, a stone coffin was excavated from the ruins of the abbey, containing a skeleton ornamented with a cross and chains of gold.

BALLYBEG, an island, in the parish of KILGAVOWER, barony of MURRISK, union of WESTPORT, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It lies on the western coast, and comprises 6½ statute acres.

BALLYBENARD.—See FENNAGH.

BALLYBODEN, a village, in the parish of WHITECHURCH, barony of RATHDOWN, union of SOUTH DUBLIN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Dublin; containing 252 inhabitants. It lies on the military road leading from Rathfarham, through the mountains, to Glencree.

BALLYBOFEY.—See BALLIBOFEY.

BALLYBOG.—See KILCROHANE, county KERRY.

BALLYBOGGAN, or DE-LAUDE-DEI, a parish, in the union of EDENBERRY, barony of UPPER MOYVENRAGH, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Clonard, on the river Boyne, and on the road from Kinnegad to Edenderry; containing 1430 inhabitants. A priory for Augustine Canons was founded here in the 13th century by Jordan Comin, and dedicated to the Holy Trinity; it was consumed by fire ignited spontaneously in 1753, and burnt for a considerable time, leaving curious traces of the action of the fire. Ballybunnian House is occasionally fitted up as an hotel; and there are several lodging-houses for the accommodation of visitors during the hatching season. A very profitable salmon-fishery is carried on: the fish is of very fine quality, and great quantities are cured, and sent to London in kits weighing about 40lb. each. Vessels of 50 tons' burthen may enter the river at high water, and sail up nearly a mile from the beach: and lighters pass up the Cashen a distance of eight miles, with the tide, conveying sand and sea-weed for manure.—See KILLEHENNY.

BALLYBUR, a parish, in the union of KILKENNY, barony of SHILLELOGHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Kilkenny; containing 200 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Kilkenny to Callan, and comprises 667½ statute acres. During the prelacy of David Hackett, who presided over the see of Ossory from 1460 to 1478, this place, which at that time had its own church, was annexed to the cathedral of St. Canice, Kilkenny, at the instance of its patron, R. Vole. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and still forms part of the union of St. Canice, which is served by the vicars-choral of the cathedral, to whom the rectory is appropriate. The tithe rent-charge is £32. 11. 3. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballybur is partly in the district of St. Canice, and partly in that of Danesfort.

BALLYBURLEY, or PRIMULT, a parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, partly in the barony of LOWER PHILIPSTOWN, but chiefly in that of WARRENTOWN, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Edenderry; containing, with the parish of Coolcor, 1621 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the road from Edenderry to Philipstown, and comprises 7868 statute acres. The arable land is excellent, and in a very high state of cultivation: the Scottish system of agriculture, including a rotation of corn and green crops, with drill husbandry, was extensively and successfully introduced some years ago. Limestone abounds, and is chiefly used for building, and for making roads; a portion is burnt for lime. The parish is bounded on one side by the Yellow river, a stream deriving its name from the quantity of oxide of iron with which the water is impregnated; on the north passes the Grand Canal, in its course to Tullamore. Petty-sessions are held every alternate Wednesday at Fahy, near the village of Rhode. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, to which the rectory of Coolcor was united by act of council, forming by prescription one benefice, in the patronage of J. Wakely, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge is £213. 15. The church is a small neat building, erected in 1686 by J. Wakely, as appears from a stone over the doorway, bearing some rude sculpture of the founder's arms; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £136 for repairs. Within is a curious ancient monument representing in relief the family arms and the effigy of a warrior dressed in the full military costume of the age, with an inscription underneath, purporting that it was erected by T. Wakely, Esq., of this place, in memory of his wife Maud, daughter of Alderman W. Handcock, of Dublin, who died May 3rd, 1617, and also to the memory of himself, and Catherine Cusack, sister of Maud: it farther states that Thomas was the son of John Wakely, Esq., captain of 100 horse and 100 foot in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Castropetre, or Edenderry: the chapel, which is situated at Rhode, is a large and well-built edifice in the form of a T.

BALLYCAHANE, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, partly in the barony of SMALL COUNTY, but chiefly in that of PUBLEBRIEN, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Croom; containing 1196 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Limerick to Charleville, and comprises 2419 statute acres, of which about 1140 are under tillage, and 800 in meadow and pasture; the remainder is bog or marshy land near Garran, and on the boundary of the parish, near Tory hill. Much of the bog has been dug out, and the whole may be drained and cultivated at a trifling expense, as there is an ample fall to the Maigne river here. The entire parish is based on a substratum of limestone, and several quarries are worked extensively. There are some handsome houses and cottages. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Limerick, forming the corps of the prebend of Ballycahane in the cathedral of St. Mary, Limerick, in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £124. 12. The church is a large edifice in the early English style with a tower, built in 1827 by aid of a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises five acres of excellent land. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included within the district of Fedamore; the chapel is a plain edifice, situated at Caherduff. Not far from the church are the ruins of the castle of Ballycahane, built by the family of O'Grady in 1496, near which numerous ancient silver and copper coins have been found; and in the vicinity of Tory hill are the remains of a church once belonging to the Knights Templars, and subsequently to the abbey of Nenagh. Near these is a lake, respecting which some strange traditions are extant.

BALLYCAHILL, a parish, in the union of THURLES, partly in the barony of UPPER KILNAMANAGH, but chiefly in that of ELIOGARTY, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W.) from Thurles, on the road from Nenagh to Cashel; containing 1903 inhabitants. It comprises 5844 statute acres, principally under tillage; part of the bog of Ballynahow is within its limits; and there is abundance of limestone, which is quarried for building and burning. Castle Fogarty, once the seat of the O'Fogarty family, is a square castellated mansion, with embattled towers at the angles, and is surrounded by a fine demesne, comprising 450 statute acres, and richly embellished with wood: Prior Lodge is situated in a small but tastefully disposed demesne. The hamlet is a constabulary police station. Ballycahill is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, entirely inappropriate in Mrs. Carrol and Mr. Fogarty: the tithe rent-charge is £184. 15., payable to the improprators, who allow a stipend of £7 per annum to the curate of Holycross for the performance of the occasional duties. The Protestant inhabitants attend divine service at the churches of Holycross and Moyallife. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united with Holycross; the chapel is a spacious and neat structure with a tower. The remains of the castle of Ballynahow consist chiefly of a circular tower.

BALLYCALLAN, a parish, in the union of KILKENNY, barony of CRANAGH, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (W. by S.) from Kilkenny city, on the road to Killaenale; containing 1778 inhabitants, and 6834½ statute acres. An attempt was some years since made to discover coal, and a little culm was raised; but the undertaking was ultimately relinquished. The late J. Evans, Esq., bequeathed about 1100 acres of land here, and a very large sum of money, in trust for the benefit of the different charities and public institutions of Kilkenny. Ballycallan is a station of the constabulary police. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and forms part of the union of Callan: the tithe rent-charge is £309. 17. 4. The church serves as a chapel of ease to that at Callan: contiguous to it is a glebe of two acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parishes of Kilmanagh and Killaloe, and part of Callan, and contains three chapels, situated respectively at Ballycallan, Kilmanagh, and Killaloe.

BALLYCANNEW, a parish, in the union and barony of GOREY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Gorey, on the road to Ferns, and near the river Owen-a-varra; containing 1275 inhabitants, of whom 370 are in the village. It comprises 362½ statute acres. The village contains 67 houses, many of which were lately built, and are slated, superseding the old thatched cabins; fairs are held on April 23rd, July 25th, Sept. 21st, Oct. 2nd, and Nov. 30th, for cattle. Ballycannew is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and is part of the union of Leskinere or Clough, which forms the corps of the treasurer in the cathedral of Ferns; the tithe rent-charge is £144. The church is served by a curate appointed by the rector of Leskinere; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted money for its repair. There is a glebe of 4½ acres, on which is a small house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Camolin, a considerable village in the parish of Tomb, where the chapel is situated. A place of worship for Primitive Wesleyan Methodists was built some years since. The parochial school is aided by a donation of £7 per annum from the rector: the school-house, with apartments for the master, was built at an expense of £80, defrayed partly by subscription and partly by a grant from the lord-lieutenant's (Marquess Wellesley's) fund; the master has in addition an acre of ground rent free. A bequest of £3 per annum, late currency, by Mr. Windass, chargeable on the lands of Mangan, in the parish of Kiltrisk, is distributed among the poor. On clearing away a Danish fort, on a farm in this parish, two urns of unbaked clay were discovered, containing ashes and burnt bones.

BALLYCARANEY, or BALLYCRANA, a parish, in the barony of BARRYMORE, union of MIDLETON, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (S. E.) from Rathormac; containing 1160 inhabitants. It comprises 3939 statute acres: a very small portion is in pasture, and the remainder under tillage. Lemlara House, here, is situated in a well-cultivated and highly improved demesne. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, and forms part of the union of Lis-gould and corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of Cloyne: the tithe rent-charge is £138. 9. 3. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, Ballycaraney is included in the union or district of Lisgould.

BALLYCARNEY, a district parish, in the union of ENNISCORTHY, barony of SCARAWALSH, county of WEXFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Ferns; containing 2045 inhabitants. It comprises 8233½ statute acres. The village, which is in the old parish of Ferns, is situated on the eastern bank of the Slaney, over which is a neat stone bridge, and on the road from Ennisclorthy to Newtown-Barry: it has a receiving-house for letters to and from Ferns, and is a constabulary police station. The living is a curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, and in the patronage of the Rectors of Ferns, Templeshambo, and Newtown-Barry, successively. The church, built in 1834, by a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits, is a handsome structure in the later English style of architecture.

BALLYCARRY, a village, in the parish of TEMPLECORRAN, union of LARNE, barony of LOWER BELFAST, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 4½ miles (N. E.) from Carrickfergus; containing 236 inhabitants. This village is pleasantly situated about a mile from the shore of Lough Larne, opposite to Island Magee, and on the road from Carrickfergus to Larne: it comprises about 60 houses, and the inhabitants are partly employed in the spinning of yarn and weaving of linen-cloth, and partly in agriculture. There is a receiving-house for letters under Carrickfergus and Larne; and fairs are held on June 21st, Aug. 19th, and Oct. 31st. Here are the ruins of the ancient parish church, formerly a spacious and handsome cruciform structure: a new church was erected in 1846, at the cost of D. S. Ker, Esq., proprietor of the parish.

BALLYCASTLE, a sea-port, market, and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of RAMOAN, barony of CAREY, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 9½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Dervock, and 132 miles (N.) from Dublin; containing 1697 inhabitants. This place, in the Irish language called Ballycashlain, or "Castletown," derived that name from a castle built here in 1609 by Randolph, Earl of Antrim, who was directed by James I. to raise "faire castels" at reasonable distances on his vast estates, that the country might be the more speedily civilized and reduced to obedience. The town is advantageously situated on the northern coast, at the head of the fine bay to which it gives name, and in a beautiful valley at the foot of Knocklayd, opposite to the island of Rathlin. It consists of the Upper and Lower Town; the latter, called the Quay, is separated from the former by a road bordered with fine trees, which, sheltered by the hills intervening between them and the coast, have attained a stately and luxuriant growth. The houses, 291 in number, are in general neatly built; and in both portions of the town are several of handsome appearance. Ballycastle was formerly a place of great manufacturing and commercial importance, abounding with various works upon a large scale, among which were breweries, glass-houses, salt-works, and spacious warehouses; while in the immediate neighborhood were extensive collieries, the produce of which formed a material article in its trade. In 1730, endeavours were made in the Irish parliament to erect it into a place of import and export, but they were successfully opposed by the Irish Society and the corporation of Londonderry. It had a harbour, with a good pier and quay, constructed by Colonel Boyd in the middle of the last century, with the aid of £23,000 from parliament. But the high degree of prosperity which the town attained under the auspices of Colonel Boyd, began to decline soon after that gentleman's decease; and all that at present remains of its trade is a small export, chiefly to Liverpool, of farm produce, sheep, fowls, eggs, salmon, &c., and a small import of timber, slates, iron, and salt. The harbour is now completely choked up; the pier and quay are a heap of ruins; the custom-house has been converted into a whisky shop, the breweries are untenanted, the glass-houses have been converted into carpenter's shops, and the mansion-house is a school.

The collieries, which extended nearly a mile in length along the coast, and from which from 10,000 to 15,000 tons were annually exported, subsequently declined; the estate is now in chancery, and the works, which had been conducted with success from a very remote period, are nearly discontinued. They were situated in the adjoining parish of Culfeghtrin, though always called the Ballycastle collieries, and occupied the northern face of Cross Hill, an eminence nearly 500 feet in height, of which about 150 feet are formed by a cap of columnar basalt resting on alternating strata of sandstone and clay-slate extending 150 feet in depth, immediately under which is the bed of coal, at an elevation of 200 feet above the level of the beach. It is believed that the main bed of coal has never yet been reached, owing to the want of proper machinery. No manufactures are carried on at present, with the exception of a few webs of linen, woven in the houses of some of the farmers; a little fishing is carried on in the bay, but the inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture. The market is on Tuesday, and a great market is held on the first Tuesday in every month; the fairs are on Easter-Tuesday, the last Tuesdays in May, July, and August, Oct. 25th, and Nov. 22nd, for Raghery ponies, horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, linen-yarn, and pedlery. Here is a station of the constabulary police; also a coast-guard station, which is the head of a district comprising also the stations of Port-Rush, Port-Ballintrae, Port-Ballintoy, Rathlin Island, Tor Head, Cushendun, Cushendall, the Bar-mouth of Coleraine, and Garron Point. A manorial court is held by the senechal every month, for the recovery of debts and the determination of pleas to the amount of £20, by attachment and civil bill process; its jurisdiction extends over the entire barony of Carey, with the exception of Armoyn. A court baron is also held, in April and October; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Tuesday. There are a very good market-house, and a commodious court-house in which the courts and petty-sessions are held.

A handsome church, in the Grecian style of architecture, with a lofty octagonal spire, was erected in 1754, at the sole expense of Colonel Boyd: the stone for building it was procured from quarries in the parish, then worked on that gentleman's estate. The incumbency is a chapelry, in the diocese of Connor, endowed with £36.18. per annum; an augmentation of £18.10. from Boulter's fund; and £37 payable by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. The Roman Catholic chapel is a small building: there are also places of worship for Presbyterians and Wesleyan Methodists, the former in connexion with the General Assembly; a dispensary; a loan-fund; and several schools principally supported by the resident gentry. Colonel Boyd, in 1762, built, and endowed with the rental of the townlands of Carnside and Ballylinney, reserving only a sum for the incumbency of Ballycastle, 20 almshouses near the church, for poor men, or the widows of poor men who had worked eight years in the collieries or other works on his estate; the houses are still maintained, and are tenanted by the deserving poor of the town, under the superintendence of the Primate, the Bishop, and the Chancellor of Connor, for the time being, whom he appointed trustees for the management of the lands. The workhouse, occupying a site of 5½ acres close to the town, purchased for £577, was completed in 1843, at an expense of £3875; it is constructed to contain 300 paupers. There are still some ruins of the castle from which the town derived its name; also some ruins of Bona Margy a religious house founded in 1509 by Charles Mac Donnell, for monks of the Franciscan order, and one of the latest of those establishments which were founded in Ireland: the remains of the chapel are the most perfect. This monastery is the burial-place of the Antrim family, who have put a new roof upon a small oratory erected over the ashes of their ancestors: above the window is a Latin inscription scarcely legible, importing that it was built in 1621 by Randolph Mac Donnell, Earl of Antrim. In 1811 was found, by the side of a rivulet near the town, a flexible rod of gold composed of twisted bars 38 inches long, hooked at each end, and weighing 20 ounces and a half; it was undoubtedly a Roman torques, and was probably brought hither by some of the Danish or Scottish ravagers of Roman Britain. There is a strong chalybeate spring near the town; and on the shores are found chalcidony, opal, jasper, and dentrites.

BALLYCASTLE, a village, in the parish of DUNFEE, union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 15 miles (N.W.) from Ballina; containing 798 inhabitants. This place is situated on the north-west coast, and commands a fine view of Downpatrick Head: the beach affords excellent accommodation for sea-bathing, and by the outlay of a little capital Ballycastle might be made a delightful watering-place. Several improvements have already been made; many new houses have been built, a market-place has been erected, and a new line of road is now open through the mountains to Belmullet, which materially adds to the advantages of the place. Petty-sessions are held every Wednesday; the village is a constabulary and chief revenue-police station, and has six fairs in the year. There is also a receiving-house for letters under Killala.

BALLYCLARE, a market and post town, partly in the parish of BALLYNUR, barony of LOWER BELFAST, but chiefly in that of DOAGH GRANGE, barony of UPPER ANTRIM, union and county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 93½ miles (N.) from Dublin; containing 847 inhabitants. This place is situated close to the Six-mile-water, and at the extremity of the mail-coach road which branches off from that between Belfast and Antrim. The town is neatly built, contains 178 houses, and is noted for its monthly linen market, and for its horse fairs, which are held on May 24th, July 19th, Aug. 23rd, and Nov. 22nd. There are places of worship for Presbyterians and Wesleyan Methodists, the former in connexion with the presbytery of Antrim.

BALLYCLERAHAN, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of IFFA and OFFA EAST, county of TIPPERRARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S.W.) from Fethard, and 4 (N.) from Clonmel; containing 728 inhabitants, of whom 339 are in the village. This small parish, which forms part of the lands belonging to the see of Cashel, and some of the richest in Ireland, is situated on the road from Cashel to Clonmel, and is chiefly remarkable for its castle of great strength, said to have been built by Mocklerough More, or the "great Mockler," whose territories extended from this place to Nine-mile House, or, as it was then called, Mockler's Grange. This castle, opposite to which the Butler family erected a strong fortress on their own estate, was besieged by Cromwell, who in vain attempted to make any impression upon it, from an eminence since called Crugg Denial Noi, or the "Rock of the Nine Soldiers," on account of the loss of nine of his men who were killed by a discharge from the castle: changing his position during the night, however, he assaulted it in the morning, and obtained possession after an obstinate resistance. Mockler and his second son fell bravely defending the castle, and his eldest son, being taken prisoner, was hanged at the gate: another of his sons, with a few of the family, escaped to France, but the rest of the garrison were put to the sword. The remains consist of a lofty square tower in one of the angles of the court, which is inclosed with very strong and high walls of stone; also part of a dwelling-house within the area, and, on the outside, the ruins of a chapel near the gateway. The parish comprises 1044 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, and forms part of the union and corps of the deanery of Cashel; the tithe rent-charge is £56. 5. 6. There is no church; the inhabitants attend divine service in the adjoining parish of Newchapel. The glebe comprises 11 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a neat building.

BALLYCLOG, or BALLYNCLOG, a parish, in the union of COOKSTOWN, barony of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Stewartstown, on the road to Moneymore; containing 2697 inhabitants. This place formed part of the lands granted by James I. to Sir Andrew Stewart, and, with the exception of the lands belonging to the Primate, which are in the manor of Cookstown, is wholly included within the manor of Stewartstown. The parish is situated on Lough Neagh, and comprises 7796½ statute acres, of which 3092½ are in the lough. The land is chiefly under tillage; there are about 15 acres of woodland, and 20 of bog; the system of agriculture is in a highly improved state, and there is not a single acre of waste in the parish. Coal, limestone, freestone, basalt, and quartz prevail; and many rare plants grow here, which are not found in any other part of the country. Among the gentlemen's seats is Stewart Hall, the residence of the Earl of Castle-Stewart: the lands of Belmont are an original freehold held by the Bells and Darraghs for more than three hundred years by allodial tenure, being the only lands in the country held by that title. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Lord-Primate; the tithe rent-charge is £140. The church is a small plain ancient structure with a tower and spire; and in the churchyard are the family vaults of the Steuarts of Stewart Hall, and the Bells of Belmont, to whom some handsome monuments of freestone have been erected. The glebe-house was built in 1790, at a cost of £500, of which £100 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises 97 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Stewartstown; the chapel is situated at the northern extremity of the parish. The Presbyterians have a place of worship at Brae; and there are several schools, one of which is under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's Charity. A considerable rivulet in Drumbanaway townland disappears beneath a hill, and appears again on the shore of Lough Neagh, at a distance of three miles; and in the townland of Brae is a spring of excellent water, issuing from between the basalt, freestone, and limestone strata, and producing 290 gallons per minute.

BALLYCLOUGHY.—See MONKMOINTER.

BALLYCLOGHIL, or LAVAN, a parish, in the union of MALLOW, partly in the barony of DUNALLOW, but chiefly in that of ORRRERY and KILMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (W.N.W.) from Mallow; containing 3971 inhabitants, of whom 576 are in the village. In March, 1691, a body of native forces in the interest of James II. posted themselves at this place, and began to throw up intrenchments; but on the approach of Major Colliford from Cork, with a detachment of 400 men, they were compelled to abandon their works. The village is situated on a gentle eminence at the opening of a vale, through which flows the river Finnow, formed by a collection of various springs, in its course to the Blackwater. Adjoining are the extensive boulting-mills of Messrs. Haines driven by the Finnow, and generally giving employment to 25 persons. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday, June 21st, Aug. 5th, and Sept. 19th, chiefly for cattle and pigs. A constabulary police force was stationed here, but has been withdrawn. The new line of road from Mallow to Kanturk and Newmarket runs through the parish, which comprises 9711 statute acres: the lands are chiefly arable, and there is neither mountain nor bog. Limestone abounds, and forms the substratum of the eminence on which the village is situated; on the estate of Richard Longfield, Esq., are indications of culm, but it has not yet been worked. The principal seat is Longueville, a noble mansion consisting of a centre and two spacious wings, beautifully situated on the northern bank of the Blackwater, in the midst of some very rich and varied scenery.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, with that of Drumdowney episcopally united, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in Mr. Longfield. The tithe rent-charge of Ballyclough is £586. 2. 6., of which £286. 2. 6. are payable to the proprietor, and £300 to the vicar; the vicarial rent-charge of the whole benefice is £322. 10. The church, a neat edifice with a square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, was erected in 1830, partly by subscription, towards which the late Lord Lisle contributed £100 and Lord Arden and Colonel Longfield £50 each, partly by a loan of £730 from the Board of First Fruits, and partly by the sale of the pews. The glebe-house, a handsome and commodious residence, was built in 1834, at a cost of £1000, partly by a loan from the Board, and partly by the Rev. John Chester, the incumbent: the old glebe, comprising only half an acre, has been enlarged by the addition of 13a. 3r. 13p., plantation measure, in reduction of the rent of which, at six per cent., a fine of £200 was paid by the Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is one of the four parishes that constitute the district of Kilbrin, also called Ballyclough: the old chapel, a thatched building in the village, has been converted into a school, and a new chapel erected. A bequest of £4 per annum, late currency, from Nicholas Lysaght, Esq., is regularly paid by Lord Lisle, and distributed among the poor. Near the village is a lofty square tower in excellent preservation, which formed part of Ballyclough Castle, built by a branch of the family of Barry, called Mac Roberts or Mac Robert-Barry: it is situated in a well-planted demesne laid out with a view to building, and was completely repaired about 40 years ago, since which a range of substantial out-offices has been added. Near the high road was an obelisk, erected on four arches by the first Lord Lisle, and destroyed by lightning in the winter of 1834; the remains of this structure have been taken down, and the materials sold. Near the village is a strong chalybeate spring, partly overflowed by a brook; and at Kilpatrick is another. At Kilgubbin is a planted Danish rath, which has been from time immemorial used as a cemetery for still-born children; the numerous graves of diminutive length, with proportionably small tombstones, have a very interesting appearance. The churchyard is the burial-place of the family of Lysaght, of Mount North, ennobled in the person of John, created Baron Lisle of Mount North Sept. 18th, 1758: the Longfields of Longueville also bury here.

BALLYCLUG, a parish, in the union of BALLYMENA, barony of LOWER ANTRIM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER; containing, with part of the post-town of Ballymena, called the village of Harryville, 4307 inhabitants. This place, with a district extending many miles around it, was the property of the sept of the O'Haras, who settled here during the reign of Henry II., and whose ancient mansion occupied the summit of a considerable eminence in the townland of Crebilly. During the insurrection in 1641, Cromwell wrested from them a large portion of the manor of Crebilly, or the "Karte," which he divided among his adherents. Some of the timber about Crebilly is of very ancient growth; and there are several traces of the former splendor, and many traditions of the princely hospitality, of the chiefs of the O'Hara sept. The parish comprises 8969½ statute acres, about one-fifth of which is brush-wood and mountain, gradually being brought into cultivation; 150 acres are bog, 30 acres woodland, and the remainder arable and pasture. The soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture is greatly improved; the cultivation of wheat, for which the land is well adapted, has been introduced with success. Fairs are held at Crebilly on the 26th of June and 21st of August, for horses, black-cattle, sheep, and pigs; they were formerly the largest in the province, but are now indifferently attended. Courts leet and baron are held annually; and a manorial court for the district of Karte is held monthly by the seneschal, for the recovery of debts, with jurisdiction over the whole of this parish and parts of the parishes of Connor and Rathaven. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop; it once belonged to the chancellorship, and until lately was episcopally united to the inappropriate curacy of Kirkinriola, but this union was severed on the last avoidance. The tithe rent-charge is £97. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is united to Ballymena: the chapel, situated at Crebilly, was erected in 1810, near the ancient seat of the O'Haras. Colonel O'Hara, in 1759, bequeathed £20 per annum to the poor, which is regularly distributed according to the will of the testator. There are some remains of the ancient parish church, also of Dunnavadnan chapel; besides numerous remains of forts, intrenchments, and Druidical altars; and several mounds and tumuli scattered over the surface of the parish.

BALLYCOLLA, a village, in the parish of AGHA BOE, union of ABBEYLEIX, barony of CLARMALLAGH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N.W.) from Durrrow; containing 168 inhabitants. It is on the road from Durrrow to Bortis-in-Ossory.

BALLYCOLLON.—See COOLBANAGHER.

BALLYCOLLONBEG.—See MOUNTMELLICK.

BALLYCOMMON, a parish, in the union of TULLAMORE, barony of LOWER PHILIPSTOWN, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (W.) from Philipstown, on the road from Dublin to Tullamore; containing 1066 inhabitants. It comprises about 6641 statute acres, of which 2500 are pasture, 1700 arable land, and the remainder bog and waste. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and in the patronage of the Crown; the tithe rent-charge is £104. The church has been repaired by a grant of £335 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £160, in 1817, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 4 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Philipstown.

BALLYCONNELL, a market and post town, in the parish of TOMREGAN, union of CAVAN, barony of TULLAGHAGH, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 12½ miles (N.W. by W.) from Cavan, and 68 miles (N.W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 387 inhabitants. This place had its origin in the English settlement in the time of James I., when Captain Culme and Walter Talbot received 1500 acres, on which, at the time of Pynnar's survey in 1619, was a strong bawn 100 feet square and 12 feet high, with two flanking towers and a strong castle three stories high, the whole occupying a site well adapted for the defence of the surrounding country. The town is situated on the road from Beltrubet to Swanlinbar, and consists of two streets, together containing 75 houses. The market is on Friday, and is well supplied with corn and provisions; fairs are held on Jan. 2nd, Feb. 13th, March 17th, April 18th, May 16th, June 24th, July 29th, Aug. 28th, Sept. 29th, Oct. 25th, and Dec. 3rd, chiefly for cattle, pigs, and corn. It is a constabulary police station; the June and December sessions for the county are held here, and petty-sessions every alternate Tuesday. The court-house is a handsome stone building; and attached to it is a bridge-well containing three cells, with separate day-rooms and airing-yards for male and female prisoners. Here is the parish church, which has been repaired by a grant of £106 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and a school-house has been built at an expense of £227, defrayed partly by the incumbent, partly by the proprietor of the Ballyconnell estate, and partly by government. Ballyconnell House is beautifully situated in a fine demesne on the Woodford river, which winds through the extensive and well-wooded grounds in its course to Lake Annagh and Lough Erne; the house was erected in 1764, by G. Montgomery, Esq., on the site of the castle of Ballyconnell, which had been entirely destroyed by an accidental fire. There is a chalybeate spring in the demesne.

BALLYCONNELL, a village in the parish of DRUMCLIFF, barony of CARRUBRY, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W.) from Sligo; containing 553 inhabitants. It lies within the peninsula that forms the northern side of the bay of Sligo.

BALLYCONNICK, a parish, in the barony of BARGY, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W.) from Wexford, on the road to Bannow; containing 923 inhabitants. In a return to a royal visitation held in 1615, it was designated Ballycornick, and returned as a chapel to the prebend of Taghmon. The parish comprises 1611 statute acres, and is chiefly in tillage. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and is part of the union and corps of the prebend of Taghmon: the tithe rent-charge is £71. 5. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballyconnick is included in the district of Rathangan and Clarestown.

BALLYCONRY, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of IRAGHTICONNOR, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from Listowel; containing 417 inhabitants. This small parish, which is also called Ballyconry-derice, is situated on the road from Listowel to Ballybunnian; and comprises 1206 statute acres. Some improvement has taken place in agriculture by the introduction of sand and sea-weed as a manure, brought in large quantities from Ballybunnian bay. In ecclesiastical matters this is a distinct parish, but in civil affairs it is sometimes considered as forming part of the parish of Lisselton. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardferd and Aghadoe, with the vicarage of Kilfighney and one-fifth of the rectory of Ardferd united, together constituting the corps of the prebentorship of Ardferd, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in Anthony Stoughton, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of Ballyconry is £27, payable in moieties to the incumbent and the improprator; £2 per annum are paid to the curate of Lisselton, who discharges the clerical duties. The rent-charge of the whole benefice, payable to the incumbent, is £135. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballyconry is included in the district of Lisselton.

BALLYCOOLANE, CLOGHAN-HIDART, or CLOGHAN WEST, a parish, in the union of NORTH DUBLIN, barony of CASTLEKNOCK, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N.) from Dublin; containing 111 inhabitants. This place, which comprises 778 statute acres, originally belonged to the priory of All Saints, and passed, on the dissolution of that house, with its other possessions, to the mayor and corporation of Dublin. Here is a constabulary police station.

The living is an inappropriate curacy, in the diocese of Dublin, held with the vicarage of Finglass, and in the patronage of the Archbishop; the rectory is inappropriate in the corporation. There is no church, but the churchyard is still used as a burial-place. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Castleknock.

BALLYCOR, a parish, in the union of LARNE, barony of UPPER ANTRIM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 1 mile (N. by E.) from Ballyclare; containing 2611 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Broughshane to Larne, and is bounded on the north and east by the Six-mile-water, comprises 7330 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, and at present is partly one of the five parishes which constitute the union and corps of the prebend of Carncastle in the cathedral of Connor, and partly one of the two which form the perpetual curacy of Ballyeaston; but the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recommend that this parish on the next avoidance should become a distinct benefice.

BALLYCORUS.—See RATHMICHAEL.

BALLYCOTTON, a village, in the parish of CLOYNE, union of MIDDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S.E.) from Cloyne; containing 449 inhabitants. This is an isolated portion of the parish, situated on the shore of a bay of the same name in St. George's Channel, six miles from Poor Head; and consists of 88 small houses: it is much frequented in the summer for sea-bathing. At the entrance of the bay are two isles called the Ballycotton islands, situated five miles (W. by S.) from Capell or Cahle Island, and about one mile from the main land. This is one of the five stations of the coast-guard that are comprised within the district of Youghal. A church or chapel of ease, for the accommodation of the inhabitants of Ballycotton and Churchtown, was built not far from the village, in 1835, at an expense of £330, raised by subscription; the curate's stipend is paid partly by the dean and chapter and the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Cloyne, to whom the tithe rent-charge of the parish belongs, and partly by the precentor, as rector of Churchtown.

BALLYCROGUE, an old parish, in the union, barony, and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.E. by E.) from Carlow; containing 64 inhabitants. This small parish is situated on the river Burren, and consists of only one townland, comprising 370 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. In civil matters it is considered as forming part of Ballinacarrig, and ecclesiastically is one of the three parishes which constitute the union of Ballinacarrig or Staplestown, in the diocese of Leighlin: the tithe rent-charge is £15. 16. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is in the district of Tullowmagrath.

BALLYCROY, a district, in the parish of KILCOMMON, union of WESTPORT, barony of ERRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 16 miles (S.E.) from Belmullet: the population is returned with the parish. This place is situated on Blacksod bay, and is deeply indented by the bay of Tulloghane, which, stretching far into the land, receives the waters of the river Owenmore. It consists chiefly of a large tract of bog, inclosed by an extensive range of mountains on the south and east, but exposed to the western storms, by which the crops, principally potatoes, are frequently destroyed, and the cultivators, who depend mainly on the produce of their land, are reduced to a state of famine. Fish is abundant in the bay, but the inhabitants derive little benefit from this circumstance, being too poor to provide themselves with nets, lines, and boats to carry on the fishing with any profit. This is one of the three Roman Catholic districts into which the parish is divided: the chapel, at Cross Hill, is an old thatched house appropriated to that purpose, the scanty means of the inhabitants being insufficient for the erection of a better.—See KILCOMMON.

BALLYCULTER, a parish, in the union of DOWN-PATRICK, barony of LECALÉ, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Strangford, 2182 inhabitants. It is situated on Lough Strangford, and comprises 5177½ statute acres; about four-fifths are arable and pasture, and the remainder, excepting about 70 acres of woodland and 40 of water, is waste and bog. The soil is very fertile, and the land is in a state of excellent cultivation; a considerable quantity of corn is sent to Liverpool and Glasgow. At Tallyratty are some lead-mines, which were worked in 1827, and found very productive; the ore is considered to be of superior quality, but the mines are not now worked. Castle Ward, the splendid seat of Lord Bangor; Strangford House, the residence of the Hon. Harriet Ward; Old Court, the residence of Lord de Ros, lord of the manor of Strangford; and Strangford Lodge, that of J. Blackwood, Esq., are situated in the parish. The village is neatly built, and is one of the most pleasant in the county. A manor court is held at Strangford every three weeks by the seneschal of the lord of the manor, in whom are vested very extensive privileges; its jurisdiction extends over the parish, and the river of Strangford. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, and was formerly annexed to the demery of Down, from which it was separated in 1834, and made a distinct rectory, in the patronage of the Crown; the tithe rent-charge is £291. The church, a spacious and handsome structure, was erected in 1723, and a tower and spire were added to it in 1770 by the then Lord Bangor: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £295 for its repair. There is a chapel at Strangford, built in 1629 by Valentine Payne, Esq., and now the private property of Lord de Ros; the rector is chaplain. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1817; and has been lately much improved by the rector, at an expense of £400: there is a glebe at Strangford, comprising 6a. 2r. 37p. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Balley; there are two chapels, one at Strangford and the other at Cargagh. Here are also two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists; and in the village is a handsome school-house, with residences for a master and mistress, built in 1824, and supported by an annual donation of £50 from Lord Bangor. Near the church are four almshouses, built in 1832 at the expense of Lady Sophia Ward, who endowed them with £40 per annum, payable out of the estate of Lord Bangor for ever; the management is vested in two trustees, of whom the rector for the time being is one. There is also an endowment of £60 per annum, by the same lady, for the poor. Within the parish are three castles erected by De Courcy and his followers after the conquest of Ulster; one is situated close to the quay at Strangford, one on the creek below Castle Ward, and the third is Audley Castle on a rock opposite to Portaferry.

BALLYCUMBER, a hamlet, in the parish of LE-MANAGHAN, union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of GARRY-CASTLE, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Clara; containing 231 inhabitants. This is a neat village, comprising 42 houses, pleasantly situated on the river Brosna, over which there is a good stone bridge, and on the road from Clara to Ferbane: it has a receiving-house for letters to and from Clara. Ballycumber House is a handsome residence; and about two miles distant is Castle Armstrong. Fairs for black-cattle, sheep, and pigs are held on May 2nd and Dec. 1st.

BALLYCUSLANE.—See BALLINCUSLANE.

BALLYDAIGH, LONDONNERRY.—See BALTEAGH.

BALLYDEHOBO, a village, in the parish of SKULL, union of SKIBBEREEN, Western Division of the barony of WEST CARRERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from Skibbereen; containing, in 1841, 636 inhabitants, since increased to about 1000. The village is situated on a new line of road formed by the Board of Works from Skibbereen to Rock Island; and derives its name from its position at the confluence of two streams, whose united waters are crossed by a handsome stone bridge, below which they expand into a small but secure haven, near the termination of Roaring-Water bay. It consists of a long and irregular street containing about 160 houses, some of which are large and well built; and is rapidly increasing in size and importance, particularly since the formation of the new road, which has made it a considerable thoroughfare, aided by its proximity to the copper-mines of Cappagh and the slate-quarries of Andley's Cove and Filemuck. Fairs for horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, and pedlery are held on Jan. 1st, Feb. 2nd, March 12th, Easter-Tuesday, Whit-Tuesday, June 29th, July 15th, Aug. 15th, Sept. 8th, Oct. 10th, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 8th. There is a receiving-house for letters to and from Skibbereen; also a station of the constabulary police. A chapel of ease was built in 1829 by the Board of First Fruits, at an expense of £600; it is a small handsome edifice, in the early English style of architecture, without a tower. A large Roman Catholic chapel was erected in 1826, and there is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists; also a dispensary, a branch to that at Skull, which see.

BALLYDELOHER, or BALLYDOHERA, a parish, in the union of CORK, barony of BARRYMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Cork; containing 1183 inhabitants. This parish, which is sometimes called Kilroan, but is more generally known by the name of Brooklodge, is situated on the road from Cork to Tallow, and comprises 2101 statute acres. The hilly portions of this district, like most others in its vicinity, are shallow and stony, but are tolerably well cultivated, particularly near that branch of the Glanmire river which separates this parish from that of Caherlogh. At Butlerstown are some very extensive paper-mills; there are also a spade and shovel manufactory and a small tuck-mill. Rivers-town House, formerly the residence of Dr. Peter Browne, the celebrated Bishop of Cork and Ross in the early part of the last century, and also of Dr. Jemmett Browne, Bishop of Cloyne, is in this parish. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, and forms part of the union and corps of the prebend of Killaspig-mullane in the cathedral of St. Finbarr, Cork: the tithe rent-charge is £133. The church of the union was formerly at Ballyvinny, but the building there was suffered to fall into decay on the erection of a new church in this parish, a neat small edifice built in 1829, and in aid of which £625 were granted by the Board of First Fruits. There is also a very pretty church near Watergrass Hill; and the entire glebe of the union, consisting of ten acres, is in Ballydeloher. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Glanantane or New Glanmore.

BALLYDELOUGHY, or BALLYLOUGH, a parish, in the union of MALLOW, barony of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. by N.) from Doneraile; containing 796 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated near the river Fauchean, and on the south of the road from Doneraile to Mitchelstown, comprises 2000 statute acres: the soil is good, and limestone exists in abundance. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and forms part of the union and corps of the prebend of Glanworth in the cathedral of Cloyne; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. The tithe rent-charge is £120, of which £52. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The ruins of the church still remain in the burial-ground. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish is included in the union or district of Glanworth; the chapel is at Ballyndangan. About a quarter of a mile to the north of the ruins of the church, are those of the castle of Ballylough: Ballyndangan, the ancient seat of the family of Terry, is now occupied as a farmhouse.

BALLYDONEY, a village, in the parish of KILNAMANAGH, union of BANTRY, barony of BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 340 inhabitants. It is situated within the peninsula that bounds Berehaven and Bantry bay. Here are mills for crushing the copper-ore raised in the Allibies mines in the vicinity.

BALLYDONNELL, an ancient parish, in the barony of ARKLOW, union of RATHDRUM, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Rathdrum. This parish, which is situated on the lower road from Arklow to Wicklow, comprises 2803 statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, and forms part of the union of Castle-macadam: the ecclesiastical duties, however, were separated from that union by act of council in 1830, by which Ballydonnell was included in the newly erected district parish of Redcross.

BALLYDRASHANE.—See BALLYRASHANE.

BALLYDUFF, county of KERRY.—See BENMORE.

BALLYDUFF, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CORRAGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Dingle; containing 488 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated near the road from Dingle to Tralee, comprises 6984 statute acres. Nearly one-half is mountain and bog, partly reclaimable; that portion of the land which is under tillage is of good quality. In the village is a constabulary police station. The living is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ardferd and Aghadoc, the rectory being wholly impropriate in the Earl of Cork; the tithe rent-charge is £41. 5., payable to the impropriator, and out of which £10 per annum are allowed for the discharge of the clerical duties. There are some ruins of the church in the ancient burial-ground, near which is a small glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballyduff is included in the district of Castlegregory. On the border of the parish is a romantic glen, called Maharabo, where it is said the last wolf in this part of the country was killed; the particular spot is still called Wolf Step.

BALLYDUFF, a village, in the parish of LISMORE and MOCOLLOP, union of LISMORE, barony of COSHMORE and COSHBRIDE, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W.) from Lismore; containing 302 inhabitants. It is on the road from Fermoy to Lismore. The Roman Catholic chapel is in the village.

BALLYEASTON, a district parish, in the unions of ANTRIM and LARNE, barony of UPPER ANTRIM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, on the road from Ballyclare to Larne: the population is returned with the parishes of which it is formed. It consists of the ancient parishes of Ballycor and Rashee, comprising 13,790 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres; about one-half are arable. The village, which is $\frac{1}{2}$ Irish mile (N.) from Ballyclare, is situated at the junction of several roads, near the Six-mile-water, and contains 54 houses. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Preliminary of Carnacate: the income of the curate was till lately £103 per annum, of which £69 arose from tithe, £14 were added by the prebendary, and £20 from Primate Boulter's fund. The church was erected in 1786, and lately rebuilt at a cost of £774, chiefly defrayed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballyeaston forms part of the district of Carrickfergus and Larne. There are four places of worship for Presbyterians; two in connexion with the General Assembly, one with the Presbytery of Antrim, and one for Covenanters, which last is only open every alternate Sunday.

BALLYEGAN, a village, in the parish of CASTLETOWN-CONYERS, union of KILMALLOCK, barony of UPPER CONNELLO, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, about 5 miles (N. W.) from Charleville; containing 133 inhabitants. This small village, consisting of 23 houses or cabins, is situated on the road from Charleville to Ballingarry, and gives name to the Roman Catholic district comprising the parishes of Castletown-Conyers and Kilmeedy; the chapel is a large new building. Not far distant are the remains of a heathen temple.—See CASTLETOWN-CONYERS.

BALLYELLIN, a parish, in the union of CARLOW, partly in the barony of ST. MULLIN'S LOWER, partly in that of FORTH, but chiefly in that of IDRONE EAST, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER; adjacent to Graigue and Goresbridge, and containing 1750 inhabitants, of whom 119 are in the village. This parish consists chiefly of two portions separated by the parishes of Clonagoose and Kiltunnel, and comprehending, the one five, and the other, two, townlands: there are also two more townlands, lying to the north of the main portion, one about five miles distant, and the other, seven. On the west the parish is bounded by the river Barrow, which separates it from the county of Kilkenny, and over which there is a bridge at Goresbridge; it comprises 4957½ statute acres. Here is a quarry of black marble, used for tombstones and chimney-pieces. Ballyellin is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, and forms part of the union of Lorum: the tithe rent-charge is £309. 16. The ruins of the church are situated within a burial-ground near the road from Borris to Goresbridge. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the district of Bagnalstown or Dunleckney. On the lands of Clowater are the ruins of a castle.

BALLYFARNON, a village, in the parish of KILRONAN, union and barony of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (N.W.) from Keadne; containing 343 inhabitants. This is an improving place, and promises to increase in importance from the new mail-coach road from Carrick-on-Shannon to Sligo, which passes through the village. A customary weekly market has been established; and fairs are held on Feb. 9th, April 16th, May 19th, July 6th, Aug. 20th, Sept. 21st, Oct. 21st, and Dec. 17th. There is a receiving-house for letters, and a constabulary police force and a revenue station have been fixed here.—See KILRONAN.

BALLYFEARD, a parish, in the union of KINSALE, barony of KINNALEA, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N.E. by E.) from Kinsale; containing 1113 inhabitants. This parish comprises 3462 statute acres, principally under tillage, but agriculture, as a system, is comparatively unknown; the chief manure is sea-sand, which is brought from Menane Bridge, three British miles distant. It has been proposed to cut a canal from Belgooley to the river Menane, and application has been made to government for that purpose, but nothing has been yet decided. The village contains 24 houses indifferently built; it is a constabulary police station, and petty-sessions are held every alternate Wednesday. The living, now suspended, was a vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The total tithe rent-charge is £195: the rectorial tithes, however, though claimed by the lessees of the Earl of Shannon, have not been paid for more than half a century; and on the death of the late vicar, in 1837, the vicarage was suspended by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to whom the vicarial tithe rent-charge, £97. 10., is now payable, and who have appointed a curate, with a salary of £75. There is no church, but divine service is regularly performed in the parochial school-house, which is licensed for that purpose. The glebe comprises six acres; there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is one of the three parishes that constitute the district of Clontard; the chapel, at Ballingarry, is a plain thatched building.

BALLYFERMOT, a parish, in the barony of UPPERCROSS, union of SOUTH DUBLIN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 346 inhabitants. It is intersected on the south side by the Grand Canal, and comprises 1153 statute acres. An extensive paper-manufactory, in which from 70 to 80 persons are generally employed, is carried on at Killen: the principal kinds made are bank-note paper for the Bank of Ireland, and printing paper for the Dublin newspapers. Within the inclosure of this establishment, which resembles a small town, are dwelling-houses for the workmen and their families: the house of the proprietor is pleasantly situated in some tastefully ornamented grounds. There is also in the parish a small manufacture of gline and parchment. Ballyfermot is a rectory, in the diocese of Dublin, and is part of the union of Chapelizod: the tithe rent-charge is £97. 10. The church is in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Lucan, Palmerstown, and Clondalkin.

BALLYFINN.—See CLONENAGH.

BALLYFOIL, a parish, in the union of KINSALE, barony of KINNALEA, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (E. by N.) from Kinsale; containing 1311 inhabitants. This parish, which is called also Bealfoghl and Politiplicke, was formerly part of the possessions of Tracton Abbey, and from time immemorial was reputed free from tithes, till brought within the operation of the Tithe Composition act. It is situated on the southern coast, and comprises 2882 statute acres: the soil is fertile, and about one-half of the land is under tillage; the remainder is in dairy-farms. The system of agriculture is improved; the manure is sea-sand, brought into Rocky bay and Roberts' Cove, two small creeks in the parish, in large boats, several of which are employed in this trade. At Roberts' Cove is a valuable slate-quarry, but it is not worked to any considerable extent. The mansion of Britfieldstown, the seat of Sir Thomas Roberts, Bart., is pleasantly situated in a secluded spot above the cove. The cove affords a commodious shelter for vessels of 200 tons' burthen, which occasionally arrive laden with coal, and return with cargoes of slate: the coast-guard station here is the most westerly of the eight stations that constitute the district of Cove. A little to the west, on the summit of Roberts' Head, is a ruined signal tower, from which is an interesting and extensive prospect. Ballyfoil is an improprie cracy, in the diocese of Cork, and is part of the union of Tracton, where the Protestant inhabitants attend divine worship; the rectory is improprie in the Earl of Shannon. The tithe rent-charge is £89, the whole payable to the impropriator. The church has long been a ruin. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kinnalea or Tracton.

BALLYGAR, a village, in the parish of KILLARAN, barony of KILLIAN, union of BALLINASLOE, county of GALWAY, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (W.) from Mount Talbot; containing 363 inhabitants. It is on the road from Castle-Blakeney to Athleague.

BALLYGARTH, a parish, in the union of DROGHEDA, barony of UPPER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N.W.) from Balbriggan; containing 165 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the Nanny water, on the eastern coast, and is skirted on the west by the coach road from Dublin, by Balbriggan, to Drogheda. It comprises 798½ statute acres: the lands are principally under grass, and the parish is remarkably well planted; the hedge-rows abound with thriving trees, and the scenery generally is pleasing. Ballygarth Castle is picturesquely situated on the banks of the Nanny; the demesne, which is well wooded, comprises 486 statute acres, and contains the ruins of the parish church. Corballis House is pleasantly situated in a demesne of 372 statute acres of fertile land. At the mouth of the Nanny is a coast-guard station, which is one of the nine that constitute the district of Swords. The living, lately suppressed, was a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge is £46. 10.; the temporalities are now payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who allow a stipend to the incumbent of Julianstown for his performance of the spiritual duties of the parish. There is neither church nor glebe-house; near the ruins of the old church are two acres of glebe, and there are other detached portions, amounting in the whole to 3½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Stamullen.

BALLYGAWLEY, a market and post town, and a district parish, in the union of CLOCHER, partly in the barony of CLOCHER, and partly in that of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 13 miles (S. E.) from Omagh, and 74 miles (N. W. by N.) from Dublin. The town contains 881 inhabitants; the population of the district is included in the parishes out of which it is formed. The lands and manor of Moyenner and Balegalle were granted by James I. to Captain William Turvin, but he neglecting to comply with the conditions of the grant, they were afterwards given, in 1614, to Sir Gerard Lowther, who erected on the bank of a small river a very extensive castle, which he enclosed within a bawn of stone and lime, and made a place of great strength. This castle was destroyed in 1642, by the insurgents under Sir Phelim O'Neil; only the walls and two towers of the bawn, with part of the castle walls, are now remaining; and a modern house has been erected on the site. The town is situated on the coach-road from Dublin to Londonderry, and consists of three streets and a market-place; it contains 166 houses, some of which are large and well built. Ballygawley House, the handsome seat of Sir Hugh Stewart, Bart., is about two miles distant. A small manufacture of gloves is carried on, and from the goodness of the material and the neatness of the workmanship, they are in general demand. There is an extensive brewery, that has acquired celebrity for the quality of its ale; and a large distillery of malt whiskey has been established. The market is on Friday; it is amply supplied with provisions of all kinds, and every alternate week a large quantity of linen-cloth is exposed for sale. Fairs are held on the second Friday in every month, principally for the sale of cattle, sheep, and pigs. A constabulary police force has been stationed here; petty-sessions are held once a fortnight; and as the head of the manor of Moyenner or Ballygawley, manorial courts are held in the town for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40s. The district was constituted a PARISH in 1830, by an order of council under the provisions of an act of the 7th and 8th of George IV., when eighteen townlands were separated from the parish of Errigall-Kerogue, in the barony of Clogher, and twelve from that of Carrenteel, in the barony of Dungannon. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the alternate patronage of the Rectors of Errigall-Kerogue and Carrenteel. The curate's income is £70 per annum, contributed in moieties by the rector of Errigall-Kerogue and the archdeacon of Armagh as incumbent of Carrenteel. The church is a small but handsome edifice, in the later English style, erected at an expense of £1050, of which sum £900 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits, £100 from the late Sir Hugh Stewart, and £50 from the Lord Primate. There is a place of worship in the town for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly; also a Baptist meeting-house in the parish.

BALLYGERVIN.—See CARRIGALINE.

BALLYGIBBON, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of UPPER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E.) from Nenagh; containing 1321 inhabitants. It is situated on the turnpike-road from Nenagh to CloghJordan, and comprises 3294 statute acres, a large portion of which is bog and limestone. A brewery at Bantia is conducted on an extensive scale. Ballygibbon is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and is part of the union of Ballymackey: the tithe rent-charge is £76. 3. There are some remains of the ancient church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Toomavarra or Aghnamcagle; the chapel is in the parish of Ballymackey.

BALLYGLASS, a village or post-town, in the parish of TOWAGHTY, union of BALLINROBE, barony of CARRA, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 8½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Castlebar, and 116 miles (W. by N.) from Dublin, on the road from Hollymount to Castlebar: the population is returned with the parish. Petty-sessions are held every alternate Friday in a small court-house; and the village is a station of the constabulary police. In the vicinity are several gentlemen's seats.

BALLYGOREY, a village, in the parish of PORTNESCELLY, union of WATERFORD, barony of IVERK, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (W.) from Waterford; containing 196 inhabitants. It is seated near the river Suir.

BALLYGORMAN, a village, in the parish of CLONCHA, union and barony of ENNISHOWEN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (N. W. by N.) from Malin: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated at the extremity of the promontory of Malin Head, and is the most northern village in Ireland. A signal tower has been erected by order of the Board of Admiralty; and, not far distant, a small pier and harbour have been formed by excavating the solid rock. There are two coast-guard stations, one at the Head and another at Glengad. On a ledge of rock near the Head a basin has been scooped out, where, at every tide, is deposited a small quantity of water, which the country people consider efficacious for sores.—See CLONCHA.

BALLYGRIFFIN, a parish, in the union and barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (W. N. W.) from Cashel; containing 1406 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Suir, which is here crossed by a bridge; and comprises 2862 statute acres, whereof 960 are bog. Lisheen, the seat of Sir J. Fitzgerald, Bart., stands pleasantly in a well-planted demesne. Ballygriffin is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, and is part of the union of Relickmurry or Athassel; the tithe rent-charge is £413. 11. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Annacathry. There are some remains of a castle, near which are the ruins of an ancient church.

BALLYGUB, NEW, a village, in the parish of CLOMAREY, union of NEW ROSS, barony of IDA, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.S.E.) from Iainstige; containing 222 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Clodiagh.

BALLYGUNNER, a parish, in the barony of GAULTIER, union and county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (E.S.E.) from Waterford city; containing 807 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Waterford, which here divides into two branches leading respectively to Passage and Tramore; it comprises 2266 statute acres. Near the point where the road divides is a stone supposed to have been part of an ancient cromlech, from which the adjacent house derived its appellation Mount Druid. A constabulary police station has been established; and petty-sessions for the division are held every fortnight, at Callaghan, in the parish. Ballygunner is a vicarage, in the diocese of Waterford, and is part of the union of Ballynaskill; the rectory is appropriate to the Dean and Chapter of the cathedral. The tithe rent-charge is £118. 0. 6., of which £69. 14. 6. are payable to the dean and chapter. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Trinity Within and St. John, Waterford, and contains a chapel.

BALLYGURRUM, or BALLYGORUM, a parish, in the union of NEW ROSS, barony of IDA, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.S.W.) from New Ross; containing 796 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Barrow, and comprises 1923 statute acres; the village stands pleasantly near the confluence of the Suir and Barrow. Here is a square tower or castle, built at an early period by the Forstall or Forestall family, and which afterwards belonged to the Aylwards, whose name is perpetuated in that of Aylwardstown, the adjacent property of the Earl of Besborough. The scenery of the immediate neighbourhood is highly interesting, and is embellished with the seats of Ringville and Rochestown. Ballygurrum is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and forms part of the union of Rossbercon; the rectory is inappropriate in the Corporation of Waterford. The tithe rent-charge is £123. 15., of which £82. 10. are payable to the corporation. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Slieragh.

BALLYGURTEEN.—See KILMEEN, county CORK.

BALLYHACK, a village, in the parish of ST. JAMES, union of NEW ROSS, barony of SHELBOURNE, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W.) from Fethard; containing 266 inhabitants. This place is situated at the outlet of the rivers Barrow, Suir, and Nore, in Waterford harbour; and is chiefly supported by the shipping that anchor in the estuary, where, both at the quay and in the anchorage grounds, large vessels may ride securely in all states of the weather. The village has a regular ferry to Passage West, whence is an easy land communication with Waterford. It is a fishing station; and a small trade is carried on in corn and pigs for the Waterford market. Fairs are held on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, March 25th, June 17th, 24th, and 29th, July 26th, Aug. 24th, and Sept. 29th. Here are the ruins of a castle; and there was anciently a commandery, which belonged to the grand priory of Kilmalmainham, and was subordinate to that of Killoghlan. The church, which overhangs the village, has been lately improved, and commands a most extensive and beautiful view of the sea.—See JAMES, ST.

BALLYHACKMORE, a village, in the parish of HOLLYWOOD, union of BELFAST, barony of LOWER CASTLEREAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (E.) from Belfast; containing 126 inhabitants.

BALLYHAHILL, a village, in the parish of KILMOYLAN, union of RATHKEALE, barony of SHANID, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (W.S.W.) from Shanagolden, containing 196 inhabitants. It lies on the road to Glin.

BALLYHAISE, a market and post town, in the parish of CASTLETERRA, union of CAVAN, barony of UPPER LOUGHTREE, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W.) from the town of CAVAN, and 56 miles (N.W.) from Dublin, on the road from Cavan to Cootehill; containing 124 houses and 704 inhabitants. The linen trade was formerly carried on here to a very considerable extent, but is now extinct: near the town are some extensive flour and oatmeal mills; the market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on the 1st of March, April 11th, May 18th, June 30th, July 3rd, Aug. 30th, Oct. 3rd, Nov. 6th, and Dec. 13th, chiefly for horses, cattle, and pigs. The market-house is an arched edifice built of brick, and of singular appearance. Here are a post-office under Cavan, and a station of the constabulary police. The parochial church, a remarkably neat edifice in excellent repair, is situated just without the town; and there is also a Roman Catholic chapel. Ballyhaise House is a spacious mansion, with an elevated front curiously ornamented with arches.—See CASTLETERRA.

BALLYHALBERT, a parish or district, in the union of NEWTOWNARDS, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N.E.) from Kirkcubbin: the population is returned with St. Andrew's. The village contains 361 inhabitants, and is situated on the eastern coast, and on the road from Portaferry to Donaghadee; it has 68 houses, and is a coast-guard station, forming one of the twelve which constitute the district of Donaghadee. Off the coast is Burr Island, the most eastern point of land in Ireland. The parish is in the diocese of Down, and is one of the three vicarages consolidated by the 2nd of Queen Anne into the union of Ballywalter, or vicarage of St. Andrew's; the rectory is appropriate to the Lord Primate. The tithe rent-charge is £291. 2., of which £194. 1. 3. are payable to the appropriator. On the next avoidance of the benefice of St. Andrew's, this parish will become a separate living, in the patronage of the Lord Primate. There are some remains of the old church near the village. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballyhalbert forms part of the district of Lower Ardes or Ballygelret. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly.

BALLYHALE, a village, in the parish of DERRYNAN, union of KILKENNY, barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (S. by E.) from Knocktopher, on the road from Kilkenny to Waterford; containing 59 houses, and 307 inhabitants. Fairs are held on Jan. 5th, March 28th, May 10th, July 9th, Sept. 21st, Nov. 11th, and Dec. 8th. The parochial Roman Catholic chapel, a neat building, with an ancient tower, is situated at this place, which gives name to the Roman Catholic union or district, comprising the parishes of Derrynahinch, Knocktopher, Aughavillar, and Killeasy, and parts of those of Buncurch, Jerpoint, and Kells, and containing four other chapels, besides a friary chapel.—See DERRYNABINCH.

BALLYHANE, or BALLYHMAN, a parish, in the union of CASTLEBAR, barony of CARRA, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (S. by W.) from Castlebar; containing 4032 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Castlebar to Ballinrobe, and is principally under tillage; it comprises 7674½ statute acres, and contains Kilboyne House, the residence of Sir S. O'Malley, Bart. Fairs are held on July 4th and Aug. 30th. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and forms part of the union of Burriscarra. The church of the union, in this parish, is a neat plain building, erected in 1812 by a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits: having become much dilapidated by a violent storm, it was repaired in 1826 by a loan of £300 by the same Board; and it has since been repaired by a grant of £969 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The tithe rent-charge of Ballyhane is £123. 15. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Castlebar: the chapel is a good slated building. At Kinturk are the ruins of a fine old castle, formerly one of the residences of Grace O'Malley.

BALLYHAUNIS, a market-town, in the union of CASTLEREA, partly in the parish of BRECAN, but chiefly in that of ANNAGH, barony of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 9 miles (W. by N.) from Dublin, on the road from Castlereagh to Castlebar; containing 353 inhabitants. A monastery was founded here for friars of the order of St. Augustine, and largely endowed, by the family of Nangle, who afterwards took the name of Costello: it subsisted till the reign of James I., and at the commencement of the insurrection in 1641 was restored by some friars of the same order. The remains now consist only of the walls of a church, with two small wings connected with it by arches; on the site of the conventual buildings a modern house has been erected, which is at present occupied by Augustinian friars. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs are held on June 1st, July 2nd, September 22nd, and October 29th, chiefly for horses and cattle. The town contains a constabulary police station, and has a letter-receiver in connexion with Clare and Frenchpark.—See ANNAGH.

BALLYHEA, a parish, partly in the barony of OAREY and KILMORE, but chiefly in that of FERMoy, union of MALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Charleville; containing 1390 inhabitants. At this place was an ancient castle belonging to the Fitzgerald family, and called Castle Dod; it was taken in 1642 by Lord Inchiquin, on which occasion 200 of the Irish were slain. The parish is situated on the river Awbeg, and intersected by the coach road from Cork to Limerick. It comprises 4836 statute acres: the greater portion is under tillage, and held in large farms; the land is generally good, and there is some good grazing land, on which store cattle are fattened for the Cork market. Limestone-gravel is found in abundance, and burnt for manure. Ballyhea is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, forming the corps of a prebend in the cathedral of Cloyne, and united also to the vicarage of Rathgrogan; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. The vicarial tithe rent-charge of Ballyhea is £300. The church of the union is in Charleville, which see; that of the parish has been long in ruins, and, from its extent and its ornamental details, appears to have been a spacious and handsome edifice. The glebe comprises one acre. In the Roman Catholic divisions the greater portion of the parish is united with the parishes of Ard-skeagh, Cooline, Emerick or Imphrick Aglisdrinagh, and part of the parish of Shandrum: the chapel, a spacious building on the border of Aglisdrinagh, was erected in 1831, on a site given by Mr. Harrison.

BALLYHEIGUE, or BALLYHUGH, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (N. N. W.) from Tralee; containing 4795 inhabitants, of whom 282 are in the village. This parish is situated on a bay of the same name on the western coast, and includes within its limits the promontory of Kerry Head; it comprises 11,361 statute acres, the greater portion of which is mountain, bog, and waste. The farms are large, and held on old leases immediately from the head landlord: the lands under tillage are rendered fertile by the abundance of sea-manure which is procured upon the coast. Several of the low boggy tracts are defended only by sand hills from the irruption of the sea. From the exposed situation of the parish, it being open to the Atlantic on the north, south, and west, timber attains little growth. Good brown-stone for building is found near the shore. Ballyheigue Castle is a superb structure, in the later English style of architecture, erected after a design by Sir R. Morrison, and situated in an extensive demesne tastefully disposed and highly embellished. A patent has been obtained for holding fairs, but none have been yet established. A seneschal's court is occasionally held for the manor; and the petty-sessions for the district are also held here. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £218. The church is a small but neat edifice, erected on the site of the former structure by aid of a gift of £800 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1814. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £350 and a loan of £450 from the same Board, in 1820: the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Killury or Causeway, and contains a chapel.

The coast, for the greater part, is a long, low, and sandy strand, and very dangerous to vessels embayed near it. The bay lies between Tralee bay and Ballyheigue or Kerry Head, which latter is situated in lat. 52° 24' 40" (N.), and lon. 9° 54' (W.); it affords no shelter for vessels, and has been frequently mistaken for the Shannon, in consequence of the latitude of Loop Head being inaccurately laid down in the charts. A coast-guard station is placed here, forming one of the five which constitute the district of Listowel; and there are a receiving-house for letters to and from Tralee, and a constabulary police station. The scenery along the coast is bold, and in some places strikingly grand; the bay is frequented during the summer months for sea-bathing; and in the neighbourhood is a remarkably fine spa. Two miles to the north of Ballyheigue are the remain of the small castle of Ballingarry, built by Colonel D. Crosbie in the war of 1641, for the defence of a narrow isthmus leading to a small peninsula in which he had sheltered his English tenantry from the attacks of the native insurgents; they received supplies here from the opposite side of the Shannon, sent by the friends of Lord Inchiquin, but the place was at length taken through the treachery of a servant. About two miles to the north of Ballyheigue Castle are the remains of a small chapel dedicated to Saint M'Ida. Very fine amethysts and Kerry diamonds are found in the cliffs of Kerry Head; they are procured by persons suspended by ropes from the cliffs, and who detach them with hammers from the crevices of the rocks. Near the ruins of Ballingarry Castle is Minegahau, near which the swell that precedes stormy weather produces a sound among the rocks resembling the discharges of cannon.

BALLYHENRY, an island, in the parish of ANDQUIN, union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER; lying near Bally-white bay, and in the opening of Lough Strangford.

BALLYHEOGUE, a parish, in the union of ENNISCORTHY, partly in the barony of SRELMALIER WEST, but chiefly in that of BANTRY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (S.) from Enniscorthy; containing 997 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road leading along the west bank of the river Slaney from Wexford to Enniscorthy, comprises 4268½ statute acres, in the cultivation of which the improved system has been adopted: there are about 60 acres of underwood, and the remainder is principally arable. Bellevue, formerly the residence of the late Rt. Hon. G. Ogle, is an elegant mansion with conservatories and every appendage, beautifully situated in an extensive demesne on the banks of the Slaney; the principal front is towards the river, and consists of a centre with a noble portico of eight Ionic columns, and two boldly projecting wings. The grounds are tastefully laid out, and the whole forms an interesting feature in a landscape of great beauty. The Slaney is navigable to Pool-Darragh (which part of the river separates this parish from that of Ballinaslaney) for the largest ships that can cross the bar of Wexford harbour, and to Enniscorthy for vessels of smaller burthen. The contemplated canal for completing the navigation for vessels of large burthen between Wexford and Enniscorthy will, according to the proposed plan, commence opposite Bellevue, at the townland of Pool-Darragh, in the parish of Ballinaslaney, and continue along the east bank of the river to within half a mile of the bridge at Enniscorthy, a distance of 6½ English miles. During the season an extensive salmon-fishery is carried on in the river. Ballyheogue is an inappropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, and is part of the union of Killurin: the tithe rent-charge, £101. 15. 4., is appropriate to the curacy. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Bree; the chapel, situated at Galbally, is a handsome building with a residence for the priest, erected at an expense of £2000 by J. H. Talbot, Esq., of Talbot Hall, who also endowed it with 15 acres of land for the use of the priest. The Rt. Hon. G. Ogle, who resided at Bellevue, was a great promoter of the improved system of agriculture in this county, and author of the popular ballad of Molly Ashore and several other admired productions.

BALLYHICKEY.—See QUINN.

BALLYHOOLEY, or AGHULTIE, a parish, in the union and barony of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Fermoy, on the road to Mallow; containing 2337 inhabitants, of whom 418 are in the village. It extends on both sides of the river Blackwater, and comprises 5253 statute acres. The land on the south side of the river is chiefly mountain pasture, forming part of the Nagle mountains, and based on a substratum of brown-stone; that on the north side has a good limestone soil. The system of agriculture is improved, but is still very imperfect; lime is almost exclusively used for manure. There is an abundance of turf, which is drawn from the south of the Blackwater, at a distance of two miles from the village; limestone abounds, and great quantities are procured for building as well as for burning. Convamore, the seat of the Earl of Listowel, is a handsome modern mansion, beautifully situated in a fine demesne that stretches along the banks of the Blackwater, and commanding an interesting view of the windings of that river through rich masses of wood to the ruins of the ancient castle of Ballyhooley: this castle occupies a rocky eminence over the Blackwater, and, with the present church and the ruins of the former, both closely adjoining, presents a highly romantic group. Gurteen House is finely situated on an eminence also overlooking the river, and embraces an extensive and richly diversified view of this truly picturesque country, combining a wide range of mountain, wood, and water, with the ruins of Creg and Ballyhooley Castles; the house has been greatly enlarged and improved. The village is near the river, over which is a stone bridge, and contains 67 houses, the greater number of which are now slated: it has been greatly improved by Lord Listowel, who has built a number of good houses; and is a constabulary police station. At Millvale is an extensive corn-mill. The river, from its numerous shoals and rapids, is not navigable in this part of its course.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, united by act of council to the vicarage of Killathy, and with it forming the corps of the prebend of Aghultie in the cathedral of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge of Ballyhooley is £351, and the whole benefice produces to the incumbent a rent-charge of £463. 10. The church, a small plain building without a tower, was erected in 1774, at a cost of £600. There is no glebe-house: a glebe of 35½ acres is rented at £57. 12. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is one of the five that constitute the district of Castletown-Roche; the chapel, situated in the village, is a spacious and commodious building recently erected. Ballyhooley Castle was one of the principal fortresses of the Roches, and on its forfeiture was granted with the adjoining lands to Sir Richard Aldworth: it was taken in 1645 by Lord Castlehaven, who commanded the royal forces in this district. In the demesne of Convamore is a spring impregnated with carbonate of lime; and on the new line of road to Cork is a similar spring. There are several raths or forts in the parish.

BALLYHUSKARD, a parish, in the union of ENNISCORTHY, barony of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Enniscorthy; containing 2874 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Enniscorthy to Oulart, and comprises 7947½ statute acres. The living consists of a rectory and perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Ferns; the former constitutes part of the union of St. Mary's, Enniscorthy, and the latter is in the patronage of the Rector. The tithe rent-charge is £410. 15.; the curate's stipend is £75 per annum. The church is a neat edifice with a tower, built in 1831, by a loan of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe of 20 acres, but no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Edermine, and partly in that of Oulart: the former portion contains the chapel of Gleanhryan; and the latter, that of Ballaghkeen. Here is also a place of worship for the Society of Friends. A specimen of the gigantic horned fossil deer of Ireland (ceruus megaceros) was discovered not far from the bog of Itty, in this parish, in 1835; prior to which, portions of several others of the like species had been dug up near the same spot. This skeleton is in the possession of Dr. Macartney, of Enniscorthy, at whose expense it was dug out, and by whom it has been set up in an out-house adjoining his residence: its dimensions exceed those of the skeleton in the museum of Trinity College, Dublin.

BALLYINGLEY, a parish, in the barony of WEST SHELMAHER, union of WEXFORD, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S.W. by S.) from Taghmon; containing 221 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the east bank of the Scar river, and comprises 765½ statute acres. By a return to a royal visitation, in 1615, it appears to have then been one of the mensals of the Bishop of Ferns. It is one of the six parishes that constitute the union of Moretown, in the diocese of Ferns: the tithe rent-charge is £23. 17. 9., of which £15. 18. 6. are paid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £7. 19. 3. to the incumbent. The church is in ruins. The parish is within the Roman Catholic district of Ballymitty.

BALLYJAMESDUFF, a market and post town, and a district parish, in the union of OLDCASTLE, barony of CASTLERAHAN, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 8½ miles (S.E.) from Cavan, and 44½ miles (N.W. by W.) from Dublin: the town contains 1071 inhabitants; the population of the district is returned with the parishes of which it is formed. This place is situated on the old mail-coach road from Virginia to Cavan, and consists of five streets, containing together 167 houses. The market is on Tuesday, and is amply supplied: fairs are held on Feb. 4th, March 8th, April 16th, May 7th, June 10th, July 17th, Aug. 15th, Sept. 2nd, Oct. 26th, Nov. 29th, and Dec. 23rd. Here is a constabulary police station, and petty-sessions are held. The parish was created in 1831, by disuniting nine townlands from the parish of Castlerahan, five from that of Denn, two from Lurgan, and four from the parish of Kildrumferton. The living is a perpetual curacy in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the several Incumbents of the above parishes, who present in rotation: the stipend of the perpetual curate is £92 per annum, towards which £30 are contributed by the incumbent of Castlerahan, £20 by the incumbent of Kildrumferton, £15 each by the incumbents of Denn and Lurgan, and £12 by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church is a plain edifice, erected in 1834 at a cost of £1125, of which £900 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits, and the remainder was raised by subscription. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Castlerahan and Munterconnaught; the chapel is a spacious building. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly; also two for Wesleyan Methodists.

BALLYKEANE, or KILLEIGH, a parish, in the poor-law unions of TULLAMORE and MOUNTMELICK, partly in the barony of GEASHILL, but chiefly in that of UPPER PHILIPSTOWN, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (N.N.W.) from Portarlinton; containing 2445 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Portarlinton to Tullamore, and comprises 8069 statute acres. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare; the former is united to that of Killaderry, and the latter is a distinct benefice, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £228. 9. 3., of which £152. 6. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a handsome building, erected in 1827, by aid of a grant of £900 and a loan of £300 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £120 from the same Board; the glebe comprises 7 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united with part of that of Geashill, in which union are three chapels, one at Ballykeane, and the others at Killeigh and Ballynagar in Geashill.

BALLYKELLY, a village, in the parish of TAMLAGHT-FINLAGAN, union of NEWTOWN-LIMAVADY, barony of KENAUGHT, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Newtown-Limavady; containing 321 inhabitants. This place, with the lands around it, was granted by James I., on the plantation of Ulster, to the Fishmongers' Company of London, who in 1619 erected a large and handsome castle, the custody of which was entrusted to James Higgins, who had a garrison of 40 able men, with arms for its defence. The estate was held under lease from the company, by the Hamiltons and Beresfords, from the year 1628 till the death of George III., when it reverted to the company, who immediately commenced improvements on an extensive scale. The village is situated on the road from Londonderry to Coleraine, and contains 54 houses, the greater number of which are handsomely built. The proprietors have erected several neat cottages; a large meeting-house in the Grecian style of architecture, for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly; an excellent dispensary, with a very good house for a resident surgeon; and substantial schoolrooms, with residences for the master and mistress. Various other improvements are in progress in and around the village. Nearly adjoining are several large and handsome houses, of which Walworth was built by the Beresfords in 1705, and occupied by that family till the death of George III.; the woods around it contain some of the finest timber in the county, and are among the most extensive in the north of Ireland. Corn-stores have been built; and a market for grain is occasionally held: there is also a receiving-house for letters from Londonderry. Close to the village is the parish church of Tamlaght-Finlagan, a small edifice with a large square tower, surmounted by a lofty octagonal spire. Here are the ruins of Walworth Castle, erected by the company, as already observed, in

BALLYKENNEDY, or GRACEHILL, a Moravian village, in the parish of ABOGHILL, union of BALLYMENA, barony of LOWER TOOME, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Ballymena; containing 397 inhabitants. This place is situated on the river Maine, and distant a quarter of a mile from the village of Galgorm, and a mile from that of Aboghill. It owes its origin to the preaching and exertions of the Rev. John Cennick, a member of the United Brethren in England, and the Rev. Benjamin Latrobe, of Dublin, who, in the course of their missionary labours, came into this part of the country in 1746, and succeeded in forming several religious societies in the neighbourhood. In 1758, it being deemed expedient to secure a permanent establishment, the Rev. Mr. Horne obtained the townland of Ballykenedy on a lease renewable for ever, by which 361 statute acres are still held in the name of the Moravian Church, under Viscount O'Neill, occupied partly by the buildings of the village, and partly for agricultural purposes. The land is good, and fit for the cultivation of potatoes, oats, and clover, but not heavy enough for wheat; each family has a portion allotted to it, sufficient for the pasture of a cow and to produce potatoes and oats for home consumption. Camomile is reared by some of the inhabitants with advantage; and a small linen manufacture and several trades are carried on. The village is chiefly formed by two parallel streets, terminated on the north by the road from Ballymena to Aboghill, and leading to a square, of which their continuation composes two sides, and in which are situated the principal buildings of the Moravian establishment. These buildings include a chapel, with dwellings for the minister and the warden; a house for unmarried brethren; the sisters' house; an academy for young gentlemen, and boarding school for young ladies; and an inn. On the fourth side of the square, which is unoccupied by buildings, are gardens and fields, sloping down to the river; and on the summit of a rising ground, at a short distance in the rear of the chapel, is the burial-ground, which has an air of peculiar quiet and repose. The sisters support themselves, by various kinds of ornamental needlework.

BALLYKINDLAR, a parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of LECALE, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N. E.) from Clough; containing 793 inhabitants. This parish derives its name, signifying the "Town of the Candlestick," from the appropriation of its tithes to furnish lights for the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. It is situated on the bay of Dundrum, on the eastern coast, and on the road from Newry to Ardglass; and comprises 2038½ statute acres. A considerable portion of the surface consists of sand hills, and the land is in general very indifferent. There was formerly also an extensive tract of bog, which was drained in 1819, and is now wholly under cultivation. Ballykindlar is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, entirely appropriate to the economy funds of the cathedral of Christ Church; the tithe rent-charge is £40. 14. There has been neither church nor incumbent since the Reformation. On the shore of the inner bay of Dundrum, or Clough bay, are some ruins of the ancient church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, sometimes called Tyrella, comprising the parishes of Ballykindlar and Tyrella, and part of Loughin-island, and containing chapels at Ballykindlar and Dromaroad.

BALLYKINE, a constablock or sub-denomination of the parish of RATHDRUM, in the union of RATHDRUM, barony of SOUTH BALLINACOR, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Rathdrum; containing 3755 inhabitants. This place, which is situated in the mountain district leading from Arklow to Donard, was anciently celebrated for a monastery, founded, according to Archdall, by the brother of St. Kevin. It includes the villages of Ballinaclash, Sheanna, Cappagh, Aghrim, and the old borough of Carysfort; and comprises 11,053½ statute acres, of which more than three-fourths are arable and pasture land, and the remainder mountain. The residence of Whaley Abbey occupies the site of the monastery. By an inquisition taken in 1604, Ballykine is denominated a rectory, which, with those of Rathdrum and Moycredyne or Moycreddin, was found to have belonged to the priory or monastery of All Saints, and to have been granted for ever, on the 4th of February, 30th of Henry VIII., to the mayor, bailiffs, and commons of the city of Dublin, at an annual rent of £4. It now forms one of the denominations constituting the union or benefice of Rathdrum, in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough; and also, together with the constablock of Ballinacor, constitutes, as regards the cure of souls, the new district parish of Ballinaclash, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rector of Rathdrum, who receives the whole of the tithe rent-charge, £136. 1. 4. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, Ballykine is in the district of Rathdrum.

BALLYLANEEN, a parish, in the union of DUNGAHAN, barony of UPPERTHIRD, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S.) from Kilmacthomas; containing 5153 inhabitants. This parish is washed by the river Mahon and St. George's Channel, and comprises 6315 statute acres. Carrig Castle and Seafeld, both pleasantly situated, are residences within its limits. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, and is part of the union of Stradbally; the rectory is inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The tithe rent-charge is £284, of which £59 are payable to the impropror, and £225 to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish forms part of the union or district of Stradbally; and contains a chapel. There are some considerable remains of Ballynaclash Castle, situated on an eminence; and at Temple-Bric is a vast insulated rock, about 40 yards from the shore, on which are traces of an ancient building supposed to have been the residence of O'Bric, chief of the southern Decies. A species of hawk, remarkable for great strength and courage, formerly frequented this rock, and is still occasionally seen.

BALLYLARKIN, a parish, in the poor-law union of KILKENNY, barony of CRANAGH, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (S. W.) from Freshford; containing 961 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Freshford to Johnstown, and comprises 1394 statute acres; the lands are arable and pasture in nearly equal portions. The living, lately suppressed, was a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Canice, Kilkenny, to whom the rectory is appropriate. The tithe rent-charge is £69. 6., of which £46. 2. are payable to the appropriators, and the remainder to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe: the Protestant inhabitants attend divine service at Freshford church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Freshford. Here are the ruins of a castle, once the seat of the Shortall family, and which for a long time was of great note.

BALLYLENNAN, a parish, in the barony of WEST SHELMAHER, poor-law union of New Ross, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Taghmon; containing 710 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the high road from Wexford to Duncannon Fort, and is separated on the east from the barony of Bargy by a navigable stream called indifferently the Bannow or Scar river. It comprises 2493 statute acres; about 60 are woodland, and the remainder chiefly under tillage. The soil is generally light, with the exception of some very rich land near the river, the mud of which supplies abundance of manure; the system of agriculture is good, and still improving; and the dwellings of the peasantry, being cleanly and cheerful, afford striking indications of industry and comfort. At the mouth of the Scar, in Bannow bay, is a small quay for landing limestone and manure, which are brought from the peninsula of Hook, on the other side of the bay of Fethard, in boats of about 15 tons' burthen. Rosegarland, an elegant seat, is, though to all appearance a modern mansion, incorporated with some of the walls, and occupies part of the site, of an Anglo-Norman fortress, originally quadrangular and flanked at the opposite angles with massive square and round embattled towers. One of these towers was raised by the late proprietor to the height of sixty feet, commanding a luxuriant and extensive prospect over the numerous rich demesnes with which this part of the country is ornamented. The gardens and pleasure grounds are tastefully laid out: in the former, which comprises seven acres, are four Portugal laurels of extraordinary growth, planted in the form of a square at the distance of 1½ yard asunder, and extending their foliage over an area 65 yards in circumference; the pleasure-grounds are adorned with some fine timber, and a branch of the Scar winds through them, adding much to the beauty and fertility of the demesne. Ballylennan is an inappropriate curacy endowed with the small tithes, in the diocese of Ferns, and forms part of the union of Horetown; the rectory is inappropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. The tithe rent-charge is £130. 15., of which £85. 15. are payable to the impropriator, and £45 to the rector of Horetown. The remains of the church have been converted into a mausoleum for the family of Leigh. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is within the liberty of Tintern, and, with Clongeen, is known as the parish of Rosegarland. At the northern extremity of Bannow bay are the ruins of the ancient town of Clonmines, in the parish of that name; they are called "Clonmines Castles," and consist chiefly of the tower and walls of the church, with one of the flanking towers and a fragment of the wall which enclosed the monastery.

BALLYLIFIN, a village, in the parish of CLONMANY, union and barony of ENNISHOWEN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER; containing 193 inhabitants. It is situated on the northern coast, on the road from Carradonagh.

BALLYLINAN, a village, in the parish of KILLEBRAN, union of ATHY, barony of BALLYADAMS, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Athy, on the road to Castlecomer; containing 101 houses and 445 inhabitants. In the strata of the neighbouring lands are numerous marine exuvie; and some valuable coal-mines, called the Moonbay and Polatane collieries, are worked by steam-engines recently erected: there are several other collieries in the parish. Great quantities of fine flag-stones, also, were formerly raised on the adjoining townland of Boley; but on the discovery of similar quarries near Carlow, more conveniently situated for conveyance by canal, they were abandoned. Stones containing a large proportion of iron are found on the lands called Iron Park; but no works have been yet established. The village is a constabulary police station, and has a receiving-house under the post-office of Athy. Fairs are held on Jan. 11th, Feb. 10th, May 10th, Sept. 2nd, and Nov. 30th; and petty-sessions on alternate Thursdays. To the north of the village is Rahinderry, a handsome mansion surrounded by thriving plantations; and at a short distance are the luxuriant woods of Gracefield Lodge, the seat of the ancient family of Grace, whose old mansion has been taken down; the grounds have been tastefully embellished, and the approach from the Kilkenny side presents some beautiful and interesting mountain scenery. There are several other gentlemen's seats in the vicinity. In the village are the ruins of an old church, near which some ancient coins have been dug up; here is also a neat Roman Catholic chapel belonging to the union or district of Killebrann.

BALLYLINCH, a parish, in the poor-law union of KILKENNY, barony of GOWRAN, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (N.) from Thomastown; containing 319 inhabitants. It forms part of the estate of Mount Juliet, and comprises 1167½ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and is included in the union of Burnchurch; the rectory is a sub-denomination constituting part of the Mount Juliet demesne. The tithe rent-charge is £72, payable to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballylinch is comprehended in the district of Thomastown.

BALLYLINNEY, a parish, in the poor-law union of ANTRIM, barony of LOWER BELFAST, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, on the road from Belfast to Drough; containing 2204 inhabitants. It adjoins the town of Ballyclare, and comprises 5684 statute acres, including 320½ in Ballywalter grange: the land is generally in a good state of cultivation. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, united from time immemorial to the vicarage of Carnmoney and the rectory of Ballymartin; the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Donegal. The tithe rent-charge of Ballylinney is £225, of which £150 are payable to the impropriator, and £75 to the vicar. The church was destroyed by the insurgents under the Earl of Tyrone, and has not been rebuilt; the churchyard is still used as a burial-ground by the parishioners. The Presbyterians have a place of worship. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Larne and Carrickfergus.

BALLYLONGFORD, a town, in the parish of AGHALVALIN, union of LISTOWEL, barony of IRAGHTICONNOR, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Tarbert; containing 1143 inhabitants. This town is situated on the road from Tarbert to Ballybunnua, at the head of an estuary or creek of the river Shannon, and contains 219 houses. Its position is favourable for the export trade, the creek forming a port for lighters which carry corn and turf to Limerick; the trade in turf is very considerable from the vast supply afforded by the extensive tracts of bog in the vicinity, constituting part of the possessions of Trinity College, Dublin. The harbour has 16 feet of water at high tides, and is capable of being made one of the best on the Shannon; but that of Tarbert, being considered to have superior advantages, is more likely to be improved. A fair or market is held every alternate Thursday, chiefly for pigs and cattle, and the place has a receiving-house for letters to and from Listowel and Tarbert. Petty-sessions are held every Monday, and, once in three weeks, a baronial court for the manor of Carrig-a-foile; here, also, is a station of the constabulary police. There are several gentlemen's seats in the vicinity. The parochial church is situated about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile to the north of the town, but having been condemned by the provincial architect as unworthy of repair, it is expected that a new church will be shortly built by the Ecclesiastical Board, at an estimated expense of about £650. The Roman Catholic Chapel in the town is a spacious slated building with two galleries, erected in 1806 at an expense of £2000; and near it a large building for a school has been erected, at a cost of £350. Here is also a dispensary. In the vicinity of the town, but in Kilnaughten parish, are the extensive and picturesque ruins of Lislaghtin abbey.

BALLYLOUGH.—See BALLYDELOUGHY.

BALLYLOUGHHAUN, a village, in the parish of St. NICHOLAS, poor-law union, barony, and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Galway town; containing 180 inhabitants. It is seated on the bay of Galway.

BALLYLOUGHLOE, a parish, in the union of ATHLONE, barony of CLONLONAN, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Athlone, on the road to Mullingar; containing 4793 inhabitants. In 1795, a skirmish took place at the Five-mile House, here, between the peasantry and the yeomanry, in consequence of an attempt to enforce the ballot for the militia. The parish comprises 13,578 statute acres: the lands are generally under an improved system of agriculture; there are about 70 acres of bog, but no waste land. Limestone abounds; and lead-ore has been found, but no vein has hitherto been discovered. Moydrum Castle, the seat of Viscount Castlemaine, is a castellated mansion, erected in 1814, and beautifully situated in an extensive demesne, on one side of which is a small lake: Glyndown House is a handsome modern residence near the road from Dublin to Athlone; and on the eastern confines, near Moate, is Shurock, the property of the Homan family. A manorial court is held alternately at Moate and Baylin on the first Monday in every month. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, with the rectory and vicarage of Drumraney united by act of council in 1804, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £270, and the gross rent-charge of the benefice £488. The church, a neat edifice of stone and in good repair, was erected in 1812, by aid of a loan of £400 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe-house was built by a gift of £100 and a loan of £675 from the same Board, in 1809. The glebe comprises 32 acres of profitable land. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish, also called Caulry, is in the diocese of Ardagh, and co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a large building at Mount-Temple. A school at Baylin is supported by Lord Castlemaine, and another at the same place, for girls, by Lady Castlemaine; a school at Ballinagarbery is supported by a bequest from the late Dr. Maxwell. There are several remains of ancient castles and Danish raths; near the church is a remarkable moat, similar to that at Castle-Kindelane; and there are also two mineral springs in the parish. At Farreremanagh, near this place, was a friary, which was in ruins at the time of issuing an inquisition in the 3rd of James I.: no vestiges of it can now be traced.

BALLYLOUGHANANE, a village, chiefly in the parish of LOCKREEN, poor-law union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of LOWER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (S. W. by S.) from Parsonstown; containing 70 houses and 344 inhabitants. It is situated on the verge of the county, which is here separated from the King's county by the river Brosna. This river runs through the village.

BALLYMACALENNY.—See KILLESANDRA.

BALLYMACARRETT, a town and parish, forming part of the suburbs of BELFAST, in the union of BELFAST, barony of UPPER CASTLEREAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER; containing 6697 inhabitants. This place, previously to 1825, was simply a townland in the parish of Knockbreda, or Bredagh; and, in the History of the county, published in 1744, is described as containing only two buildings, Mount-Pottinger and a mill. It is now become a populous and flourishing town, occupying a site formerly covered by every tide, but which has been reclaimed by an extensive embankment stretching from Conswater westward to the river Lagan, opposite to the quays of Belfast, and thence on the shore of that river to Ormeau, the splendid residence of the Marquess of Donegal. The town contains 1124 houses, and forms an appendage to Belfast, from which it is separated only by the river Lagan, which here divides the counties of Down and Antrim: the old stone bridge of 21 arches over the stream was pulled down in 1842, and a new bridge, called Queen's bridge, erected on its site. The place is irregularly built, but has been greatly improved by the formation of several new streets; and a handsome bridge of five arches, about 400 yards above the Queen's bridge, and opening a direct communication with the southern part of Belfast, had been erected, before the Queen's bridge, under an act obtained in 1831, at an expense of £6000, raised in transferable shares of £25 each. The first manufacture established here was that of glass; and since the first glass-house was built, in 1776, two other extensive establishments have been erected, one of which is now rented by a company for the manufacture of crown-glass. A pottery upon a very large scale was soon afterwards established; and previously to the removal of the duty on salt, there were two works for the manufacture of that article from rock salt brought from England, for exportation. The Lagau foundry, for the manufacture of steam-engines and other machinery on the most improved principles, has been lately much enlarged, and produces engines of large dimensions equal to those of English and Scotch manufacture; in 1832 the first patent-machine for making paper ever introduced into Ireland was made at these works. An extensive rope-yard and a sail-cloth manufactory, affording employment to 130 persons, are carried on. Three large vitriol-works, one of which, established in 1799, was the second erected in the kingdom, are in full operation for supplying the bleachers, dyers, and calico-printers in the neighbourhood; and a chemical factory is engaged in making sulphate of ammonia and naphtha from coal-tar; besides these, are felt and asphalt works. There are likewise some starch-manufactories; some meal and flour mills driven by steam and water; and four large mills for spinning linen-yarn, of which three are in operation, employing several hundred persons. The manufacture of calico and muslin is carried on upon a very extensive scale. Here are a receiving-house for letters, and a constabulary police station.

This place was erected into a parish under an act of the 12th of George III., and comprises 575 statute acres; about 28½ are under water, and the remainder is laid out as arable and pasture. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Rector of Knockbreda: it is endowed with the tithes rent-charge of Ballynafagh, an adjoining townland, amounting to £37. 10., which is augmented from Primate Boulter's fund. The church, a neat building, was erected in 1824, at an expense of £1600, whereof one moiety was from the late Board of First Fruits, and the other was raised by subscription; service is also performed in a new school-house, erected by subscription. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Belfast, in the diocese of Connor; the chapel was built in 1829. There are also places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and for Covenanters and Wesleyan Methodists.—See BELFAST.

BALLYMACART, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of DECIES-WITHIN-DRUM, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Dungarvan; containing 1196 inhabitants. This parish, also called Aglishenan, is situated on the shore of St. George's Channel, and comprises 2538 statute acres. On the south-east is the cape or promontory of Mine Head, forming the northern point of the entrance to Ardmore bay. Ballymacart is a vicarage; in the diocese of Lismore, united to that of Ardmore; the rectory is inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The tithes rent-charge is £93, of which £62 are payable to the improPRIATOR, and £31 to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish forms part of the union or district of Ardmore; the chapel is a large building. At Mount Barron is a school under the patronage of Sir H. W. Barron, who gave the school-house and four acres of land.

BALLYMACARTHY, or BALLYNASCARTHY, a village, in the parish of KILMALODA, union of BANDON, Eastern Division of the barony of EAST CARRERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E.) from Clonakilty; containing 190 inhabitants. During the disturbances of 1798 this place was the scene of an obstinate engagement between a party of the insurgent forces and some companies of the Westmeath militia, which would have terminated in the defeat of the latter, owing to the defection of some of the regiment, but for the arrival of the Caithness legion from Bandon, which came very opportunely to their aid. The village is situated on the road from Bandon to Clonakilty, and consists of 37 houses, some of which are large and well built: the new road connecting these two towns here crosses the old line. Close adjoining are some extensive flour-mills, in which more than 8000 barrels of wheat are annually ground for the supply of the neighbouring towns. The projected line of railway between Bandon and Clonakilty will pass through this place, and it is intended to have a station here.—See KILMALODA.

BALLYMACCELLIGOTT, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (S. E.) from Tralee; containing 4058 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the high roads leading from Tralee to Castle-Island and Killarney, comprises 14,018 statute acres: about 2300 acres are bog and coarse mountain pasture, which, from the abundance of limestone and turf, might be easily reclaimed. The great limestone quarry of Ballymacelligott is situated on the estate of A. Blennerhassett, Esq., of Ballyseedy, and about halfway on the old road from Tralee to Castle-Island. A quarry was opened here in 1811, for building the barracks at Tralee, but was afterwards discontinued; and near that spot is the present quarry, first opened to procure materials for enlarging Ballyseedy House, since which time it has been constantly worked and the stone been used for the county gaol and the new court-house at Tralee, and latterly for the ship canal from Tralee to Blennerville. It affords constant employment to about 30 men. Stones of the largest size required for public works are detached with great facility by wedges, on account of the regularity of the strata; and the produce of the quarry, being of very superior quality, is in general request for the ornamental parts of buildings: the average quantity raised weekly is about 50 tons. Several curious caverns are formed in the strata by a stream forcing its subterraneous course for nearly two miles, and, when explored by torch light, exhibit many beautiful and highly grotesque appearances; the entrance to the principal cavern is within the border of the adjoining parish of O'Brennan. The most remarkable of these caverns is one which in appearance resembles the interior of a cathedral, with a pulpit and some kneeling figures formed by the stalactites; the discharge of a pistol produces a report like thunder. In the northern part of the parish is a romantic glen, called Gloun-na-geen-tha, memorable as the scene of the discovery and death of the great Earl of Desmond by Kelly, an Irish soldier, in 1583; his head was sent to London, and ordered by Queen Elizabeth to be fixed on London bridge, and his body, after being concealed for some weeks, was interred at Ardnagrath, in a small chapel which still bears his name. This glen has been planted by Mr. Blennerhassett; and other improvements have been made by Captain Chute and W. Sealy, Esq., and orchard-planting by J. O'Connell, Esq., for his tenantry at Maglass. Mr. O'Connell has likewise built some capital farmhouses and offices.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ardert and Aghadoc, to which the rectory of Nohoval-Kerry and a portion of the rectory of Currane have been episcopally united from a period prior to any existing record, forming the union of Ballymacelligott, in the patronage of the Crosbie family; the tithe rent-charge of this parish is £352. 14., and of the whole benefice £347. 13. 6. The church is a spacious and substantial building, with an embattled tower crowned by pinnacles; it was erected in 1824, on the site of the old parish church, by aid of a loan of £700 from the Board of First Fruits. There is no glebe-house: the two glebes in the union comprise about 14 statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Nohoval-Kerry, Ballyseedy, and O'Brennan, and small parts of the parishes of Annagh and Rataas: the chapel here is a large slated building; and there is also one at Clohers, adjoining the parish of O'Brennan. Near Arabella are two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, one of them of the Primitive class. At Ballingriloagh are the remains of an old castle that belonged to the Mac Elligotts; and there are several forts in the parish, in some of which excavations have been discovered, regularly walled and floored.

BALLYMACHUGH, a parish, in the unions of CAVAN and GRANARD, barony of CLONMAGON, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 6½ miles (E. N. E.) from Granard; containing 3518 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the borders of Lough Sheelan, on the confines of the counties of Longford, Westmeath, and Meath, and comprises 7728½ statute acres, of which 1827½ are under water. The system of agriculture is improving; oats and potatoes are the principal crops. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and in the patronage of Richard Greville, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge is £199, of which £88. 10. are payable to the proprietor, and £110. 10. to the vicar. The church, a plain building, was erected in 1800, by a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, and has been recently enlarged at an expense of £800. The glebe comprises 11 acres, valued at £1. 16. per acre. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a large building. A dispensary is supported in the customary manner. On an island in the lake are the ruins of Crover castle, and on another, those of an old church covered with ivy.

BALLYMACKEAN, a village, in the parish of RINGRONE, union of KINSALE, barony of COURCY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 202 inhabitants.

BALLYMACKAY, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of UPPER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E.) from Nenagh; containing 3178 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 9713 statute acres, is situated on the coach road from Dublin to Limerick, and is intersected by the river Oulitri. There are about 2000 acres of bog, and of the remainder the greater portion is under tillage; the system of agriculture is much improved, and there is abundance of limestone in the parish. Castle Willington, the seat of the Willington family, which takes its name from a lofty and very perfect square tower near the mansion, is situated in a well-planted demesne watered by the Oulitri. Woodville and Besborough are also pleasantly situated, in grounds tastefully laid out and kept in fine order: Mount Pleasant is a handsome mansion. The parish contains a constabulary police station. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe; the vicarage is episcopally united to the entire rectory of Templedowney or Toomavarra, constituting the union of Ballymaekay, and the corps of the chancellorship of Killaloe, with which are held episcopally the rectory of this parish and the rectory and vicarage of Ballygibbon, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of Ballymackey is £318, and of the whole union £457. The church is a neat edifice, erected in 1822, by aid of a loan of £1500 from the late Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house, one mile and a half distant from the church, was built by aid of a gift of £300 and a loan of £500 from the same Board, in 1814: the glebe comprises 15 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Toomavarra or Aghnamacree, and contains a chapel.

BALLYMACNAB.—See LISNAIDIL.

BALLYMACODA, a village, in the parish of KILMACDONOUGH, poor-law union of MIDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 305 inhabitants. It is seated on an inlet of the bay of Youghal.

BALLYMACORMICK, a parish, in the union of LONGFORD, partly in the barony of ARDAGH, but chiefly in that of MOYDOVO, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (S.) from Longford; containing 3926 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Longford to Ballymahon, and comprises 8915 statute acres, of which more than 3000 are bog and waste: the cultivable lands are chiefly in tillage. On the lands of Mullaghavorneen coal is said to exist, but the vein has never been explored; and limestone and sandstone are found in all directions, lying very near the surface. The Royal Canal runs through the parish, affording a facility of communication with Dublin. Ballymacormick is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and is part of the union of Templemichael: the tithe rent-charge is £150. The church, a neat building with a square tower, nearly in the centre of the parish, was erected in 1836, by a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe comprises 34 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Templemichael, the chapel of which is situated at Shrand. There are some remains of the old church; and on the lands of Ballinamore are the ruins of another church and of an ancient fortress.

BALLYMACWARD, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, partly in the barony of TYAQUIN, and partly in that of KILCONNELL, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S.) from Castle-Blakeney, on the road to Kilconnell; containing 5027 inhabitants. It comprises 17,258½ statute acres; there is a considerable tract of waste land and bog. Here is a station of the constabulary police. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, united, with that of the rectory, to the rectory and vicarage of Clonkeen; the other portion of the rectory is partly appropriate to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and partly to the deanery. The patronage is exercised by the Lord-Primate and the Archbishop of Dublin, who must present a fellow or ex-fellow of Trinity College. The tithe rent-charge of Ballymacward is £204. 15. 6., of which £41. 10. 9. are payable to the Commissioners, £12. 9. 3.

to the dean of Clonsfert, and £150. 15. 6. to the incumbent; the whole henceforth produces to the incumbent a rent-charge of £200. 15. 5. The church is a neat building, repaired in 1820, when, also, a tower was added. The Roman Catholic union or district is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there is a chapel in each parish.

BALLYMACWILLIAM, a parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, barony of WARRENTOWN, King's county, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Edenderry, on the road to Mullingar; containing 1193 inhabitants. It comprises 4976 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, about two-thirds of which are pasture, and one-third under tillage. The land is of very superior quality, and the state of agriculture is excellent: of the considerable tracts of bog, much has been exhausted and brought under cultivation. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £174. 12. 6. The church is in ruins, and there is neither glebe nor glebe-house; the Protestant inhabitants attend divine service at the churches of Ballyburley and Monasteriois. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Castropetre. Some ruins exist of the ancient castles of Ballybritton and Ballyhasill.

BALLYMADUN, or BALLYMODUM, a parish, in the barony of BALROBERTY WEST, union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.) from Ashbourne; containing 532 inhabitants, of whom about 73 are in the village. This parish, it is said, was anciently the residence of a hermitess, who had a cell here, and claimed a small rent-charge from the prioress of Grace-Dieu at Lusk; the ruins of an ancient church may still be traced. It comprises 3438 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, and is on the road from Brilbrigan to Ratoath. Part of the bog of Corragh is within its limits, and white marl is found in great abundance; there is also a very fine quarry of calp in the village. At Borranstown is a handsome mansion with an elegant Ionic portico of four columns supporting a cornice and pediment in the principal front; it occupies an elevated site commanding extensive views of the surrounding country. Ballymadun is nominally a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, and is part of the union and corps of the prebend of Clonmethan in the cathedral of St. Patrick, Dublin; the rectory is impropriate in Robert William Netterville, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £121. 17., the whole of which is payable to the impropriator. The glebe comprises 19 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Garristown and Ballymadun; the chapel is a neat building, enlarged by the addition of a gallery in 1833. The horns of an elk, measuring 11ft. 8in. from tip to tip, were dug up in 1823, and are now in the possession of one of the principal proprietors of the parish.

BALLYMAGARVEY, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of LOWER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (S.) from Slane; containing 104 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 915 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, is situated on the Nanny water; the soil is fertile, the land in a high state of cultivation, and several flourishing plantations add to the pleasing character of the surrounding scenery. There is a flour and corn mill. Ballymagarvey is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, and is part of the union of Kentstown; the rectory is impropriate in the heirs of Sir Andrew Aylmer. The tithe rent-charge is £105, of which £67. 10. are payable to the impropriators. The glebe comprises 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres of profitable land, valued at £2. 10. per acre. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called Blacklion, comprising the parishes of Ballymagarvey, Painstown, Ardmulchan, Brownstown, Kentstown, and Tymole, and containing two chapels, at Blacklion and Yellow Furze; the former is a plain thatched building.

BALLYMAGAUAN, a village, in the parish of TEMPLEFORT, union of CAVAN, barony of TULLAGHAGH, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (N. E.) from Ballinamore, on the road to Ballyconnel. Fairs are held on May 23rd, Aug. 12th, and Nov. 23rd; the last is a good fair for cattle. Some remains of the old castle, which was destroyed by Cromwell, yet exist.—See TEMPLEFORT.

BALLYMAGLASSON, a parish, in the union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, barony of RATOATH, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Dunshaughlin; containing 567 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Dublin to Summerhill, comprises 3476 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. Prior to the year 1824, it formed part of the ecclesiastical union of Kilmore; the living is now a distinct rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Crown; the tithe rent-charge is £145. 8. The church, a neat edifice at a considerable distance from the high road, was built by aid of a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1800. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballymaglasson forms part of the district of Batterstown, in the parish of Rathegan.

BALLYMAGOOPLY, a village, in the parish of RAHAN, union of MALLOW, barony of FERMoy, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (E.) from Mallow; containing 212 inhabitants. This place, which is pleasantly situated on the south bank of the river Blackwater, and on the road from Mallow to Fermoy, consists chiefly of a range of small houses stretching along the south side of the road. Between it and the Blackwater is Ballymagooly, a handsome seat, commanding a fine view of the beautiful scenery on the banks of the river: it occupies the site of the ancient castle of that name, which was garrisoned by the English in 1691, and the relief of which in that year gave rise to the battle of Bottle Hill. The parish church, at a short distance from the village, towards the river, with its churchyard surrounded by trees, is a pleasing object. The parochial school-house, a neat building, is situated near the east end of the village.—See RAHAN.

BALLYMAGORRY, a village, in the parish of LECKPATRICK, poor-law union of STRABANE, barony of STRABANE, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Strabane; containing 213 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Strabane to Dunamans.

BALLYMAHON, a market and post town, in the parish of SHERUEL, union of LONGFORD, barony of RATHCLINE, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 16 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Mullingar, and 55 miles (W.) from Dublin; containing 1239 inhabitants. This place is supposed to have derived its name from Mahon, King of Thomond, who, according to O'Halloran and other writers, defeated Fergal, son of Ruarc, in a great battle that occurred here in 960. There was once a castle of considerable strength, but nothing now remains except some of the arches, upon which a dwelling-house has been erected. The town is pleasantly situated on the river Inney, over which is a bridge of five arches, and on the road from Longford to Athlone: though possessing no features of attraction in itself, it derives much interest from the beauty of the scenery in its environs. Weaving was formerly carried on to some extent, but has for many years been discontinued, and at present its trade is principally with the neighbouring towns of Longford, Mullingar, Edgeworth's-town, Athlone, Monte, and Lanesborough, with respect to all of which it is conveniently situated. The Royal Canal runs near the town in its course from Dublin to Tarnbarry, and a boat for the conveyance of passengers and goods to Dublin passes daily. The market is on Thursday, chiefly for the sale of provisions; and fairs are held on the Thursday before Ash-Wednesday, May 11th, Aug. 11th, and Nov. 21st: the May fair is much resorted to by graziers, and is considered one of the best in the province for cattle. The market-house, a commodious building, is situated in the centre of the town; and over it is a large room in which the sessions are held. In the excise arrangements Ballymahon is within the district of Athlone. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town; and the quarter-sessions for the county are held here, alternately with Longford, four times in the year, for the trial of civil bills only. Petty-sessions for the division are also held every Monday. The parish church is situated in the town, in which are also a spacious Roman Catholic chapel, and the residence of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ardagh, who officiates as parish priest. A dispensary is under the superintendence of a resident physician. Goldsmith, the poet, who was born at Pallice, in the adjoining parish of Fergney, passed several years of his childhood in Ballymahon, where he lived with his widowed mother; and some years since, a meeting was held here to make arrangements for erecting a monument to his memory near the place of his nativity.—See SHRUEL.

BALLYMAKENNY, a parish, in the poor-law union of DROGHEDA, partly in the barony of FERRARD, but chiefly in the barony of DROGHEDA, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Drogheda; containing 499 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Drogheda to Annagasson, and comprises, according to the Ordnance survey, 1592 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which 848 $\frac{1}{2}$ are in the barony of Drogheda. The living is a perpetual curacy in the diocese of Armagh, erected in 1785, and in the patronage of the Lord-Primate; the rectory is appropriate to the see. The tithe rent-charge is £98. 8. 8., wholly payable to the perpetual curate, the Primate being only nominally rector, and deriving no emolument from the appropriation. The church is a handsome edifice with a spire, built by Lord-Primate Robinson at his own expense, and for the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £123. The glebe-house, situated near the church, was built in 1786, at an expense exceeding £700; the glebe comprises 32a. 3r. 2p. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is one of the three that constitute the district of Moylary, also called Ballymakenny.

BALLYMAKILL.—See BALLYNAKILL.

BALLYMANNY, a parish, in the poor-law union of NAAS, barony of EAST OPHALY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (E.) from Kildare, on the road to Naas; containing 193 inhabitants. It comprises 506 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres; and is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, constituting part of the union of Great Connell: the tithe rent-charge is £27. 14. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is in the district of Newbridge.

BALLYMARTIN, a parish, partly in the barony of LOWER BELFAST, but chiefly in that of UPPER BELFAST, union and county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 8 miles (N.N.W.) from Belfast; containing 870 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the Six-mile river, by which it is bounded on the north; and comprises, according to the Ordnance survey, 2421 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, including a detached portion of 560 acres: the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture improving. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, and is part of the union of Carnmoney: the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10. There is neither church nor any other place of worship in the parish; the inhabitants are chiefly Presbyterians, and attend the places of worship of that denomination in the neighbourhood. The ruins of the church, however, still remain, and the churchyard is used as a burial-ground by most of the inhabitants.

BALLYMARTLE, a parish, in the union of KINSALE, partly in the barony of KINSALE, but chiefly in that of KINNALEA, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Kinsale; containing 1751 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the ancient family of Martel, to whom it formerly belonged; it is situated on the old road from Cork to Kinsale, and contains 5503 statute acres. About 40 or 50 acres are woodland; 100 acres young plantation; and the remainder, except a very small portion of bog at Scart, is arable and pasture. The soil, though generally light, is tolerably fertile; in that part of the parish bordering on Templemichael, on the west, it is of a very superior quality, being a yellow loam of some depth and bearing excellent crops. About three-fourths of the land are under tillage, and the remainder mostly in large dairy-farms. Sand and other marine manures are brought up within a mile of the parish, and are extensively applied by the farmers, thus affording employment to a considerable number of persons. There is a small oatmeal-mill, and in the southern part of the parish is a flour-mill. Around the mansion of Glendonee, the proprietor has planted 150,000 trees, which are in a flourishing state, and form a very interesting and beautiful feature in the view of a country so generally destitute of wood. Near the church is a constabulary police station; and petty-sessions are held in the village every alternate Monday. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £318. The church is a handsome new structure, built by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, at a cost of £610; and contains a monument to Sir John Meade, Bart., grandfather of the first Lord Clanwilliam, and judge of the palatine court of the county of Tipperary. The glebe comprises five acres, but there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Cullen; the chapel, near the village, is a plain modern edifice.

BALLYMARTYR.—See BALLYOUTERA or CASTLE-MARTYR.

BALLYMASCANLAN, a parish, in the union of DUNDALK, but in the barony of UPPER DUNDALK, but chiefly in that of LOWER DUNDALK, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (N.E.) from Dundalk; containing 6674 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the sept of the Scanlans, its ancient proprietors: it is on the northern shore of the bay of Dundalk, and on the high road from Dublin to Belfast; a good road from Carlingford to Newry also passes through it. The lordship formerly belonged to Mellifont abbey, on the dissolution of which it was granted to the Moores, ancestors of the Marquess of Drogheda, by whom it was sold to the family of Fortescue. The parish comprises 15,997½ statute acres. In the eastern part is a range of heathy mountains, not designated by any general name, but of which one is called Carriguit: they extend 7½ miles in a direction nearly from north to south; in summer they afford tolerable pasturage, and from the chalybeate properties of the springs which issue from them they are supposed to contain iron-ore. The western part of the parish is much improved by extensive plantations, and the scenery throughout is highly picturesque. The south and east portions form part of the shore of the bay, off which are taken fish of various kinds, more especially rock-cod, haddock, and plaice. Agriculture is in an advanced state; the land in some parts yields fine crops of wheat, barley, oats, and potatoes. Limestone abounds at the western extremity of the parish, and is quarried for building, and also to be burnt into lime for manure. The manufacture of linen is carried on to a limited extent: there are some bleaching establishments on the banks of the Flurry, and a flax-mill. At Ballymascanlan are corn-mills; and there are also oatmeal and flour mills, and a manufactory for edge tools, at Ravensdale. In the village is a receiving-house for letters to and from Dundalk, and near the northern extremity of the parish is the post-office of Flurry Bridge, 4½ miles, north, from Dublin. The two principal seats are, Ravensdale Park, the residence of the Fortescue family, a handsome mansion situated in an extensive and beautiful demesne, with a well-stocked deer park; and Ballymascanlan House. There are many other genteel residences, of which Annaverna, the seat of the late Baron McClelland, is now the residence of his widow.

The LIVING is an impropriate curacy in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of T. Fortescue, Esq., impropriator of the ancient rectory. The parish, having been abbey land, is tithe-free, and the lord of the manor pays to the incumbent out of the impropriation an annual stipend of £3. 12., which is augmented with a grant of £73. 18. from Primate Boulter's fund. The church is a large neat structure with a tower, built in 1619 partly by a loan of £550 from the Board of First Fruits, and repaired in 1836 by a grant of £256 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: it contains three handsome monuments, one to the memory of Baron McClelland, and the others to the Rev. Dennis Magrath and the Rev. Owen Ormsby, late incumbents; that to the last was erected by subscription among the Protestant parishioners. The glebe-house, about 2¼ miles from the church, was built in 1825 at a cost of £640, of which £500 were a gift, and £50 a loan, from the Board of

First Fruits, and the remainder a donation from the Lord-Primate: the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is included in the district of Faughart, and has three chapels, one of which, situated at Rock Marshall, is a neat and spacious edifice, built on ground given by Mr. Fortescue. There is also a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. In the parish is a cromlech of three upright stones, supporting a massive tabular stone about 12 feet long and 9 broad and computed to weigh more than 30 tons: it is vulgarly called the Giant's Load, from a tradition that it was brought to the place by a giant named Porrah Bangh Mac Shuggan. Near it, in the same field, is a Rath called Chillo Ca Larc, said to be the burial-place of Mac Scanlan, chief of that sept in the tenth century. There are some remains of the ancient castle of Ballymascanlan; also of an old church on Faughart Hill, with a cemetery adjoining, in which is a large stone said by tradition to point out the grave of Edward Bruce, brother to the Scottish king: there are likewise several Danish raths on this hill. Mount Bagnall, at the eastern extremity of the parish, is an artificial eminence occupying a very romantic situation near the precipitous banks of the river, and supposed to be of Danish origin. In the same vicinity is the old mansion of Piedmont, formerly the residence of the Balfours.

BALLYMENA, of BALLYMANIA, a market and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of KIRKINRIOLA, barony of LOWER TOOME, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 21¼ miles (N.W.) from Belfast, and 105 miles (N.) from Dublin; containing 5152 inhabitants. In the disturbances of 1798, this place was the scene of an obstinate battle between the yeomanry and the United Irishmen of the surrounding district, the latter of whom, on the 7th of June, entered the town and proceeded to attack the market-house, which was defended by a party of the yeomanry aided by a few of the military and some of the loyal inhabitants. The insurgents having gained possession of the lower part of the market-house, the yeomanry surrendered themselves prisoners; but while a party of them was marching out of the market-house, those who were within being instigated by a person named Davison, to give the United Irishmen another volley, the fire was returned from the street, and several of the loyalists were killed while descending the steps. Some straggling parties of the enemy brought into the town Captain Ellis, of Innisrush, and Thomas Jones, Esq., of Moneeglass, with a number of the yeomanry, whom they lodged in the market-house; and on the day following, several more of the yeomanry were marched into the town as prisoners. Great divisions now took place in the committee of the United Irishmen, on the propriety of marching direct to Antrim, which they had been informed was in the possession of the king's troops. On hearing of the royal proclamation offering a free pardon to all, with the exception of officers, who should lay down their arms and disperse, almost all the men from Route were disposed to accept the terms; some, who were determined on making a stand, joined the united camp at Donogore; while others departed homewards, leaving the town to be taken possession of by Colonel Clavering and the military who, after the recapture of Antrim, had encamped at Shanes Castle, in the neighbourhood.

The town is pleasantly situated on the river Braid, over which is a large bridge of stone: it owes its rapid rise to the linen manufacture, which was introduced into the neighbourhood by the Adairs and Dickeyes about the year 1732, since which time the town has greatly increased in extent and wealth. It now occupies an area of 80 acres, exclusive of the suburb of Harryville, in the parish of Ballyclug; and contains 952 houses, in general large and well built, among which are a few of very ancient character, with gabled fronts. The lighting, cleansing, and paving of the town are managed by commissioners under the act 9th George IV. cap. 82, which was adopted by the inhabitants in 1836. The linen trade is still carried on extensively: within a circuit of five miles round the town are 14 bleach-grounds, at each of which, on an average, about 15,000 pieces are annually bleached, exclusively of considerable quantities of brown and black goods, which are also finished here, and for the manufacture of which there are some large establishments. Several linen merchants unconnected with the bleaching department reside in the town. There is a mill for spinning linen-yarn by machinery; and an extensive ale brewery, originally established in 1729, continued in operation for more than a century, till it was purchased by Clotworthy Walkinshaw, Esq., who, in 1831, converted it into a distillery, in which great quantities of barley grown in the neighbourhood are consumed. Branches of the Provincial Bank of Ireland, and of the Belfast, Northern, and Ulster Banking Companies, have been established here. An act was passed in 1845 for forming a railway from Belfast to this place, with branches to Carrickfergus and Randalstown; the capital of the company is £385,000, with power to raise £128,333 by loans. The market is on Saturday for the sale of linens, of which 4000 pieces are on an average sold every market-day; and there are two weekly markets for grain, pork, and other provisions, great quantities of which are bought, and sent to Belfast, either for home consumption or for exportation: numbers of horses, cattle, and pigs are also sold on the market-days. Fairs for every description of live stock are annually held on July 26th and Oct. 21st; but the sales on the market-days preceeding and following these dates are frequently greater than at the fairs. The market-house is a commodious edifice in the centre of the town, with a steeple 60 feet high. Here is a chief constabulary police station. Courts leet and baron are annually held for the manor of Kihilistown; a court under the seneschal is held every month for the recovery of debts; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Tuesday. The quarter-sessions for the county are held in January and June, alternately with Ballymoney. There is a secure and well-built bridewell, containing eight cells, two day-rooms, and two yards.

The parish church, a large plain structure with an embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, is situated in the town; and there are also a Roman Catholic chapel built in 1820, three places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and one for Wesleyan Methodists. The diocesan school, originally established at Carrickfergus in the reign of Elizabeth, was removed to this place in 1829, when an acre of land was given by William Adair, Esq., on which the building was erected, at an expense of £900: the master, who is appointed by the Lord-Primate, derives his stipend from the benefited clergy of the dioceses of Armagh and Connor, and is allowed to receive private boarders. A free school was founded here in 1813, by John Guy or Guay, who bequeathed £24 per annum to the master, and £50 towards the erection of a school-house, which, with a house for the master, was built in 1818: the children are gratuitously taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, and supplied with books and stationery. In connexion with this establishment, a female school has been built, for the instruction of the girls in needlework. The workhouse of the union, on a site of six acres purchased for £602. 10., was completed in 1842, at an expense of £6600, and is constructed to contain 900 paupers. The only remains of antiquity are some terraces, and foundations of walls, of a castle built in the reign of James I.—See KIRKINRIOLA.

BALLYMITTY, a parish, in the union of WEXFORD, barony of WEST SHELMLAKE, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S.S.W.) from Toghmon; containing 393 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 1364½ statute acres, is intersected by the new road from Bannow to Wexford; it is chiefly under tillage, and there is no waste land: the drill system of husbandry prevails, and much general improvement has taken place. Stone for building is quarried in the parish; and a stream that falls into Bannow bay is navigable to Coolclife for lighters, which come up with the tide from the peninsula of Hook, laden with limestone for burning. The living is now a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, united to the rectory of Toghmon; the impropriate rectorial tithes were granted to the incumbent by an instrument dated March 9th, 1670. The entire tithe rent-charge of Ballymitty is £61. 16. 4. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, sometimes called Bannow, which comprises the parishes of Ballymitty, Bannow, Carrig, and Kilcavan, and the greater part of Ambrosetown, and contains a chapel at Ballymitty, a neat building with a residence for the clergyman, and another at Danes-castle, in the parish of Carrig. On the grounds of Hill Town are the remains of an ancient castle, consisting of a square tower now converted into a barn.

BALLYMODAN, a parish, in the union of BANDON, partly in the Eastern Division of the barony of EAST CARBERY, but chiefly in the barony of KINNALMEAKY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with the greater part of the borough of Bandon, 2938 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the river Bandon, and comprises 8060 statute acres. The land in general is tolerably good, and the system of agriculture has been greatly improved by the encouragement and example of the Bernard family and the resident gentry of the neighbourhood. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and embellished with several gentlemen's seats, among which the principal is Castle-Bernard, formerly Castle-Mahon, the elegant seat of the Earl of Bandon. It is a stately mansion, erected in 1806, near the site of the former castle, which originally belonged to the O'Mahony family and was subsequently the residence of Judge Bernard, by whom it was greatly improved in 1715. The park, which is on the south bank of the river and about a mile from Bandon, extends into the parish of Kilbrogan, and is justly celebrated for the beauty and variety of its scenery and the extent and rich luxuriance of its woods. At no great distance from the present house is the ancient fortress of the family of O'Mahony, of whom the last chieftain of that sept, Connogher O'Mahony, proprietor of the seignory of Kinnalmeaky, fell fighting in the rebellion of the Earl of Desmond, whose cause he had embraced; it forms a striking and an interesting feature in the widely extended and highly beautiful demesne.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The tithe rent-charge is £600, payable in moieties to the impropriator and the vicar. The church, a plain neat edifice, situated in the town of Bandon, was erected at the expense of the first earl of Cork, in 1618, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £441 for its repair. The glebe contains 9 acres, but there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united with that of Kilbrogan and part of Desertserges, forming the district of Bandon. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the Synod of Munster; also places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. The chief parochial school is at Bandon; and a large and commodious school-house, with a residence for the master, has been erected by the Duke of Devonshire on Cavendish quay; another parochial school, at Curravarrahane, is endowed with a house for the master, and two acres of land, by the vicar. There are several other schools in Bandon. Of the ancient church, situated to the east of the town, only the cemetery remains.

BALLYMOE, a village, in the parish of DRIMTEMPLE, poor-law union of CASTLEREA, barony of BALLYMOE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Castlereagh. It is situated on the river Suck, and on the road from Roscommon to Castlereagh, under both of which towns it has a receiving-house for letters. Fairs are held on Feb. 1st, March 16th, May 21st, June 24th, Aug. 22nd, and Oct. 25th. The village is said to have derived its name from a holy well here, dedicated to St. Moah: it contains extensive flour and oatmeal mills, and, from the abundance of water-power, the neighbourhood affords many excellent sites for manufactories: this being a great district for sheep, the manufacture of coarse woollen-cloth might be introduced to advantage. Here are the parish church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a dispensary, and charitable loan bank; and day and Sunday schools are supported.—See DRIMTEMPLE.

BALLYMONEY, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, partly in the north-east liberties of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and partly in the barony of KILCONWAY, but chiefly in that of UPPER DUNLUCK, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 35 miles (N. W.) from Belfast, and 119 miles (N. by W.) from Dublin; containing 11,727 inhabitants, of whom 2490 are in the town. This place was anciently the head of one of those Irish districts called Tuoghs, which were similar to the present baronies. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Bann, which passes within three miles of the town; and is intersected by the road from Belfast to Derry. The town is built upon an eminence, and from its situation is considered healthy: a new line of mail-coach road has been constructed to pass through it, and in every respect it is rapidly improving. A new road, also, has been opened across the Garry bog, leading to Ballycastle and the Giant's Causeway; and a bridge has been erected over the river Bann at Agivey, about three miles distant, opening a direct communication with the county and city of Derry, with Tyrone, and other places. The TRADE consists principally in the sale of linens manufactured in the neighbourhood, for which this town is, next to Ballymena, the chief depôt. The linen market has been long established, and is eminent for the superior quality of the goods sold here. Though much less extensive than it was, the trade is still very considerable; from 15,000 to 20,000 double pieces are annually sold, and on the first Thursday in every month large quantities of seven-eighths linens, of various qualities, are disposed of here, principally for the London market, under the name of "Coleraines," being purchased and bleached by the persons engaged in that branch of trade. There are two markets every month for low-priced brown linens, three-quarters of a yard wide, which are sent to England and America: but the demand for these latter goods has decreased.

A very extensive trade is also carried on in grain, butter, pork, and general provisions. The market for grain was first established in 1890, but for want of encouragement it languished for a time, and was discontinued: in 1831 it was revived; the new market-place was appropriated to its use, and stores were built by Messrs M'Eldeny and Co., for the use of which and for weighing they are entitled to one penny per sack. A considerable quantity of oats is sent to Liverpool, London, and other English markets, and some are consumed in a distillery near the town. The market for provisions was established about the year 1790, and has since been gradually increasing: about 4000 carcases of pigs are generally sold during the season, which are principally cured at home for the Liverpool and other English markets; they were formerly all sent to Belfast, and a considerable number are still purchased by the curers of that place. A public crane was established under the provisions of an act of the 52nd of George III. In the market for butter about 10,000 casks are usually disposed of during the season, the greater part of which are shipped off from Portrush, about 9 miles distant, for Liverpool. There are a soap and candle and a tobacco manufactory, a tanyard, and a large brewery, in the town; and at Moore Fort, about 3 miles distant, is a very extensive distillery, in which from 50,000 to 60,000 gallons of whisky are annually made: there are also a mill for spinning flax, and a very extensive flour-mill. Branches of the Belfast and Ulster Banking Companies have been established here. The trade of the town is susceptible of great increase, from its favourable situation in the centre of a rich tract of country, without any markets nearer to it than Ballymena on the one side, and Coleraine on the other. There is, however, but little facility of water carriage, the river Bann not being navigable above Coleraine, nor below Portna. The general market is on Thursday; and fairs are held annually on May 6th, July 10th, and Oct. 10th. A chief constabulary police station has been fixed here. The manorial court for the barony of Dunluce is held in the town on the first Friday in every month; petty-sessions are held every alternate Thursday; and the quarter-sessions for the county are held here and at Ballymena alternately. The court-house or town-hall is situated in the centre of the town: the bridewell, recently built, contains six cells, with day-rooms and airing-yards adapted to the classification of prisoners, and apartments for the keeper.

The PARISH comprises 23,108½ statute acres, of which 21,736½ are in Upper Dunluce, and 753½ in Kilconway; about 500 acres are woodland, 2225 bog, 59½ water, and the remainder principally arable land. The soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture greatly improving. The principal crops, till within the last few years, were barley and oats, of which latter large quantities are still grown in the neighbourhood; but the cultivation of wheat has been introduced, and is rapidly increasing; abundant crops are now raised, and wheat begins to form a material portion of the corn-trade. Coal and iron-stone are found in abundance at O'Hara Brook; and there are medicinal springs on several parts of the estate. The parish comprises the ancient parishes of Ballymoney, Dunlap, Kilmilo, and Tullagore; it is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, and is the corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of Connor, which is in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £761. 11. The church, a large plain edifice with a tower and cupola, was built in 1782, near the site of an ancient church, of which there are still some remains; it was repaired in 1829 by a loan of £200 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was erected in 1826, at the cost of £2278, of which £1384 were a loan from the Board; the glebe comprises 26 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Dunluce: in both are chapels in which the parish priest officiates. There are likewise places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, for those of the Remonstrant Synod, and Covenanters. A school was established in 1813 by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's fund; several gentlemen have built and endowed schools on their own estates, for the education of the poor; and there are other schools in different parts of the parish. An association for suppressing vagrant mendicity, by giving employment and relief to the poor at their own dwellings, was established in 1821; and a dispensary, in 1827. The workhouse on a site of six acres purchased for £457, was completed in 1842, at an expense of £6785, and is constructed to contain 800 paupers. On the estate of Major Rowan is a fine moat, commanding a very extensive view; there is another at Moore Fort, and one in the townland of Cross. A double patera of gold, weighing 19 ounces and 10 drachms, of elegant form and curious workmanship, was discovered in this parish by a peasant a few years since.

BALLYMONEY, a parish, in the union of DUNMANWAY, Eastern Division of the barony of EAST CARBERY, county of CORK, and province of MÜNSTER, 10 miles (W. by S.) from Bandon; containing 3733 inhabitants. This parish, which is intersected by the river Bandon, and skirted on the north by the mail-coach road from Bandon to Dunmanway, comprises 7308 statute acres. The land is of good quality; about two-thirds are under cultivation, and the remainder is chiefly mountain and bog. The old heavy wooden plough is generally in use, and, except on the lands of the resident gentry, agriculture as a system is unknown. The opening of a new line of road through the parish to Clonakilty, whence sea-manure is obtained in abundance, has afforded the means of bringing much poor land into cultivation. Great quantities of fuel are raised from the bogs, which supply turf and bog-wood for the neighbourhood to the south. A domestic manufacture of coarse linen is carried on for home consumption. At Ballincarrig are Rock-castle mills, capable of grinding 5000 bags of wheat annually, and affording constant employment to 30 persons; at Ballyneen a few persons are engaged in weaving cotton-cord, but the principal pursuit in the parish is agriculture. Ballyneen is a constabulary police station, and petty-sessions are held there every alternate Monday. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Lord-Primate and the Archbishop of Dublin, who must present a fellow or ex-fellow of Trinity College, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £588. 15. The church is an old hut a very neat edifice. The glebe-house, pleasantly situated in the centre of some extensive improvements, was built in 1788, at a cost exceeding £700, of which £100 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits, in 1789: the glebe comprises 43 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions, one-half of the parish is included in the district of Dunmanway, and the other half in that of Kinneigh or Enniskenn: the chapel at Ballincarrig, belonging to the former, is a small neat edifice recently erected. At Ballyneen is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

There are some remains of Ballincarrig Castle, originally built to command a very important pass in the valley. It is a lofty square pile of building, 96 feet high, the walls of which are 6 feet in thickness; a spiral stone staircase, still in tolerable preservation, leads to the battlements; the platform and one of the gables are entire, but the roof has been long destroyed. The upper apartment is lighted by circular arched windows in the Norman style, with mouldings enriched with curious devices, and various Scriptural emblems, among which is Our Saviour on the Cross between the Two Thieves; and on two sides of the room are seats. Here are also the initials R.M.—C.C., and the date 1585, above which is an angel with expanded wings: this inscription is supposed to commemorate the founder, Randal M'Carty, and his wife Catherine Collins. Below this apartment is a lofty vaulted hall, which, from the brackets and small windows still remaining, is supposed to have been originally divided into three different stories. At a short distance to the south-east is a circular keep or watch tower; to the south is a lake; and towards the north, a hog of considerable extent is terminated by a low ridge of rugged rocks. Though the date of the castle is supposed to be 1585, the original tower is evidently of much greater antiquity, and probably of the 12th or 13th century. Near the castle have been found several silver coins.

BALLYMORAN.—See ALMORITTA.

BALLYMORE, or TANDERAGEE, a parish, in the unions of NEWRY and BANBRIDGE, barony of LOWER ORION, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the town of Tanderagee, the village of Clare, and the greater part of the village of Poyntz-Pass (all which are separately described), 11,505 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Newry to Portadown, and comprises 14,158½ statute acres: about 100 acres are under plantation, 300 are bog, and 60 waste and water; the remainder is all arable land, remarkably good, and in a high state of cultivation, producing abundant crops. There are veins of potters'-clay and fullers'-earth, both of excellent quality, and lying near the surface, close to the town; but neither have been worked. Several quarries in the parish yield excellent building-stone; that at Tullyhue has been worked for building the splendid castle of Tanderagee, and produces stone of very superior quality. This castle is situated near the town, and forms a conspicuous and highly interesting feature in the view. Fairs are held at Tanderagee on July 5th, Nov. 5th, and the first Wednesday in every month; and at Clare on May 12th, for horses, cattle, and sheep. Courts leet and baron are also held, the former twice in the year, and the latter on the third Thursday in every month, for the recovery of debts under 40s. Petty-sessions are held in the town every Tuesday.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and forms the corps of the prebend of Ballymore in the cathedral of St. Patrick, Armagh, in the patronage of the Lord-Primate: the tithe rent-charge is £750. The church is a spacious structure in the early English style, with an embattled tower crowned by pinnacles: it was erected in 1813, at an expense of £2900, of which £1500 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits, and £700 a gift from Lady Mandeville; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £144 for its repair. The glebe-house, built about a century ago, is a handsome residence, and the glebe comprises 520 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Tanderagee, which comprises also the parishes of Acton and Mullaghrack, and contains three chapels, one in each parish; that of Ballymore is situated at Poyntz-Pass. There are meeting-houses at Tanderagee and Clare for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. The interest of a bequest of £100 by some member of the Montagn family, is divided in equal shares among the poor of the parishes of Ballymore and Seagoe. There are some very slight remains of the ancient church, where are two extensive cemeteries nearly adjoining each other, one exclusively for Protestants, and the other for Roman Catholics; in the latter is interred the noted Redmond O'Hanlon, the Irish rapparee. Near Ballynaback are two chalybeate springs, which have been found efficacious in scorbutic diseases.—See TANDERAGEE and CLARE.

BALLYMORE, or BALLYMORE-EUSTACE, a market-town and parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of SOUTH NAAS, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 18 miles (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 2139 inhabitants, of whom 936 are in the town. This town derives its name, signifying "the great town of Eustace," from its foundation by that family, a branch of the Fitzgeralds, who erected here a castle of great strength, the ruins of which have been entirely removed. It is situated on the river Liffey, over which is a handsome stone bridge of six arches, and consists of one principal and three smaller streets, containing altogether 177 houses: there is a receiving-house for letters to and from Blessington. The great southern road formerly passed through it, but has been diverted through the village of Kilcullen by the construction of a new line; and the town has since considerably decayed. A large manufactory, in which every description of cloth is made, was erected in the vicinity by Mr. Christopher Dromgoole, in 1803, and, when in full work, employs about 700 persons. The market, granted by James I. to the Archbishop of Dublin, having fallen into disuse, was revived about seventeen years since; it is held on Wednesday, and is well supplied with grain. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday, June 24th, Aug. 26th, Oct. 28th, and Dec. 21st, principally for cattle, pigs, and sheep. Here is a station of the constabulary police. The PARISH comprises 4203½ statute acres, and is the head of a lordship and manor belonging to the archbishop, and comprising the parishes of Ballymore, Ballybought, Cotlandstown, Yagoe, Tipperkevin, Tubber, Milltown, Tornant, and part of Ratsallagh. The system of agriculture is improving. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, with those of Ballybought, Cotlandstown, and Yagoe episcopally united time immemorially, the whole forming the union of Ballymore, in the patronage of the Archbishop: the rectory is partly appropriate to the economy estate of the cathedral of St. Patrick, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge of Ballymore is £109, of which £30. 10. are payable to the lessee of the dean and chapter, and £59. 3. to the vicar; the remainder was till lately received by the treasurer of the cathedral. The gross vicarial rent-charge of the benefice is £103. The church is a plain building with an embattled tower surmounted with pinnacles, erected in 1810 by the Board of First Fruits, at a cost of £900; the churchyard is of great extent, and contains the remains of the old church, and numerous ancient tombstones. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parishes of Ballybought, Cotlandstown, Tipperkevin, Hollywood, and part of Blessington; the chapel at Ballymore is a substantial and commodious building, and there is another at Hollywood.

About a mile from the town, the river Liffey forms the celebrated cascade of Poul-a-Phuca, or the Demon's Hole, consisting of three successive waterfalls 150 feet in total height. The chasm is 40 feet wide, and skirted on each side by perpendicular masses of greywacke rock; and when the river is swollen by heavy rains the water rushes down with tumultuous impetuosity into a circular basin of the rock, worn quite smooth and of great depth, the form of which imparts to it the motion of a whirlpool, and from which the cascade derives its name. It then dashes through narrow openings in the rocks, and forms two more falls, the lowest being about 50 feet high. Immediately over the basin, on the line of the new turnpike-road from Blessington to Baltiuglass, is a picturesque bridge of one pointed arch springing from rock to rock, built in an antique style from a design by the late Alex. Nimmo, Esq., at an expense, including the land arches and approaches, of £4074. The span of the arch is 65 feet; the altitude of the chord above the upper fall, 47 feet; and the height of the keystone of the arch above the bed of the river, 150 feet. The late Earl of Miltown took a lively interest in this picturesque spot, which he embellished by planting one side of the glen forming part of his estate, by making walks, and erecting rustic buildings in various places, besides a banqueting-room, 45 feet long by 25 wide, from which there is a delightful view of the falls and the bridge, with the perpendicular rocks partly planted, and the upper moss seat appearing through the arch. Owing, however, to the disturbances of 1798, Lord Miltown went abroad, and some time after sold the place to Colonel Aylmer, who is now the proprietor, and has appointed a person to take care of it. Accommodation has been prepared for the numerous visitors that resort hither from Dublin and elsewhere, and seats have been placed in the most advantageous situations for obtaining different views of the fall; a rustic seat above the head of the fall commands an excellent view of the cataract, bridge, lower rustic seat, and banqueting-hall, with the windings of the river.

BALLYMORE, or ST. OWEN'S OF LOUGHSEUDY, a post-town and parish, in the union of ATHLONE, barony of RATHCONRATH, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 12 miles (W. by S.) from Mullingar, and 57½ miles (W.) from Dublin; containing 3487 inhabitants. An abbey is said to have been founded here in the year 700; but the only religious establishment of which there are any authentic records, was a monastery founded by the De Lacy family in 1215, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, for Præmonstratensian canons and Benedictine nuns, who occupied distinct portions of the same building. Henry VIII. made the church of this monastery the cathedral for the diocese of Meath, which it continued to be for a short time. In the parliamentary war of 1641, Ballymore was the principal military station of the English in this part of the country; the garrison had possession of a strong fortress on the shore of Lough Shodie, or Loughseudy, which was accessible from the land only by a drawbridge across a wide and deep moat. In the war of the Revolution, when a portion of the English army had fortified themselves at Mullingar, this place was strengthened by a party of the Irish forces from their head-quarters at Athlone, with the view of acting against Mullingar; but they were soon attacked by General De Ginkell, and pursued with loss to Moat-a-Grenogue. The fort of Ballymore, on the island in the lake, nevertheless remained in the possession of James's forces, and was garrisoned with 1000 chosen men. But the forces of William advancing from Athlone to besiege it, the garrison, on seeing some armed boats launched to act against it from the lake, on which side it was defenceless, surrendered themselves prisoners of war after only one day's defence; and the fort was then entered by De Ginkell, who repaired the fortifications, and placed in it a strong English garrison. The town, which is situated on the mail-coach road from Moate, extends into the parish of Killare, and contains 574 inhabitants, of whom 393 are in that part of it which is in the parish of Ballymore. It consists chiefly of small houses and cabins, and the only public buildings are the parish church and Roman Catholic chapel: there is a sub-post office. It had formerly a market, which has been discontinued; fairs are held on Whit-Monday and Oct. 14th. Here is a chief constabulary police station; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Friday.

The PARNISH, which is called St. Owen's of Loughseudy, comprises 10,465½ statute acres: about three-fifths of its entire extent are arable, and the remainder is pasture, with some waste land and bog. Agriculture, which had been long in a very neglected state, has within the last few years shewn indications of improvement. There are some fine limestone-quarries, worked for building and for burning into lime, but only for private use. The lake of Shodie is studded with some pleasing islets towards the north. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Meath, united to the inappropriate curacy of Killare, and in the patronage of the Bishop, to whom the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge of Ballymore is £242, payable to the bishop. The church, a neat edifice with a square tower, was erected by aid of a loan of £1200 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1827. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the same Board, in 1813; the glebe comprises 30 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parish of Killare; each parish contains a chapel. Near the town are the remains of an ancient castle said to have belonged to the De Lacy family; the only portion standing is a round tower, about 20 feet in height.

BALLYMORE, a parish, in the union of WEXFORD, barony of FORTH, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (W.) from Broadway; containing 568 inhabitants. This parish is situated near Lough Ta, and comprises 2525 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and forms part of the union of Kilsoran, also called Tacumshane, which constitutes the corps of the chancellorship in the cathedral of Ferns: the tithe rent-charge of Ballymore is £152. 18. 6, payable to the chancellor. In 1832, the parishes of Ballymore and Tacumshane were formed into an ecclesiastical district under the name of Churchtown, and a perpetual curacy was instituted. The new church is situated in Tacumshane, but close to the border of this parish, and was built by aid of a grant from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballymore is in the district of Maglass; a chapel has been erected.

BALLYMOREEN, a parish, in the union of THURLES, barony of ELIAGARTY, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Thurles, on the coach-road from Dublin to Cork; containing 1203 inhabitants. It comprises 3846 statute acres; there are about 500 acres of bog, and of the remainder of the land, the greater portion is under tillage. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Ormonde. The tithe rent-charge is £150, of which £45 are payable to the impropriator, and £105 to the vicar. There is no church, glebe-house, or glebe; the members of the Established Church attend divine service at Littleton, about 2½ miles distant.

BALLYMORIN.—See ALMORITIA.

BALLYMOTTE, a market and post town, in the parish of EMLYVAD, union of SLIGO, barony of CORRAN, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 11 miles (S. by W.) from Sligo, and 94½ miles (W. N. W.) from Dublin; containing 839 inhabitants. This place appears to have derived its origin from a castle built in 1300 by Richard de Burgo, Earl of Ulster, and which, after its seizure by the native Irish during the insurrection of 1641, was found to be of such strength as to offer a serious obstacle to the complete subjugation of Connaught; it was at length taken, in 1652, by the united forces of Ireton and Sir C. Coote. A small monastery for Franciscan friars of the third order was founded here by the sept of Mac Donogh, and at the suppression was granted to Sir H. Broncard, who assigned it to Sir W. Taaffe, Knt. : an acquisition of the 27th of Elizabeth records that it belonged to the castle, and had been totally destroyed by the insurgents. The town is situated at the junction of six roads, but has not a single principal road passing through it; it consists of one street, and contains 160 houses. The surrounding country is well cultivated, and its surface agreeably undulates; there is a good view from an obelisk erected by Lady Arabella Denny on a small hill near Ballymote. In the immediate vicinity is Earl's Field, the property of Sir R. Gore Booth, Bart., to whom the town belongs; and in a delightful situation, within a quarter of a mile, is the glebe-house, which commands a fine prospect of the adjacent mountains and the distant hill of Knocknaree. About $\frac{2}{3}$ miles from the town is Temple House, a handsome residence beautifully situated on the banks of a lake of that name, and in a demesne containing some good timber; on the edge of the lake are the ruins of the old house, which was built by the O'Hara family in 1303, and was afterwards given to the Knights Hospitaliers.

The linen manufacture was formerly carried on here to a great extent, under the encouragement of the Rt. Hon. Thos. Fitzmorris, but is now nearly extinct. The market is held on Thursday, for provisions; and fairs are held on the last Monday in January, May 11th, first Monday (O.S.) in June, Sept. 3rd, first Monday (O.S.) in November, and second Monday (O.S.) in December. Quarter-sessions are held here, in a sessions-house, in January, April, July, and October; and petty-sessions on alternate Mondays. The hridewell is the only one in the county; it affords the requisite statutable accommodation, and there are a day-room and an airing-yard for prisoners of each sex. This is a chief station of the constabulary police. The parish church is situated in the town; and there are a Roman Catholic chapel, a meeting-house for Wesleyan Methodists, and a dispensary. The remains of the castle built by Richard de Burgo occupy an area 150 feet square with towers at the angles, and sufficiently denote its former strength. At the southern extremity of the main street are the ruins of the Franciscan friary; over the principal entrance is the figure of a pope carved in stone, but somewhat mutilated. A book, called the Book or Psalter of Ballymote, was written in Irish by the monks of this place, and is yet extant. There is a fort of rather unusual elevation about one mile from the town.—See EMLYDAD.

BALLYMOYER, a parish, in the union of NEWRY, barony of UPPER FEWS, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N. E.) from Newtown-Hamilton; containing 3071 inhabitants. This place, formerly called Tahellen, was the site of a religious establishment founded by St. Patrick, who appointed St. Killian to preside over it, and it appears that the conventual church was destroyed by fire in 670; the ancient cemetery may still be traced in the demesne of Ballymoyer Lodge. The parish is situated on the road from Newtown-Hamilton to Newry, and comprises 7381 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which about 40 acres are under wood, about 2605 bog and waste, and the remainder arable and pasture. The lands were heathy and barren previously to 1778, when Sir Walter Synnot erected a house, and became a resident landlord; scarcely a tree or shrub was to be seen, and the agricultural implements were of the rudest kind. He constructed good roads in the vicinity, planted forest-trees to a considerable extent, and by his example and liberal encouragement of improvements both as to their abodes and their system of agriculture, effected a great change in the habits of the peasantry, and in the appearance of the country. Much, however, still remains to be done; green crops are but little cultivated, and the mode of farming is in some parts very slovenly. There are good quarries of stone; and in the demesne of Ballymoyer Lodge are some lead-mines, the ore of which is very pure, and lies conveniently for working. The river Cusher has one of its sources within the parish. Among the gentlemen's seats is Ballymoyer Lodge, pleasantly situated in a demesne of 300 acres, embellished with thriving plantations and forest-timber of excellent growth, planted by the owner.

The LIVING is a rectory and perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh: the rectory is part of the union of Armagh; the perpetual curacy was instituted under the provisions of an act of the 7th of George III., cap. 17, and is in the patronage of the Rector. The title rent-church is £150, the whole of which is payable to the rector: the income of the curate arises from a stipend of £50 from the rector, £12. 6. from the Augmentation fund, and £50 from the glebe, amounting in all to £112. 6. per annum. The walls of a church were erected in the reign of Charles I., but the clergyman appointed having been murdered, it remained unroofed until 1775, when Primate Robinson caused the work to be finished. The present church, a small plain edifice with a lofty square tower, was built in 1821, at a cost of £1300, of which £900 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits, the remainder having been raised by parochial assessment. The glebe-house, within a few perches of the church, was built in 1825, at an expense of £500, of which £450 were a gift and £50 a loan from the same Board; the glebe comprises 34 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is one of the three forming the district of Loughgilly, and contains a chapel. The remains of the former church, with the exception of the roof, are in good preservation, and form a picturesque and interesting object. Near the eastern end is a remarkably large ash-tree, beneath the shade of which are deposited the remains of Florence Mac Moyer, otherwise Mac Wire or Mac Guire, a Franciscan friar, upon whose evidence Primate Plunket was executed at Tyburn in 1680. Some years since, a cairn was opened here, and found to contain two separate tombs, in one of which were two urns of elegant form and workmanship, containing ashes; one of them is in the possession of Mr. Synnot, of Ballymoyer Lodge, who has also a variety of ancient coins dug up in the neighbourhood, and some curiously marked stones found in the large cairn of Mullish, in the county of Monaghan.

BALLYMURPHY, a village, in the parish of St. MULLINS, poor-law union of New Ross, barony of LOWER ST. MULLINS, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{2}{3}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Borris; containing 158 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Borris to Enniscorthy.

BALLYMURRY, a village, in the parish of KILMEAN, union of ROSCOMMON, barony of ATHLONE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Roscommon: the population is returned with the parish. This village is on the road from Roscommon to Athlone, and consists of a few neatly built houses and about 20 cabins. It has a neat and improving appearance, and is kept remarkably clean; the manufacture of pottery is carried on to a moderate extent. The parish Roman Catholic chapel, which is a thatched building in good repair, and a place of worship for the Society of Friends, are situated in the village.—See KILMEAN.

BALLYNACALLAGH, a village, in the parish of KILNAMANAGH, union of BANTRY, barony of BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 170 inhabitants.

BALLYNACARRIGA, a village, in the parish of KILNAMANAGH, union of BANTRY, barony of BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 152 inhabitants.

BALLYNACLOGH, or DOLLARDSTOWN, a parish, in the union of TIPPERARY, barony of COONAGH, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. by W.) from Pallas-Greine, on the road from Limerick to Tipperary; containing 630 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1092 statute acres; the lands are very where of good quality, being mostly based on limestone. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Emly, forming the corps of the prebend of Ballynaclogh in the cathedral of Emly, and one of the rectories that constitute the union of Dromkeen and corps of the archdeaconry of Emly: the tithe rent-charge is £34. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is within the union of Greine, or Pallas-Greine; the chapel is situated in the little village of Nicker.

BALLYNACLOUGH, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of UPPER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S. E.) from Nenagh; containing 1152 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Arra, which falls into the Shannon at Drominear; and comprises 3870 statute acres: the land is all arable and pasture, the soil fertile, and the system of agriculture much improved. Limestone abounds, and a marble-quarry exists, but is not now wrought; the marble is both of red and grey colour, and of very fine quality. There is a small corn-mill. The mansion of Debsborough is pleasantly situated in a demesne tastefully laid out and well planted. A constabulary police force has been stationed in the parish. The living is a vicarage and perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Killaloe, the vicarage united, since the foundation of the deanery, to the entire rectories of Drominear and Kilkeary, and the vicarage of Terryglass, constituting the union of Ballynacloough and the corps of the deanery of Killaloe, in the patronage of the Crown: the perpetual curacy is in the gift of the Dean. The rectory of Ballynacloough is inappropriate in the Rev. Daniel and Mrs. Wall, and the Misses Elizabeth and Harriet Hardy. The tithe rent-charge is £176. 5., of which £117. 10. are payable to the impropriators, and £58. 15. to the dean; the rent-charge of the whole benefice, payable to the dean, is £300. The church, a neat edifice, was erected by aid of a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1815. The glebe-house is situated on a glebe of 7a. 1r. 18 $\frac{1}{2}$ p., and there is also a glebe of 15 acres in Terryglass. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Kilmore; the chapel is a modern building, on the townland of Ballyquiveane. The poor have the benefit of the dispensaries at Nenagh and Silvermines. There are some remains of the old church adjoining the present structure.

BALLYNACRAGGY, a village, in the parish of DROMCREEHY, union of ENNISMYON, barony of BURREN, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (W.) from Burren. This place derives its name from an ancient castle, of which there are some remains; it is situated on the road from Burren to Ballyvaughan.—See DROMCREEHY.

BALLYNACREEN, a village, in the parish of KILMAHON, union of MIDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 126 inhabitants. It is situated on the southern coast.

BALLYNACURRA.—See BALLINACURRA.

BALLYNADRIMNA, a parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, barony of CARBERY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (W.) from Enfield; containing 1501 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Kilcock to Kinneag, and comprises 4285 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and is part of the union of Castle-Carbery; the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Downshire: the tithe rent-charge is £69. 5. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballyna or Johnstown; the chapel, a neat building, is at Gar-risker.

BALLYNAFAUNA, a village, in the parish of CLONDULANE, union of FERMOV, barony of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 318 inhabitants.

BALLYNAHAGLISH, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACRMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Tralee; containing 2147 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the bay of Tralee, and comprises 3006 statute acres. The land is chiefly under tillage, producing excellent crops, and the system of agriculture has been greatly improved within the last few years; sea-weed and sand are extensively used as manure, and good limestone, of a kind approaching to grey marble, is also obtained. The villages of Taulaught and Chapeltown, lie on the south-eastern shore of the creek or harbour of Barrow, and are partly inhabited by fishermen. On account of the fine bathing strand in Tralee bay, and a chalybeate spring of great power on the border of the parish and adjoining Clogherbrien, the villages are much frequented during the summer by visitors from Tralee and other places, for whose accommodation some neat bathing-lodges have been erected. There is a coast-guard station at Killeenra, on Tralee bay. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfer and Aghadoe, with the entire rectory of Annagh and the rectory and vicarage of Clogherbrien episcopally united from a period prior to any known record, forming the union of Ballynahaglish, in the patronage of Sir Edward Denny, Bart.: the rectory is inappropriate in the Denny family. The tithe rent-charge of Ballynahaglish is £173. 1. 6., and the total rent-charge received by the incumbent from the union is £550. 3. The church, built in 1619, is situated on an eminence thence called Church-hill, a little to the east of Chapeltown; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £127 for its repair. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £100 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1741; it adjoins the church, and commands fine views of the bays of Tralee and Brandon, and the Dingle mountains. The glebe comprises 30 statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Ardfer; the chapel, situated in the village of Chapeltown, is in a very dilapidated condition.

BALLYNAHAGLISH, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Ballina; containing 5397 inhabitants. This place derived its name, signifying in the Irish language "the Town of the Church," from an ancient abbey or other religious establishment, of which there are some slight remains, though nothing of its history is recorded. The parish is situated on the west bank of the river Moy, which is navigable here and is celebrated for its salmon; and comprises $12,658\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. The system of agriculture is improved: there is a very extensive tract of bog, a great portion of which is reclaimable; also abundance of limestone, sandstone, and granite, the last quarried for building and for mending the roads. Ballynahaglish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, and is part of the union of Ardagh or Kilmoremoy; the rectory is inappropriate in the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge is £225, payable in moieties to the impropricators and the vicar. The church is in ruins; the glebe is small, and there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Backs, which comprises also the parish of Kilbelfad, and contains two chapels, one in each parish. There is an ancient burial-ground in the townland of Ballynahaglish, and another at Killeen, which is unconsecrated, and is appropriated to the interment of infants dying before baptism. The parish also contains the remains of an ancient castle called Castle-Mac Andrew; several cromlechs; numerous encampments; and, at Gortnadderra, a curious cave.

BALLYNAHOWN, a village, in the parish of KILLALEAGH, union of ATHLONE, barony of CLONLONAN, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S.) from Athlone, on the road to Parsonstown: the population is returned with the parish. It was for more than nine centuries the residence of the Malone family, whose ancient mansion, built on the site of an old castle and now unoccupied, is the principal object of interest. The estate, together with the family mansion, called Ballynahown House, has passed into other hands. Here is a constabulary police station.—See KILLALEAGH.

BALLYNAKILL, a parish, in the union of CLIFDEN, barony of BALLYNAHINCH, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (N.) from Clifden; containing 7998 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the bay of the same name on the western coast, and comprehends within its limits Claggin bay, and one side of Killery harbour, with the islands of Ilane-a-green or Crump, Innisbruin, Bradilan, and Freshillan; also the loughs Fee and Kylemore, and part of that of Inagh. It comprises $49,052\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. The male inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture, and occasionally in the herring-fishery; the females are occupied in spinning woollen-yarn and knitting stockings. During the famine that prevailed on this part of the coast in 1831, the people were reduced to the greatest distress, and 1500 families must have perished but for the prompt relief afforded. At Derry-Inver, within the bay of Ballynakill, a small pier has been erected by government, which has proved very useful for trade and the fisheries, and has contributed much to the improvement of the surrounding district. The entrance to Claggin bay is easy, the ground clean and good, and the shelter tolerable, with depth of water sufficient for any ship. On the south side, the late Board of Fisheries constructed a small pier opposite to the anchorage ground, which has been found to be very beneficial. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, with the rectories and vicarages of Omev or Umma, Moyrus, and Ballindoon, and the six vicarages of Ennisboffin, Killanin, Arranmore, Arranbeg, Ennis-main, and Ennisher, episcopally united in 1667, forming altogether the union of Ballynakill, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of Ballynakill is £48. 9. 3., and the whole union produces to the incumbent a rent-charge of £202. 15. 3. The church of the union is situated in the parish of Omev, and was built by aid of a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1819. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £337 and a loan of £75 from the same Board, in 1816: the glebe, which is likewise in Omev, comprises 40 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also Ennisboffin, and containing three chapels, situated respectively at Ballynakill, Coilmore, and Ennisboffin: in this parish, divine service is also performed at a house in Tully.

BALLYNAKILL, a parish, in the barony of HALF-BALLYMOE, poor-law union of ROSCOMMON, counties of GALWAY and ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Roscommon; containing 4998 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the road from Roscommon to Dunmore, and comprises 14,578 statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and forms part of the union of Donamon; the rectory is inappropriate in Viscount Ranelagh. The tithe rent-charge is £172. 17. 6., payable in moieties to the impropricator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballynakill is the head of a district, called Glinsek and Kilcroan, which comprises the parishes of Ballynakill, Clonigormican, Ardclare, Oran, and Kilcroan, and contains two chapels, one of them situated at Glinsek, in this parish.

BALLYNAKILL, a parish, in the union of LOUGH-REA, barony of LEITRIM, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Portumna; containing, with the town of Woodford, 14,373 inhabitants. This parish lies on the road from Portumna to Gort, and comprises 59,606 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. The residence of Marhle Hill, formerly Gortnacappogue, is finely situated in a demesne extensively wooded, commanding several interesting views, and distinguished by its great variety of surface; in the grounds is a spring called Macdaff's well, within a few yards of which are vestiges of a stone altar. Fairs are held on the 1st of June and 26th of October. Ballynakill is a rectory, in the diocese of Clonfert, partly appropriate to the see and deanery, and partly forming a portion of the union of Lickmolassy: the tithe rent-charge is £224. 16. 4., of which £38. 1. 6. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £9. 9. 3. to the dean, and the remainder to the incumbent. The parish church is at Woodford; it was built in 1821, by aid of a loan from the Board of First Fruits, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £213 for its repair. The glebe at Ballynakill comprises 6a. 3r. In the Roman Catholic divisions, the greater part of the parish is divided into two entire benefices, called Ballynakill and Woodford, and the remainder forms part of a third: there are chapels at Cloncoo, Loughcorick, Marble Hill, Knockadrian, and Woodford; the last erected in 1837, at a cost of £400. Here are the ruins of an old castle, which appears to have been of great strength; and numerous forts. In the demesne of Marble Hill is a subterranean passage, now so choked up with reeds and other obstructions as to render it difficult to ascertain its extent; and there are numerous vestiges of antiquity in the grounds. At Ballinagar, about a mile and a half from the village, are Mullins Wells, formerly much visited during the summer, the ground around them being tastefully laid out.—See WOODFORD.

BALLYNAKILL, a parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, barony of COOLESTOWN, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Edenderry, on the road to Tullamore; containing 1079 inhabitants. It comprises 6760½ statute acres: about one-fourth part of the profitable land is arable, and the remainder is partly meadow and partly pasture; there are large tracts of bog, besides a considerable quantity that is exhausted: the state of agriculture is good. The Grand Canal passes through the parish, and there are limestone-quarries within its limits. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, united to the rectory of Clonsast; the rectory is inappropriate in Richard Garden, Esq. of Bath. The tithe rent-charge of Ballynakill is £118. 7. 9., of which £69. 4. 8. are payable to Mr. Garden, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Edenderry, and partly in that of Clonsast or Clombollogue. Here are the ruins of the ancient castle of Purefoy, one of the numerous small square buildings erected in this part of the country to protect the English pale.

BALLYNAKILL, a parish, in the poor-law union of SLIGO, barony of TIRAGHRILL, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 9 miles (S. E.) from Sligo; containing 1906 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Sligo to Ballyfarnon, and is intersected by the small river Dubglass, which at Roekbrook forms several cascades, and passes under a natural bridge of one arch, 6 feet high and 20 feet in the span. It comprises 4589½ statute acres: the land is good, but is chiefly under the old unimproved system of tillage; there is a large extent of bog, and limestone abounds in the parish. Petty-sessions are held at Sowe every third Tuesday. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and till lately formed part of the union of Boyle; the rectory was till lately appropriate to the prebend of Kilmacallane in the cathedral of Elphin. The tithe rent-charge is £62. 6., payable in moieties to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the vicar. The Protestant inhabitants attend the church in the parish of Ballysumaghan. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballynakill is the head of a district, called Sowe, which comprises also the parishes of Ballysumaghan and Kilross; the chapel is a thatched building in very indifferent repair, situated at Sowe. At Carrickcoola are some inconsiderable remains of an old castle. On the lands of Ballynakill is a holy well, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, to which the peasantry resort on Sept. 8th, to perform certain devotions; and near it is a large rock, in which there are several natural caverns of very small dimensions.

BALLYNAKILL, a parish, in the poor-law union of WATERFORD, barony of GAULTIER, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Waterford; containing, with Little Island in the river Suir, 639 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the road from Waterford to Passage and Dunmore, commanding a beautiful view of the city, with the vessels on the river Suir, which encircles Little Island with a wide but shallow channel on the north, and a narrow winding stream of greater depth on the south. It comprises about 1877 statute acres, nearly all arable land. Of this number the island contains about 290 acres, forming a delightful spot embracing a fine prospect of the adjacent counties of Kilkenny and Wexford, terminated by the lofty and picturesque mountains of Urry and Slieve Kielta. On the island is a comfortable farmhouse, near which is an old castle, supposed to have been erected in the sixteenth century: it is a strong square building with lofty battlements, having a small pointed entrance archway, above which is an oriel window, with some rude sculpture; a staircase, faintly lighted by loopholes, leads to the summit, from which the view is singularly grand and extensive. In the parish are several gentlemen's seats: the principal are, May Park, pleasantly situated near the banks of the Suir, and commanding some fine views; and Mount Pleasant, a handsome residence near the high road. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Waterford, with the vicarages of Ballygunner, Kilmaclean, and Kilmacomb episcopally united, together forming the union of Ballynakill, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate to the Dean and Chapter of Waterford. The tithe rent-charge of Ballynakill is £104. 7. 8., of which £63. 1. 2. are payable to the dean and chapter, and the remainder to the vicar; the whole union produces a vicarial rent-charge of £183. 16. 2. The church, a neat edifice with a spire, was built in 1815, by aid of a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. There is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of St. John's, Waterford. A Protestant school was endowed with lands by Bishop Foy, and a number of boys are boarded and educated, and at a proper age apprenticed, with its funds.

BALLYNAMALLARD, a village, in the parish of MAGHERACROSS, union of ENNISKILLEN, barony of TYRKENEADY, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, 5½ miles (N. by E.) from Enniskillen, on the road to Omagh; containing 74 houses and 376 inhabitants. It is a constabulary police station; and a monthly fair has been recently established, which is held on the 6th of each month. There is a letter-receiver under Enniskillen and Omagh. The parish church, lately erected, is in the village; and there are also places of worship for Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists, and a dispensary.—See MAGHERACROSS.

BALLYNAMONA, or MOORTOWN, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of SMALL COUNTY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N.E.) from Bruff; containing 587 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Hospital to Pallas-Greine, and comprises 1498 statute acres; the land is in general remarkably good, resting upon a substratum of limestone, through which appear some small rocks of basalt. About one-fourth is under tillage, and the remainder is meadow and pasture, with more than 100 acres of turbary, which affords excellent fuel; the system of agriculture is improved. Ballynamona is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, and is part of the union of Aney; the rectory is inappropriate in Edward Deane Freeman, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £98.5., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Hospital and Herbertstown. On the banks of a small stream, close to the road, are the remains of a castle built by the Raleighs in the reign of Elizabeth; and not far from it are the ruins of the old parish church.

BALLYNAMUDDAGH, a village, in the parish of BALLYMUSKARD, union of ENNISCORTHY, barony of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (W.S.W.) from Oulart; containing 205 inhabitants. It is situated on the road to Ballaghkeen.

BALLYNARD, or CAHIRFOSSORGE, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of SMALL COUNTY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (N.E. by N.) from Bruff, on the road from Limerick to Hospital; containing 918 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1442 statute acres; the land is in general good, resting on a substratum of limestone, except in some few places where the basalt rises in gentle knolls. Ballynard is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, and is part of the union of Aney; the rectory is inappropriate in Edward Deane Freeman, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £111.13.6., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Hospital and Herbertstown, in which latter place is the chapel for this parish. Not far from the chapel are the ruins of the old church; and on a hill are the remains of Ballynard Castle, built by the Geraldines in the fifteenth century, and for many years the residence of the Ballynard branch of that powerful family. At Eaglestown are some remains of the family mansion of the Powells.

BALLYNASCARTHY.—See BALLYMACARTHY.

BALLYNASCREEN, a parish, in the barony of LOUGHINSHOLIN, union of MAGHERAFELT, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the market and post town of Draperstown-Cross, 8884 inhabitants. This appears to have been a place of importance at a very early period; frequent notice of it occurs in the Trias Thaumaturga and other ancient records, though it is neither mentioned in the Monasticon nor in the Visitation of 1693, which includes every other parish in the neighbourhood. The original church, the ruins of which are situated in a romantic and sequestered glen among the mountains, is said to have been founded by St. Patrick, and subsequently consecrated by St. Columba as a parochial church. The parish is intersected by the river Moyola, which has its sources amidst the mountain regions of Slieve Gullion, Moneyneeny, and Slieve Dovin, which extend into the county of Tyrone, where they meet the Munterloney range. It comprises 32,492 statute acres, whereof two-thirds are mountain, waste, and bog. Part of the parish belongs to the Drapers' Company of London, part to the representative of the Skinners' Company, and part to the see of Derry. The soil is various: around Draperstown-Cross, and on the banks of the Moyola, it is a deep gravel and sand, and in an excellent state of cultivation, producing good crops of wheat, flax, oats, and potatoes, and some barley, but on the higher grounds the chief crops are flax, oats, and potatoes. The freestone here is of superior quality, and is extensively worked for building. Manganese has been found in detached nodules in several of the mountain streams; and Boate, in his Natural History, states that gold has been also discovered here. The inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture, with which they combine the weaving of linen and dealing in cattle, great numbers of which are bred on the mountains, and exported to England and Scotland.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £468. The church, a large edifice in the early English style, is situated at Draperstown-Cross, and was erected in 1760, principally through means of the Earl of Bristol, then Bishop of Derry; the tower and handsome octagonal spire were added in 1792, aided by contributions from Sir William Rowley, Bart., and the Drapers' Company, the latter of whom gave £50. This edifice is now being considerably enlarged by the addition of transepts and a vestry-room, through the exertions of the Rev. Samuel Montgomery, the present rector, who has himself contributed £400. At Cavanragh is a second church, built and endowed by Judge Turrens, and to which are attached a comfortable residence for the curate, and a glebe of 14 acres given by John Stevenson, Esq. The glebe-house of the parochial benefice is a handsome residence, built in 1762, at an expense exceeding £1700; and the glebe lands comprise 523 plantation acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are chapels at Moneyneeny and Straw. The ruins of the old church are highly interesting, and there are numerous other relics of antiquity, particularly cromlechs, of which there were formerly five within the limits of the parish.—See DRAPERSTOWN-CROSS.

BALLYNASLANEY, a parish, in the union of ENNISCORTHY, partly in the barony of EAST SHELMALIER, but chiefly in that of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (S. by E.) from Enniscorthy; containing 1061 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the eastern bank of the river Slaney, and on the coach-road from Wexford to Enniscorthy; it comprises 2554½ statute acres. A small portion is marshy, but by far the greater portion is good arable and pasture land. The river is navigable for vessels of large burthen as far as Poodlarragh, in this parish, at which place the contemplated canal to Enniscorthy, a distance of six and a half British miles, will commence, according to the proposed plan. Bal-lynaslaney is an inappropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Edermine; the rectory is inappropriate partly in the Earl of Portsmouth and partly in the Representatives of Walter Redmond, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £121. 3., of which £79. 12. are payable to the impropricators, and the remainder to the curate. The church, of which even the ruins have been removed, must have been originally a handsome structure; a very fine Norman doorway, formerly a part of it, has been inserted in the church of Kilpatrick at Saunders-court. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is within the district of Oylgate, in the parish of Edermine, where stands the chapel.

BALLYNAULTIG, or KILSHANNAH, a parish, in the poor-law union of FERMoy, barony of BARRYMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, adjacent to Rathcormac; containing 1404 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Kilshanahan, is situated on the road from Cork to Rathcormac, and comprises 4842 statute acres: the soil is for the greater part strong and shallow, but is more fertile near the river Bride, which abounds with excellent trout. Ballynaultig is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, forming part of the union and corps of the prebend of Killaspigimullane in the cathedral of St. Finbarr, Cork: the tithe rent-charge is included in that for Killaspigimullane. There is now no church, but there is an old burial-ground within or near which the church is supposed to have been situated. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Watergrass-Hill.

BALLYNEE, a village, in the parish of NOBBER, union of Kells, barony of MORGALLION, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W.) from Nobber; containing 147 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Kells to Nobber.

BALLYNEEN, a village, in the parish of BALLYMONEY, union of DUNMANWAY, Eastern Division of the barony of EAST CARBERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (W. S. W.) from Bandon; containing 670 inhabitants. This village is situated on the mail-coach road from Bandon to Dunmanway, and on the north bank of the river Bandon, over which is a spacious bridge of ten arches: it consists of one principal street, with a shorter street branching from it towards the bridge, and contains 117 houses, the greater number of which are tolerably well built. A few of the inhabitants are employed in the weaving of coarse linens for home consumption, and in the manufacture of cotton-cord; but the greater number are engaged in agriculture. A constabulary police force has been stationed here; and district petty-sessions are held in a court-house, generally every alternate Monday. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists; also a dispensary, which annually affords relief to more than 5000 patients of the neighbourhood.—See BALLYMONEY.

BALLYNEETY, a village, in the parish of CANERNARRY, union of LIMERICK, barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Limerick; containing 231 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Limerick to Six-mile-bridge.

BALLYNEFAGH, or BALLINAFAGH, a parish, in the barony of CLANE, poor-law union of NAAS, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (W. N.

W.) from Clane, on the road to Edenderry; containing 929 inhabitants. It is nearly surrounded by the bog of Clashaghbane, and comprises 4154 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, and in the patronage of the Crown; the tithe rent-charge is £78. 15. The church was built in 1831, by a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was erected at the same time, by a gift of £400, and a loan of £300, from that Board; the glebe comprises 14 acres.

BALLYNEMARA, or BALLINAMARA, a parish, in the barony of CRANAGH, union of KILKENNY, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Freshford, on the road from Kilkenny to Jobstown; containing 915 inhabitants. It comprises 3839 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres of tolerably good land, of which about two-thirds consist of pasture, and one-third is under tillage. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Canice, Kilkenny, to whom the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £180, of which £120 are payable to the appropriators, and £60 to the vicar. The church is a plain building, erected in 1826, by a grant of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe consists of $9\frac{1}{2}$ acres; there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Freshford. The late Robert Lanigan, Esq., bequeathed £100 for the erection of two houses for two poor widows, each to have a small annual allowance.

BALLYNOCHEN.—See WELLS.

BALLYNOCKEN, a village, in the parish of FENNAGH, union of CARLOW, barony of IDRONE EAST, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Myshall; containing 32 houses and 170 inhabitants.—See FENNAGH.

BALLYNOE, a parish, in the union of FERMoy, barony of KINNATALOON, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Tallow; containing 2566 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the old road from Castlemartyr to Fermoy, and comprises 7716 statute acres, of which 50 are woodland, 1500 bog, and the remainder arable and pasture. The land consists of a light soil resting on clay-slate, but is in general tolerably fertile: the principal manure is lime brought from the vale of the Bride. Ballynoe is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, the former united from time immemorial to the rectory of Abern, and the latter united to the vicarage of Knockmourne: the tithe rent-charge is £687. 7., of which two-thirds are payable to the rector, and one-third to the vicar. There is a glebe of $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres, but no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Knockmourne, also called Ballynoe: the chapel, situated in the village, is a large plain building, erected in 1835. A little to the south-east of the village are the ruins of the parish church; and near them are other extensive ruins, supposed to be the remains of an establishment founded by the Knights Hospitalers, to whom the rectory anciently belonged.

BALLYNORANE.—See AGLISHDRINGH.

BALLYNURE, a parish, in the union of LARNE, barony of LOWER BRESTAL, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (N. W.) from Carrickfergus; containing, with part of the town of Ballyclare, 3469 inhabitants, of whom 380 are in the village. This parish, which is situated on the Six-mile-water, and on the route from Carrickfergus to Antrim, comprises 8540½ statute acres. The soil is fertile, and the lands are generally in a good state of cultivation; the system of agriculture is improving: there is, however, still some waste land, and a considerable tract of bog. A kind of basaltic stone is quarried, and used for building and for repairing the roads. There is an extensive bleach-green; also a large mill, in which the most improved machinery is used for the manufacture of the finer kinds of paper. Fairs for cattle, pigs, and pedlery are held on the 15th of May, Sept. 4th, and Oct. 20th; there are large horse fairs in May and November, and at Christmas, at Reagh Hill; and fairs are likewise held at Ballyclare, which see. In the village is a constabulary police station; and a manorial court is held every third week by the seneschal, for the recovery of debts to the amount of £10. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, united by charter of the 7th of James I. to the vicarages of Kilroot and Templecorran, together constituting the corps of the prebend of Kilroot in the cathedral of Connor: the tithe rent-charge of Ballynure is £247. 10. The church, a plain small edifice, built about the year 1602, is situated near the western extremity of the parish. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Larne and Carrickfergus. There is a place of worship in the village for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. The late Mr. Dobbs, of Castle Dobbs, bequeathed £100, the interest to provide winter clothing for the poor.

BALLYNURE, a parish, in the union of BALTINGLASS, barony of UPPER TALBOTSTOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.W.) from Dunlavin, on the road from Balinglass to Ballitore; containing 1718 inhabitants. It comprises 7404½ statute acres, nearly all arable land; the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture improving. There is neither bog nor waste; fuel is consequently scarce, and the inhabitants are supplied only from the bog of Narraghmore, five miles distant. Ballynure House is an elegant mansion situated in a rich demesne. Grange-Con, formerly the grange of the abbey of Balinglass (which, together with this estate, was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir J. Harrington), was till lately the residence of H. Harrington, Esq., who erected two spacious galleries for the reception of paintings and curiosities, of which he was an indefatigable collector. A constabulary police force has been stationed at the small village of The Grange. Ballynure is a rectory, annexed to that of Balinglass, in the diocese of Leighlin: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £225. The church, a small neat edifice with a square tower crowned with pinnacles, was erected by aid of a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1814. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Balinglass; the chapel is at The Grange. In the grounds of Grange-Con are the remains of a castle; there are a rath and an ancient cemetery on the grounds of Knockrigg, and several other raths in different parts of the parish.

BALLYORGAN, a village, in the parish of KILFLYN, union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (S.E.) from Kilmallock, on the road to Kildorrery; containing 53 houses and 334 inhabitants. The parochial Roman Catholic chapel is situated here; and not far distant are the parish church, the glebe-house, and the parochial schools.—See KILFLYN.

VOL. I.—153

BALLYOUGHTERA, a parish, in the union of MIDDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with part of the market and post town of Castlemartyr, 1729 inhabitants. This parish comprises, with Cabirultan, 4532 statute acres: the state of agriculture is on some farms improved, but on others is very backward. A considerable portion is comprised within the park of Castlemartyr, and is either laid out in ornamental grounds or devoted to pasture. The eastern part, including a portion of the town, is richly adorned with wood and in a good state of cultivation; and contains several elegant seats, whereof the principal is Castlemartyr, that of the Earl of Shannon, which is described under the head of that town. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, consolidated with the rectory of Cabirultan, and united by act of the 9th of Anne, cap. 12, to the vicarage of Imogeely or Mogely: the three parishes together constitute the union of Castlemartyr and corps of the prebend of Cabirultan, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithes, embracing the entire union, amounted, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, to £435. 12. 7., and the entire value of the prebend was returned at £523. 15. The church, situated in the town of Castlemartyr, is a neat building, in a spacious plot of ground surrounded by lofty elms. The glebe-house, in Imogeely, was erected by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £1350, in 1815, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 13 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Imogeely or Castlemartyr, at the former of which is a chapel; and there is another chapel on the border of the parish, near Ballintowlas. In the demesne of Castlemartyr, and near its south-eastern boundary, are the ruins of the old parish church, which was built in 1549, and destroyed in the war of 1641. The ruins of the ancient castle of Imokilly, from which the barony derives its name, afterwards called Ballymartyr Castle, and now Castlemartyr, are in this parish, as are also the ruins of the castle of Ballintowlas; and near the latter is an extensive lake.

BALLYOVEY, a parish, in the union of BALLINROBE, barony of CARRA, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6½ miles (N. by W.) from Ballinrobe; containing 4505 inhabitants. This parish, which is pleasantly situated on the borders of Loughs Mask and Carra, and on the high road from Castlebar to Ballinrobe, comprises 27,622 statute acres. The surface is mountainous, and there are extensive tracts of bog; the lands now in cultivation are principally under tillage. The scenery is boldly varied: in the bosom of the mountains is Tarmacaday, a summer lodge; and Partree, another residence, is beautifully situated on Lough Carra. Ballyovey is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, formerly partly appropriate to the prebend of Killabegs in the cathedral of St. Mary, Tuam, and still partly included in the union of Burris-carra: the tithe rent-charge is £121. 10., of which £104. 1. are payable to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms a separate benefice, called Partree; there are two chapels, one at Partree, a small thatched building, and the other in the mountains at Ballybannon, a spacious slated edifice.

BALLYPATRICK.—See RATHPATRICK.

BALLYPHILIP, a parish, in the poor-law union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Portaferry, 3086 inhabitants. This parish is situated between Strangford Lough and the eastern coast, and comprises 2430 statute acres. The land is fertile, and, with the exception of about 30 acres of bog, called Ballygarraoghan Moss, which supplies the inhabitants with fuel, is in a good state of cultivation. Within the limits of the parish is Carney or Kerney Point, off which are two dangerous shoals, Carney Pladdy and Butter Pladdy. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, with the vicarage of Ballytrustin and the rectory of Slaines united by charter in the 7th of James I.: the three parishes constitute the union of Ballyphilip and the corps of the chancellorship of Down, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of Ballyphilip is £156. 12. 6. The church, situated in the town of Portaferry, is a neat edifice, erected in 1787, at a cost of nearly £900, of which £500 were a loan of the Board of First Fruits; it has been repaired by a grant of £343 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built in 1818, at an expense of £1090, of which £825 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits, and £265 were added by the incumbent, and made chargeable on his successors: the glebe comprises 15 Cunningham acres. The union of Ballyphilip formerly comprised a fourth parish; but in 1831 it was recommended by the Commissioners of Ecclesiastical Inquiry, that the parish of Ardglass, being seven miles distant, and in which a perpetual curacy of small value had been erected, should be severed from the union, and an equivalent given to the chancellor. This recommendation has been carried into effect, and there are now only three parishes, as above stated, producing to the incumbent a total rent-charge of £388. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the districts of Lower and Upper Ardes, which latter is united to part of Ardekeen, to Witter, Ballytrustin, Slaines, and Ardguin; there are two chapels, one near Portaferry, a spacious and handsome edifice, and the other at Witter, three miles distant. There are also places of worship at Portaferry for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and for Wesleyan Methodists. A bequest of £3 per annum to the poor, by one of the Bangor family, is charged on the Castle Ward estate. An ancient church, which, according to tradition, belonged to a wealthy abbey, formerly occupied the site of the present glebe-house, near which human bones, tombs, and extensive foundations are frequently dug up. Bankmore, a large and perfect rath, and a smaller fort at Ballytrustin, are within the parish. The late Marquess of Londonderry received the rudiments of his education in the glebe-house, under Dr. Sturrock, then chancellor of Down, and incumbent of this parish.—See PORTAFERRY.

BALLYPOREEN, a village, in the parish of TEMPLEKENNY, union of CLOGHEEN, barony of IFFA and OFFA WEST, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W.S.W.) from Clogheen, on the road from Cork to Dublin; containing 142 houses and 772 inhabitants. Fairs are held on May 12th, Aug. 21st, and Dec. 17th. It is a constabulary police station; and a court is held for the manor, which is the property of the Earl of Kingston, since whose accession the village has been much improved. The parish church, recently erected; the Roman Catholic chapel; and a dispensary, are situated here. There is a mineral spring of some repute.

BALLYQUIN, a village, in the parish of CLOGHANE, union of TRALEE, barony of CORRAGUINNEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER; containing 193 inhabitants. It is situated on the western coast, and is a coast-guard station.

BALLYRAGGET, or DONOUGHMORE, a post-town and parish, in the union of KILKENNY, barony of PASADINING, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 8 miles (N. by W.) from Kilkenny, and 5½ (S. W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 2609 inhabitants, of whom 1577 are in the town. This place appears to have derived its origin from a castle belonging to the Butler family, which in 1600 was garrisoned by the forces of Sir George Carew, Lord-President of Munster, when the sons of Lord Mountgarret, to whom it then belonged, were in rebellion against the crown, and had engaged with O'Moore to arrest the Earl of Ormonde. Previously to this period it had been a favourite residence of the celebrated Lady Margaret Fitzgerald, Countess of Ormonde, who is said to have frequently issued from the castle at the head of her armed retainers, to ravage the property of such of the neighbouring families as she deemed to be her enemies. In 1619, James I. constituted this place a manor, and granted to its lord, Richard, then Viscount Mountgarret, the privilege of holding two fairs. During the Whiteboy disturbances, the castle was appropriated as a barrack for the use of the military stationed in the district.

The town is situated on the road from Kilkenny to Durrow, and on the river Nore, over which is a good stone bridge of 10 arches; it consists of one principal street, with several smaller streets diverging from it, and contains 292 houses. A sub-post office is connected with Durrow and Castlemoore. Fairs are held on Feb. 30th, April 20th, June 22nd, Sept. 4th, Oct. 20th, and Dec. 10th; and additional fairs, recently established, are held on Jan. 11th, March 14th, May 9th, and July 22nd. Here is a station of the constabulary police; a manor court is held occasionally, and petty-sessions irregularly. The parish comprises 5270 statute acres; there is a quarry of hard black limestone. In the immediate vicinity of the town is Ballyragget Lodge, formerly the seat of the Butlers of Ballyragget, which family became extinct on the demise of the Right Rev. Dr. J. Butler, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel: the mansion is a fine building, and in the demesne are the remains of Ballyragget Castle, in a good state of preservation. The parish is in the diocese of Ossory; the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Ormonde, and the vicarage is part of the union of Odogh. The tithe rent-charge is £142. 10. of which £90 are payable to the impropricator, and £52. 10. to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballyragget is the head of a district, which comprises the parishes of Ballyragget, Ballyouiskill, Rosconnel, and Attanagh, and parts of those of Durrow, Abbeyleix, Freshford, Burnchurch, and Kilmocar; there are two chapels, one at Ballyragget and one at Attanagh.

BALLYRASHANE, or ST. JOHN'S-TOWN, a parish, in the union of COLERAINE, partly in the barony of LOWER DUNLUCK, county of ANTRIM, but chiefly in the north-east liberties of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N. E.) from Coleraie; containing 9658 inhabitants. This parish, which is intersected by a range of hills running north and south, is situated on the road from Coleraie to Ballycastle; and comprises 6360½ statute acres; 2689 are in the county of ANTRIM, and the remainder in the county of LONDONDERRY. The greater portion of the land is fertile, and in a high state of cultivation; wheat and barley have been introduced since the year 1829, and are grown with great success. There are detached portions of bog, affording a good supply of fuel. Vast quantities of basalt are raised; and in a geological point of view the parish is very interesting, containing beautiful specimens of amorphous, columnar, and divaricated basalt, which are found here in all their varieties, accompanied with chalcodony, opal, zeolite, and other fossils; it abounds also with botanical specimens of considerable interest. The inhabitants are principally employed in the weaving of linen-cloth. The living is now a rectory and a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory was in the corps of the chancellorship until 1831, when, on the death of the then chancellor, it was united to the vicarage, which had been previously held in conjunction with that of Ballywillin. The tithe rent-charge is £262. 10. The church is a plain small edifice, in the later English style, erected by aid of a grant of £900 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1826. The glebe-house, nearly adjoining it, was built in 1828: there is a glebe of 31½ acres, statute measure. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Coleraie. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, one at Kirkstown, and the other at Ballywatt. On the hills are four Danish forts, from which the townlands whereon they are situated derive their denominations, namely, Lisnarick or Kingsforth, Lisnisk or Snipesforth, Lisnagalt or Catsforth, and Liswatty or Waltersforth. At Revellagh are the ruins of a castle and fort. There are also some extensive artificial caverns at Ballyvarten, Island Effrick, and Ballynock; the first has four rooms or cells, 5 feet high and 2½ feet wide, having the sides formed of unbewn stones and the roof of large flat stones.

BALLYROAN, a market-town and a parish, in the union of ABBEYLEIX, barony of CULLINAGH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N. E.) from Abbeyleix, on the road from Stradbally to Durrow; containing 3689 inhabitants, of whom 657 are in the town. This parish comprises 9689 statute acres, and contains several high hills, the largest of which, Cullinagh, gives name to the barony. The town, which lies low, contains 137 houses; it has a receiving-house for letters, is a constabulary police station, and has a patent for a market. Fairs are held on Jan. 6th, April 2nd, May 15th, the first Wednesday in July, O. S., Aug. 15th, and the second Wednesday in Nov., O. S., chiefly for cattle and pigs. At Cullinagh are some cotton-mills and a boulding-mill, both badly supplied with water; in the former about 50 persons are employed, of whom two-thirds are children. But the inhabitants are chiefly engaged in agriculture: the soil consists of a rich loam and a deep black earth, and is equally productive under tillage and in dairy husbandry. The system of agriculture is improving; there is but a small tract of bog, not more than sufficient to supply the inhabitants with fuel. The dairy lands are sometimes appropriated to the fattening of black-cattle. Limestone is quarried principally for burning; and grit flagstone is found in the mountains. A thin stratum of coal has been discovered, but has not been worked, though there is a mineral vein near it; much of the same kind of coal is found in the mountain of Cullinagh, where works were commenced, but have been discontinued some years. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £311. 10. 9. The church is a neat plain edifice in good repair. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the district of Abbeyleix; the chapel is a small edifice. In the village is a school endowed with lands in Cappaloughlan, bequeathed by Alderman Preston: the school-house is a large slated building, erected at an expense of £500; a number of boys receive a classical and English education. The late eccentric Dr. J. Barrett, vice-provost of Trinity College, was born in the parish; and Sir Jonah Barrington, late judge of the high court of admiralty, and author of Personal Sketches of His Own Times, and other works relating to Ireland, resided at Cullinagh.

BALLYROBERT, an extinct parish, now in the parish of TEMPLEPATRICK, barony of LOWER BELFAST, union and county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (S.) from Ballyclare; containing 291 inhabitants. It is situated on the roads from Carrickfergus to Ballywater and Doagh, and comprises 883½ statute acres.

BALLYRONAN, or PORTBALLYRON, a village, in the district of WOOD'S-CHAPEL, union of MAGHERAFELT, barony of LOUGHINSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (S. E.) from Magherafelt, on the western shore of Lough Neagh. This village was founded by the late Mr. D. Gausson, who, in 1789, built a forge here for manufacturing spades, &c., and soon afterwards erected stores, which led to the building of quays and the formation of a port. A large distillery was erected in 1824, and a brewery in 1830. Vessels of about 50 tons' burthen ply regularly between this port and Belfast and Newry, exporting wheat, fruit, spirits, ale, and freestone, and bringing back barley, timber, slate, iron, wine, and groceries. The village is well situated for trade, as, besides being on Lough Neagh, several roads diverge from it. It is on the estate of the Salters' Company of London, but is at present held by the Marquess of Londonderry and Sir Robert Bateson, Bart., under a lease which will expire about 1852, when the company intend to make extensive improvements. Near it are the ruins of Salterstown Castle and a cromlech.

BALLYROOSKEY, a village, in the parish of CLONDEVADOCK, union of MILFORD, barony of KILMACRENAM, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 12 miles (N. N. W.) from Ramelton; containing 284 inhabitants. It is situated on Sessiagh bay, on the northern coast, where is an island of the same name.

BALLYSADERE, or BALLASODARE, a parish, in the union of SLIGO, partly in the barony of LENEY, but chiefly in that of TIRAGHRILL, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT; comprising the post-town of Collooney and the villages of Ballydryhed and Tubberscanavin, all of which are separately described; and containing 7822 inhabitants, of whom 879 are in the village of Ballysaderere. This place is situated on the road from Boyle to Sligo, and on the Unshion or Ballysaderere river, which issues from Lough Arrow, near Boyle, and is here joined by the Coolaney river; and which, after falling over several ledges of rocks, the last of them ten feet in height, empties itself into an arm of the sea, called Ballysaderere channel. St. Fechin, towards the middle of the seventh century, founded a monastery here, which was richly endowed: in 1179 it was burnt by the men of Moylisha and Moylterary, and in 1188 was again destroyed by fire, but was restored, and existed until the general dissolution, when a lease of it was granted, in the 30th of Elizabeth, for twenty-one years, to Bryan Fitz-William, at an annual rent of £2. 13. 4. The remains are situated above the waterfalls, and consist merely of the outer walls, clothed with ivy. St. Fechin also founded an abbey at Kilnemanagh, which existed till the general suppression, when it was granted to Richard, Earl of Clairieu; there are yet some remains.

The parish comprises 16,025 statute acres, whereof between one-third and one-half are waste and bog; there is little woodland, except from 600 to 700 acres on the Markree estate. The land under cultivation is generally good, but the old system of tillage, though gradually improving, is still mostly practised. There are quarries of excellent limestone, much used for building, and some of it is also hewn into mantel-pieces and other ornamental parts of masonry: a lead-mine, yielding a considerable proportion of silver, was worked a few years since, but has been abandoned. Near it are some chalybeate springs, not used. The village of Ballysaderere, which contains 155 houses, is a place of some little business, and has a receiving-house for letters. The falls on the river afford favourable sites, and a never-failing supply of water, for mills: there is a large corn-mill worked by two wheels of 36-horse power, and employing twenty-five persons; and another on a large scale, with the most approved machinery, was built by Mr. Culbertson in 1835, having two water-wheels of 70-horse power, and employing twenty persons; there are also some smaller corn-mills, and a large bleach mill and green. Vessels of about 100 tons' burthen come up the channel for the exportation of corn and meal: a small pier has been built. Fairs are held at the village on Feb. 8th, May 30th, July 11th, Aug. 4th, Oct. 24th, Nov. 12th, and Dec. 15th; and besides those held at Collooney and Tubberscanavin, the largest fair for horses in the county is held at Carricknagatt, on Feb. 1st. The parish contains a station of the constabulary police. Petty-sessions are held every alternate Thursday at Collooney; and a manorial court is occasionally held there, under the schenchal. Markree, the seat of the Cooper family, is a modern castellated building, situated in the centre of an extensive demesne clothed with wood and spreading into verdant lawns, through which the Unshion pursues a winding course: the gateways leading into the demesne are handsome structures, of ancient English architecture; and in the grounds is a very excellent observatory.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, constituting the corps of the prebend of Ballysaderere, in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is inappropriate in Matthew Baker, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £346. 3., payable in moieties to the impropriator and the incumbent. The church, situated at Collooney, is a handsome building in the ancient English style, and contains some good monuments, one of which, to the memory of Mrs. Cooper, designed at Florence, is a fine piece of sculpture; the edifice was enlarged in 1834, by aid of a gift of £750 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and donations of £800 from Mr. Cooper and £50 from Major O'Hara. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £400, in 1822, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, called Collooney, comprising also the parish of Kilvarnet, and containing three chapels, situated respectively at Collooney and Corrornagh, in Ballysaderere, and at Kilvarnet. On an eminence immediately over the harbour is an ancient burial-ground of considerable extent, still used, and in which are the remains of a church.

BALLYSAX, a parish, in the union of NAAS, partly in the barony of WEST OPHALY, but chiefly in that of EAST OPHALY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Kilcullen-Brigge; containing 1920 inhabitants. This parish is situated within a mile of the great southern road from Dublin to Cork, and comprises 7207 statute acres. The greater portion is under tillage, and the remainder, with the exception of a large tract of bog and waste, is meadow and pasture; the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture improved. Adjoining the parish is the celebrated race-course called the Cnrragh. A fair is held at the French Furze on July 26th. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £139. 10. The church, a neat edifice with a square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles, was erected in 1826, at a cost of £1000, of which £700 were a grant, and £300 a loan, from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built in 1825, by a grant and a loan, each of £400, from the same Board; the glebe consists of 19 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Sanicroft. The Rev. W. Tew bequeathed £50 in the 3½ per cent. for the benefit of the poor.

BALLYSCADANE, a parish, in the poor-law union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Hospital; containing 749 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Gallbally to Hospital, and comprises 944 statute acres; the land is in general of good quality, and chiefly in pasture. Ryves-Castle, with other townlands in this county, was granted by James I. to Colonel Ryves, ancestor of the present proprietor, for services rendered during the civil wars of Scotland. Ballyscadane is a rectory, in the diocese of Emly, united to the entire rectory of Glanbane, and with it constituting the corps of the deanery of Emly, in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £30. 9. 4., and of the whole union £66. 3. The lands of the deanery, called the mensal lands of Gurteen, comprise 179a. 2r. 15p., statute measure, let on lease at £92. 6. 1½. per annum, with an annual renewal fine of £27. 13. 10½.; the entire income of the deanery, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £226. The church has long since fallen into decay: in the churchyard, which is within the demesne of Ryves-Castle, is a handsome monumental obelisk to the family of Ryves. There is no glebe-house in either parish; the glebe comprises 4a. 2r. 36p., and there is also a glebe of 7 acres in the adjoining parish of Galbally. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Emly.

BALLYSCULLION, a grange, in the union of BALLYMENA, barony of TOOME, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (N. W.) from Randalstown; containing 3183 inhabitants. This place, which is an extra-parochial district, never having paid either church cess or tithe, is situated on the road from Portlengone to Antrim, and bounded on the north-west by the river Bann; it comprises 4279½ statute acres. The members of the Established Church formerly attended divine service in the contiguous parish of Doneane, in the diocese of Connor. A curate is now appointed, whose stipend is paid from the Curates' Fund: patron, the Bishop. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballyscullion forms part of the district of Ballyscullion, in the diocese of Derry; the chapel is a small plain building. There is also a place of worship for Presbyterians.

BALLYSCULLION, a parish, in the union of MAGHERAFELT, partly in the barony of UPPER TOOME, county of ANTRIM, but chiefly in that of LOUGHINSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Bellaghy, 6979 inhabitants. This parish is intersected by the roads leading respectively from Castle-Dawson to Portlengone, and from Maghera to Bellaghy; it comprises 12,750½ statute acres, of which 10,617½ are in the county of Londonderry, 2406 are part of Lough Beg, and 72½ part of the river Bann, which here forms the boundary of the parish, barony, and county. On the plantation of Ulster, these lands were granted by James I. to the Irish Society, and by them transferred to the Vintners' Company of London, who founded the castle and town of Bellaghy. At a very early period a monastery was founded on an island in Lough Beg, about two miles from the shore, then called Ynis Teda, but now Church Island, from the parish church having been subsequently erected there: this establishment continued to flourish till the Dissolution, and some of the lands which belonged to it are still tithe-free. Two townlands in the parish are the property of the see of Derry, and the remainder has been leased in perpetuity by the Vintners' Company to the Marquess of Louthian, the Earl of Clan-carty, Lord Strafford, and Sir Thomas Pakenham.

There are from 400 to 450 acres of bog, part of which in summer affords coarse pasture for cattle. A portion of it lying remote from the Bann is of a blackish colour, and capable of cultivation for rye and potatoes; the other part, which from its white colour is called "flour bog," is quite incapable of cultivation till it has been cut away for fuel, when the subsoil appears, varying from 5 to 10 feet in depth. The land generally is fertile, and under the auspices of the North-West Agricultural Society, a branch of which has been established here, is in an excellent state of cultivation; mangel-wurzel, rape, turnips, and other green crops, are being introduced with success. Indications of coal occur in several parts, particularly on the Castle-Dawson estate; but there is no prospect of their being explored or worked while the extensive bogs afford so plentiful a supply of fuel. Of the numerous seats the principal are, Castle-Dawson, the seat of the Right Hon. G. R. Dawson; Bellaghy Castle; Bellaghy House; Fairview; and Rowensgiff. The splendid palace built here by the Earl of Bristol when bishop of Derry, one of the most magnificent in the country, was scarcely finished at his lordship's decease, and was soon after taken down and the materials sold: the only entire portion that has been preserved is the beautiful portico, which was purchased by Dr. Alexander, Bishop of Down and Connor, who presented it to the parish of St. George, Belfast, as an ornament to that church. A small portion of the domestics' apartments, and a fragment of one of the picture galleries, are all that remain here. There are some extensive cotton-mills at Castle-Dawson; also flour, corn, and flax mills; and about a mile above the town is a small bleach-green. Fairs for cattle, sheep, and pigs are held at Bellaghy on the first Monday in every month; and a manorial court is held monthly, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £2.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £262. 10. The church, situated in Bellaghy, is a large and handsome edifice, erected in 1794 on the site of a church built in 1625; it is in the early English style, with a lofty and beautiful octagonal spire erected at the expense of the Earl of Bristol. There is a chapel at Castle-Dawson belonging to the Dawson family, by whom it was built and endowed; it is open to the inhabitants. The glebe-house, about a quarter of a mile from the town, was built in 1760, at a cost of £500; the glebe land consists of 95 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish comprehends the grange of Ballyscullion, in the diocese of Connor: in the union are two chapels, one at Bellaghy and the other in the grange. At Bellaghy are also places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and for Methodists. Here is a dispensary conducted on the most approved plan; and the proprietors of the Bellaghy estate annually distribute blankets and clothes among the poor. The ruins of the old church, on Church Island, are extensive and highly interesting; and close to them, a square tower surmounted by a lofty octangular spire of hewn freestone was erected by the Earl of Bristol, which is a beautiful object in the landscape. A large mis-shapen stone, called Clogh O'Neill, is pointed out as an object of interest; and not far distant is a rock basin, or holy stone, to which numbers annually resort in the hope of deriving benefit from the efficacy of the water in healing diseases.

BALLYSCULLOGUE.—See HORTLAND.

BALLYSEEDY, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Tralee; containing 1472 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the small river Lee, or Leigh, and on the mail-coach road from Tralee to Killarney; it comprises 3489 statute acres. The land is mostly under tillage; the principal crop is oats. Towards the west the parish includes a portion of the Slieveinish mountains; the land there is chiefly coarse mountain pasture, and the parish contains a considerable portion of light bog. About 500 acres of bog and mountain have been planted within the last few years. Limestone abounds, and is extensively used for manure. Ballyseedy House, the handsome residence of Henry Blennerhassett, Esq., is situated in an extensive and richly wooded demesne; and Ballycarthy, the residence of the Rev. Mr. Nash, is pleasantly situated on an eminence commanding a fine view of the country towards the south and east. The river Mang or Maine has its rise east of Castleisland, runs near the parish, and empties itself into Castlemaine bay; it abounds with excellent trout. On the banks of the Lee, which falls into Tralee bay, is a large flour-mill. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardferd and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of Arthur Blennerhassett, Esq., in whom the rectory is impropriate: the vicarial tithes rent-charge is £45. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe, but divine service is performed in the school-house at Farmer's-Bridge: the ruins of the old church, to which a burial-ground is attached, are in the demesne of Ballyseedy. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Ballymac-Eligott. The Wesleyan Methodists assemble for divine worship in a private house.

BALLYSHANNON, a sea-port, market, and post town, the head of a union, and formerly a parliamentary borough, partly in the parish of INNISMACSAINT, but chiefly in that of KILBARRON, barony of TYRUGH, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 35 miles (S. W.) from Lifford, and 102 miles (N. W.) from Dublin; containing 3513 inhabitants. In remote ages this town was called Athacnagh, and the chieftains of Tyrconnell had a castle here, in which Hugh O'Donnell, prince of Tyrconnell, received his son, Hugh Roe, after his escape from the castle of Dublin, in 1592. In 1597 the neighbourhood was the scene of the most important military operations of that period. An English force, consisting of 22 regiments of infantry and 10 of cavalry, under the command of Sir Conyers Clifford, crossed the Erne by a ford, although vigorously opposed by O'Donnell's troops, and succeeded in establishing their headquarters at the monastery of Asharough. Here they received heavy ordnance from Galway by sea, and then laid close siege to the castle of Ballyshannon, but met with an unexpectedly strong resistance, and many of their best officers and men were killed or wounded. After continuing the siege for five days, the English were compelled to make a precipitate retreat, closely pursued by O'Donnell and his allies, and being unable to cross the Erne at the ford by which they had advanced, they tried another that was seldom attempted, where many were killed or drowned. Thus one of the first expeditions into this long independent territory terminated very disastrously. On the grant by James I. of the darldom and country of Tyrconnell to Rory O'Donnell, in 1603, he reserved the castle of Ballyshannon and 1000 circujacent acres. The castle was taken in 1652 by the Earl of Clanricarde.

This town is situated at the head of the harbour of the same name, at the mouth of the river Erne, which is here crossed by a bridge of fourteen arches and divides the town into two parts; that on the south side, in the parish of Innismacsaint, being called the Port of Ballyshannon. It comprises three streets and the suburb of the Port, and contains 688 houses, of which the greater number are on the right bank of the river. Here is an artillery barrack for about 40 men, with stabling for 40 horses. On the left bank of the river are salt-works, and a distillery is carried on extensively. The exports are chiefly corn and other farm produce, and the imports are coal, slate, iron, bark, groceries, &c.: there is a small custom-house. In the Erne is a fine salmon-fishery which produces from 60 to 80 tons annually. The town is favourably situated for commerce and manufactures, having a large population, and a fertile country, around it: it is within four miles of Lough Erne, which embraces an inland navigation of more than fifty miles through the richest part of Ireland; and for purposes of manufacture the river Erne, in a course of four miles, affords numerous sites for mills, having a succession of falls amounting to 140 feet. The surrounding district contains much mineral wealth; a mine of zinc has been discovered at the Abbey, a lead-mine near Bandaron, and rich specimens of copper in the vicinity. The harbour, the entrance to which was formerly obstructed by a bar, has been rendered accessible to vessels of 250 tons' burthen. This great improvement, which will probably render the place a respectable port, was made at the sole expense of Colonel Conolly, who formally resigned any claim on the loan of £5000 sanctioned by the Commissioners of Public Works in furtherance of the undertaking, and who in an exemplary manner has promoted to a great extent the making of roads and the carrying out of other improvements throughout the entire district. The navigation of the river is stopped abruptly by a grand cascade called the Fall, where the whole body of water descending from Lough Erne, in a stream about 150 yards wide, falls about 16 feet with a tremendous roar down a steep cliff into a basin forming the head of the harbour. This cascade is seen to most advantage in winter, when the river is swollen by rains; and at the recess of the tide, the noise of the descending water may be heard many miles off. Plans have been suggested for opening a communication with Lough Erne; among others it has been proposed to avoid the falls, not by cutting a canal, but by forming a railroad to Belleck, which, however, has not been yet carried into effect. The market is held in the market-house on Tuesday and Saturday, for potatoes, pigs, oats, oatmeal, &c.; and fairs are held on the 2nd of every month, except September, when it is held on the 18th. A branch of the Provincial Bank of Ireland has been established, and a chief constabulary police force stationed here: in the exche arrangements the town is within the district of Sligo.

The town was incorporated by a charter of James I., dated March 23rd, 1613; and the corporation was entitled "the Portreeve, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town of Ballyshannon." From the time of its incorporation till the Union, when it was disfranchised, it returned two members to the Irish parliament, and the £15,000 compensation was paid to the Earl of Belmore. Since 1842, the town has been managed by commissioners appointed under the act 9th George IV. cap. 82. A court of record was created under the charter, but has fallen into disuse. A seneschal's court is held once in three weeks under the lord of the manor, having jurisdiction to the amount of 40s.; it was established by charter of James I., dated April 9th 1622, granting large possessions to Henry Folliott, Baron of Ballyshannon. Petty-sessions, also, are held generally once a fortnight. On an eminence called Mullinashee, adjoining the town, stands the parish church of Kilsbaron; and there are two Roman Catholic chapels, two places of worship for Methodists, and one for Presbyterians. The workhouse, on a site of five acres, was completed in 1842, at a cost of £5389, and is constructed for 500 paupers. A small portion of the ruins of the once celebrated castle of the O'Donnells, earls of Tyrconnell, is in the town; and near to it, on the road to Belleek, are a few vestiges of the ancient church of Smivver.

BALLYSHEEHAN, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (N.) from Cashel; containing 3068 inhabitants. It is situated on the coach-road from Dublin, by way of Cashel, to Cork, and comprises 8678 statute acres. There are about 150 acres of bog producing a valuable supply of fuel, and 50 acres of woodland; the remainder is arable and pasture. New Park, the handsome seat of the Pennefather family, is pleasantly situated in a well-planted demesne of 960 statute acres. Fairs are held on May 6th, Aug. 15th, and Dec. 5th; and a constabulary police force is stationed here. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in S. Cooper, Esq.; the tithe rent-charge is £311. 11., of which £199. 1. are payable to the impropriator. This parish is now ecclesiastically united to Erry, the tithes of which are given under that head: a church was lately built, on a site central to both parishes, by means of subscription, aided by a grant of £369 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Boherlahan; the chapel is a neat modern building. Ballytarsney Castle, a lofty square tower, is said to have been built by a person named Hacket, who, according to tradition, was hanged by one of Cromwell's generals, who had gained possession of the tower by treachery.

BALLYSHONBOY.—See KILQUANE, county of LIMERICK.

BALLYSONAN, a parish, in the union of ATHY, partly in the barony of EAST OPHELY, but chiefly in that of WEST OPHELY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (S. W.) from Kilkullen; containing 494 inhabitants. It is situated on the coach-road from Dublin, by way of Cashel, to Cork, and comprises 2815 statute acres, principally under tillage. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, constituting the corps of the prebend of Ballysonan in the cathedral of Kildare, and united by act of council, in 1795, to the rectory of Kilrush, the whole forming the union of Ballysonan, in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge of Ballysonan is £146. 15., and of the entire benefice £322. 17. The church, a plain structure, was built in 1796 by aid of a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £196 for its repair. The glebe contains 25a. 2r. 20p., but there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Sanicroft. Dame Annesley bequeathed the lands of Carrighill, in this parish, for the purpose of establishing and supporting a school.

BALLYSPILLANE, a parish, in the union of MIDDLETON, barony of BARRYMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N. W.) from Middleton; containing 603 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2088 statute acres: it is chiefly under tillage, with but little waste land; the northern part, however, is mountainous, and the soil shallow and but indifferently productive. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and prior to the collation of the present incumbent was part of the union of Middleton and corps of the treasurer'ship in the cathedral of Cloyne, but is now a distinct benefice, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in G. Lukey, Esq., of Middleton. The tithe rent-charge is £171, payable in moieties to the impropriator and the vicar: there is neither glebe nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Middleton. There are some ruins of the parochial church.

BALLYSUMAGHAN, a parish, in the union of SLIGO, barony of TIRAGEBRILL, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Collooney; containing 1902 inhabitants. The French army, after the battle of Collooney, passed close to this place, and encamped the same night within a quarter of a mile from it. The parish is situated on the road from Sligo to Drumana by way of Ballyfarnon, and on the confines of the county; it comprises 4616½ statute acres. The soil is principally a good deep loam, but the state of agriculture, though much improved within the last twenty years, is still very low: there is not much waste land, but a large tract of bog affording a supply of fuel. Here are several quarries of stone, principally limestone of a very fine description, used for building and for burning into lime. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and formed, until lately, part of the union of Boyle; the rectory is partly inappropriate in Viscount Lorton, and, till lately, was partly appropriate to the prebend of Kilmacallane in the cathedral of Elphin. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £55. 7. 9., of which one-half was payable to the prebendary. The church is a neat building, erected in 1829, on a site in the demesne of Castle Neynoe given by Colonel Neynoe, by means of a grant of £669, and a loan of £554, from the Board of First Fruits; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £181 for its repair. Near it is the glebe, consisting of 18 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballysumaghan is included in the district of Sowe. Within the parish are several Danish forts; and in the burial-ground of Culiogoban are the remains of an old church. Numerous fossils are found in the limestone-quarries.

BALLYTANKARD.—See TANKARDSTOWN, county of LIMERICK.

BALLYTARSNEY, a parish, in the union of CARRICK-ON-SUIR, barony of IVER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 6½ miles (E. S. E.) from Carrick-on-Suir; containing 258 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Waterford to Limerick, and comprises 995½ statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and forms part of the union of Clonmore: the tithe rent-charge is £61. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballytarsney forms part of the district of Moncoin. Here are the remains of a square fort, which appears to have been of considerable strength.

BALLYTIVNAN, a village, in the parish of CALRY, union of SLIGO, barony of CARRUBY, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (N.) from Sligo; containing 127 inhabitants. It is situated near Cummee strand, on Sligo bay.

BALLYTOBIN, a parish, in the union of CALLAN, barony of KELLS, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Callan; containing 714 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Callan to Carrick-on-Suir, and comprises 2393 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. Ballytohin House is a place of considerable antiquity, and is situated in a fine demesne abounding with timber of aged growth, with a deer-park attached; there is a sycamore-tree of very large dimensions near the house. Here is a station of the constabulary police. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and forms part of the union of Kells: the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10. The church is a neat edifice with a spire, built by aid of a gift of £300 from the Board of First Fruits in 1839, and one of £400 from A. W. Baker, Esq., who also allows £10 per annum to the parish clerk. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballytohin is part of the district of Donemagan.

BALLYTORE, a post-town or village, in the parish of TIMOLIN, union of NAAS, barony of NARRAGH and RHEBAR EAST, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 13 miles (S. S. W.) from NAAS, and 28 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 80 houses and 441 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the river Griese and on the coach-road from Dublin to Carlow, was, in 1798, taken by the insurgents, in whose possession it remained two days, and by whom it was set on fire. It is conspicuous for the neatness and regularity of its appearance, and is principally inhabited by members of the Society of Friends; it has obtained considerable celebrity from its school, originally established in 1726 by Abraham Shackleton, a member of that society, and in which the celebrated Edmund Burke received the rudiments of his education. Fairs are held on March 10th, Aug. 15th, and Nov. 30th. A constabulary police force has been stationed in the town. There is a place of worship for the Society of Friends, established in 1707; and here are a dispensary and a savings' bank. Mary Lendreiter, daughter of Mr. Richard Shackleton, and author of Cottage Dialogues and other works calculated to improve the social condition of the Irish peasantry, was a native of this place.

BALLYTRAIN, a village, in the parish of AUGHAMMULLEN, union of CASTLE-BLAYNEY, barony of CREMORNE, county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (S.) from Ballibay, on the old road to Shercock; containing 39 houses and 197 inhabitants. It is a station of the constabulary police; and fairs, chiefly for pigs, cattle, and sheep, are held on Feb. 1st, March 17th, May 1st, June 11th, Aug. 1st, Sept. 29th, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 23rd. In 1834 a Roman Catholic chapel was built, at an expense of £100. Here is the lake of Ballytrain, an extensive sheet of water supplying several mills; and in the vicinity are some forts, one of which is of great extent, and commands a view of picturesque scenery, embracing twelve lakes.—See AUGHAMMULLEN.

BALLYTROOLEEN, a village, in the parish of BALLINABOY, union of KINSALE, barony of EAST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, containing 107 inhabitants.

BALLYTRUSTIN, a parish, in the union of DOWN-PATRICK, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 1 mile (S. E.) from Portaferry; containing 754 inhabitants. This parish, which is not noticed in the Down survey, is situated on the eastern coast; and comprises 1681 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres; the soil is fertile, and the lands are all in an excellent state of cultivation, producing abundant crops. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Down, and is part of the union of Ballyphilip and corps of the chancellorship of Down; the rectory is inappropriate in John Echlin, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £142. 13., of which £88. 6. are payable to the impropriator. There are some remains of the ancient church, and the churchyard is the chief burial-place of the Roman Catholic parishioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballytrustin forms part of each of the districts of Lower and Upper Ardes. At Ballyfounder is a very large rath, nearly perfect.

BALLYVALDEN, a parish, in the poor-law union of GOREY, barony of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Gorey; containing 1550 inhabitants. It is situated near the eastern coast, and comprises 3911 statute acres. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, held with the impropriate curacies of Kilmuckridge and Millenagh, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. The tithe rent-charge of Ballyvalden is £134. 11., of which £84. 5. are payable to the impropriator. The church of the union is at Kilmuckridge. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Blackwater.

BALLYVALLOO, an ancient parish, in the union of WEXFORD, barony of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Wexford; containing 892 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the coast of St. George's Channel, and on the old road from Wexford to Dublin; and comprises 1891 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. It is an impropriate curacy endowed with the vicarial tithes, in the diocese of Ferns, and forms part of the union of Ardcolm; the rectorial tithes are the property of the almshouse at Enniscorthy. The entire rent-charge is £86. 11., of which £44. 15. belong to the almshouse, and the remainder is payable to the incumbent; the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Ballyvalloo is included in the Blackwater district. It is not now recognised as a parish in civil matters, but is considered as forming part of the parish of Killyly.

BALLYVARY, or BALLAVARY, a market-town or village, in the parish of KILDEACAMOGUE, union of CASTLEBAR, barony of GALLIN, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Castlebar; containing 116 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Castlebar to Swinford, and near a small river issuing from Lough Cullen. The market is on Wednesday; and fairs are held on May 29th, Aug. 18th, and Nov. 14th. Here is a receiving-house for letters; also a station of the constabulary police; and a Roman Catholic chapel erected on a site given by the Rev. L. Rutledge, of Bloomfield.—See KILDEACAMOGUE.

BALLYVAUGHAN, a village, in the parish of DROMCREEHY, union and barony of BURKEN, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (W.) from New Quay; containing 235 inhabitants. This place is situated on a small bay to which it gives name on the western coast, and opening into the bay of Galway. The village contains 37 houses: some of the inhabitants are employed in the herring-fishery, which is carried on successfully. The bay is very shallow, and in general fit only for boats; but small vessels may anchor in two and a half fathoms of water on good holding ground, about two or three cables' length south of Finvarra Point. There are some remains of an old quay, which is now of little use; a new quay would add greatly to the prosperity of the place, as, independently of the fishery, turf is landed here in great quantities from Connemara for the supply of the neighbouring country. A market for corn and pigs is held weekly on Thursday, and fairs have been established on the 24th of June and 23rd of September. Here is a station of the constabulary police; also a coast-guard station, which is one of the seven that constitute the district of Galway. The road-sessions for the district are held in the village. At a small distance to the east, and near the shore, are some vestiges of the old castle of Ballyvaughan.—See DROMCREEHY.

BALLYVINNY.—See KILLASPIGMULLANE.

BALLYVOURNEY, a parish, in the union of MACROOM, barony of WEST MUSKERRY, county of COCK, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (W. by N.) from Macroom; containing 4466 inhabitants. St. Abban, who lived to a very advanced age and died in 650, founded a nunnery at this place, which he gave to St. Gobasta, who was descended from O'Connor the Great, Monarch of Ireland. Smith, in his History of Cork, notices the church of this establishment, but it has since fallen into decay. The parish, the name of which signifies "the Town of the Beloved," is situated on the river Sullane, and on the road from Cork to Killarney, and comprises 26,603 statute acres. The surface is very uneven, in some parts rising into mountains of considerable elevation, the highest of which is Mullaghanish: about two-fifths are good arable and pasture, and 70 acres woodland. Much of the land has been brought into a state of cultivation by means of a new line of road from Macroom, which passes through the vale of the Sullane, and is now a considerable thoroughfare; and great facilities of improvement have been afforded by other new lines of road that have been made through the parish; but there are still about 16,000 acres of rough pasture and moorland, which might be drained and brought into a state of profitable cultivation. The river Sullane has its source in the parish, in the mountains bordering on the county of Kerry, and, after intersecting it longitudinally, pursues an eastern course through the parish of Clondrohid to the town of Macroom, to the east of which, at the distance of a mile, it discharges itself into the river Lee; there is also a lake called Lough Ivoig. Fairs are held on the 10th of May, July, Sept., and Nov.; and there is a constabulary police station. The living is a rectory and a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne: part of the rectory is comprehended in the union of Clonore and corps of the chancellorship of the cathedral of St. Colman, Cloyne; and part is united to the vicarage, forming the benefice of Ballyvourney, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £548. 16., of which £173. 16. are payable to the chancellor of Cloyne, and £375 to the incumbent. The church is a very neat edifice in the early English style, erected in 1824 by aid of a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built at the same time, at a cost of £600, of which £400 were a grant, and the remainder a loan, from the same Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is one of the three that constitute the district of Kilmeartry; the chapel, a plain and spacious edifice, was built in 1830. The ruins of the coventual church are very extensive and interesting; in one of the walls is a head carved in stone, which is regarded with much veneration. Not far from these ruins is a holy well, much resorted to on the 11th of February, the festival of St. Gubnata, the patroness, and also on Whit-Monday; and near the well is a large stone with a circular basin or font rudely excavated, the water from which is held sacred.

BALLYWALTER, a grange, in the parish of BALLYLINNY, union of ANTRIM, barony of LOWER BELFAST, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER; containing 175 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Carrickfergus to Doagh, and comprises 320½ statute acres.

BALLYWALTER, or WHITECHURCH, a parish, in the union of NEWTOWNARDS, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (N.E.) from Kirkcubbin; containing 1916 inhabitants, of whom 743 are in the village. This parish is on the eastern coast, and, with a detached portion, comprises 3379 statute acres. The village is situated in lat. 54° 32' 20" (N.) and lon. 5° 28' (W.), and is a coast-guard station, forming one of the twelve that constitute the district of Donaghadee. Ballywalter is a vicarage, in the diocese of Down, and is part of the union of St. Andrew's; the rectory is appropriate to the Lord-Primate. The tithe rent-charge is £254. 18. 6., of which £169. 19. are payable to the Primate, and the remainder to the incumbent. On the next avoidance of the benefice of St. Andrew's, this parish will become a separate living, in the patronage of the Primate. In the Roman Catholic divisions it forms part of the district of Lower Ardes. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. Some ruins of the old church yet exist.

BALLYWILLIAM.—See ROCHESTOWN.

BALLYWILLIN, or MILLTOWN, a parish, in the poor-law union of COLERAINE, partly in the barony of LOWER DUNLUCK, county of ANTRIM, but chiefly in the North-East liberties of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 3½ miles (N. by E.) from Coleraine, on the road to Portrush; containing 2202 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the north by the Atlantic Ocean, and comprises 4673½ statute acres, of which 1617 are in the county of Antrim: about 300 are sand, 150 bog, and the remainder arable and pasture. The entire district abounds with fossils and minerals of great variety, and with features of high geological interest. The soil, though various, is generally good; and the lands are in an excellent state of cultivation, particularly where not exposed to the drifting of the sand, which accumulates on the coast near Portrush. There is no waste land, except the sand hills near Portrush: these, from the constant blowing of the north and north-west winds, have overspread a large tract of fine land, which it has been found impossible to reclaim. Much of the bog has been exhausted and brought under cultivation, and there is now barely sufficient for the supply of fuel. The parish contains vast quantities of ironstone: in some places the ore is met with nearly in a metallic state; and in nodules of stone used for making the roads have been found nuclei of almost pure metal. Limestone is very abundant, but is not worked; the extensive quarries in the adjoining parish of Dunluc being held under a lease which prohibits the opening of any other upon the estate. Basalt in every variety is found here in a confused mixture of amorphous basalt with veins of red ochre, chert, soap-stone, and zeolite. In other parts are magnificent columnar masses, the prisms of which are more perfect and more beautiful than those of the Causeway: these columns form part of a bold ridge of hills lying north and south, and displaying some of the finest features of basaltic formation in the island. Bearville, a spacious and handsome mansion, is pleasantly situated, and surrounded with extensive and thriving plantations; and at Portrush are several elegant lodges and pleasing villas, occupied by their respective proprietors during the bathing season. The Skerries, a cluster of islands about a mile from the shore, and containing 246. 1r. 9p., belong to this parish: behind the middle of the largest of them, a vessel may ride well sheltered in from 5 to 7 fathoms of water, and on good holding ground.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop: it was formerly an appendage to the chancellorship of that see, under a grant by James I., at which time a vicarage was instituted; but it again became a rectory under the provisions of Dr. Mant's act, on the death of Dr. Trail in 1831. The tithe rent-charge is £197. 5. The church, a new and handsome structure, is at Portrush: the old church, which is situated here, is said to have been, at the time when it was last used as the parish church, the only one in the diocese or county built prior to the Reformation in which divine service continued to be performed; it has neither tower nor spire, but being situated on an eminence is visible at the distance of several leagues at sea. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1628, gave £450 and lent £140: the glebe consists of 24½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Coleraine. There is a place of worship at Magheraboy for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and at Portrush is one for Wesleyan Methodists. Here are the remains of Ballyreagh, or "the Royal Castle," situated on a promontory having a bold façade of rock rising to the height of 296 feet, the base of which is washed by the Atlantic. Danmull, originally a Druidical circle, afterwards a Danish fort, and now a pasture for sheep, is one of the most curious vestiges of antiquity in the country; and about half a mile to the north-east of the church are the remains of a Druidical circle and altar, with an extensive and well-arranged cave. There is also a Druidical altar near Bearville, in a very perfect state. Fine impressions of the cornua ammonis are found in the chert at Portrush; the cornua and the echinite are found also in the limestone, and every variety of the zeolite and opal is met with in the basaltic or trap formation, with chalcodony, strontium, agate, rock-tallow, and veins of fullers'-earth.

BALNACARRIG.—See BALLINACARRY.

BALRAHAN, or BALRAHAN, a parish, in the union of CELBRIDGE, barony of IREATHY and OUGHTHERY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Maynooth; containing 485 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Kileock to Naas, and comprises 337¼ statute acres, generally divided into small holdings, and chiefly under tillage. The soil is productive, and the system of agriculture improved; there is some good pasture land, producing excellent clover, and fuel is plentiful and cheap. The residence of Rathcoffey House was the property of the late celebrated Archibald Hamilton Rowan. Balrahan is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and is part of the union and corps of the prebend of Donadea in the cathedral of Kildare: the tithe rent-charge is £120. 15. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Clane: the chapel, situated at Rathcoffey, is a neat building. The ancient castle of Rathcoffey was besieged and taken by Colonel Monk, in 1642, when 70 of the garrison were made prisoners, most of whom were executed in Dublin: the only remains are the gateway of the fortress; all the rest was taken down by Mr. Rowan, when he erected the present mansion.

BALRATHBOYNE.—See RATHBOYNE.

BALRODDAN.—See RADDESTOWN.

BALROTHERY, a parish and village, and the head of a union, in the barony of BALROTHERY EAST, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER; containing, with the post-town of Balbriggan, 4681 inhabitants, of whom 386 are in the village. This place, which gives name to the barony, was anciently annexed to that part of the church of Lusk which in the earlier ages belonged to the archdeaconry of Dublin, and was separated from it about the year 1220 by Archbishop Henry. The village is situated on the road from Dublin to Balbriggan, from which latter place it is distant about a mile; and contains 80 houses. According to tradition, James II. is said to have slept at the White Hart inn here, before the battle of the Boyne: and the same distinction is claimed for another ancient house in the village, which was formerly an extensive inn. Fairs are held on the 6th of May and 12th of August. The parish comprises 6884½ statute acres: about 320 are woodland, principally in the demesne of G. A. Hamilton, Esq., and about 80 are bog or waste land; the remainder is arable and pasture, but is principally under tillage, and very fertile in corn, which is the chief produce. A small portion of the bog of Ring is within the parish; and near the glebe is a reservoir of 22 acres, called the Knock, which supplies the mills of Balbriggan with water. At Cutlagh is a very fine stone-quarry, and good stone for building is also obtained from the cliffs. The coast is composed of strata of transition rocks of greywacke, greywacke-slate, clay-slate, and greenstone, with spar in small portions. The Drogheda, or Grand Northern Trunk, railway from Dublin passes close to the shore. Hampton Hall, the seat of Mr. Hamilton, is an elegant mansion situated in a rich demesne of 500 acres, finely wooded, and pleasantly diversified with hill and dale; the grounds command extensive sea views alternated with luxuriant woods, with the isles of Skerries in the foreground, and the Mone mountains in the distance, stretching far into the sea towards the north. Ardgillan Castle is a handsome building in the castellated style, beautifully situated in a park commanding some interesting views. The other seats are, Lower Lodge, in the grounds of which is an ancient rath; Inch House, having also a rath within the demesne; Knockingin; and Tankerville.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, and in the patronage of the Rev. Francis Baker, the present incumbent; the rectory is inappropriate in the trustees of Wilson's hospital, in the county of Westmeath. The tithe rent-charge is £397. 10., of which £210 are payable to the vicar. The church, with the exception of the tower, which is embattled and surmounted at the north-west angle with a circular turret, and at the others with small turrets, was taken down and rebuilt, by aid of a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1816. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £350 and a loan of £550 from the same Board, in 1815; the glebe comprises 30 acres. There is a chapel of ease at Balbriggan, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, endowed by the late Rev. George Hamilton. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, called the union of Balrothery and Balbriggan, and comprising also the parish of Balcaddan: there are three chapels in the union, one at the village of Balrothery, another at Balbriggan, and a third in the parish of Balcaddan. There is also at Balbriggan a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The workhouse is on a site of 5½ acres, held at a rent of £16. 13.; it was completed in 1840, at a cost of £4954, and is constructed to contain 400 paupers. Near the church are the remains of Balrothery Castle, the date of which is unknown; the roof is covered with flag-stones of great thickness, and the general style of the building refers it to a period of considerable antiquity. Within a quarter of a mile of the town are the ruins of Bremore Castle, the ancient seat of a branch of the Barnewall family, consisting of some of the out-buildings and part of a chapel, with a burial-ground, which is still used by some of the inhabitants. The skeletons of four moose-deer were dug up on the glebe by the Rev. Mr. Baker. At Cartlagh is a chalybeate spring.—See BALBRIGGAN.

BALSCADDEN, a parish, in the union of BALROTHERY, barony of BALROTHERY EAST, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (W.) from Balbriggan; containing 1074 inhabitants, of whom 295 are in the village. This parish borders on the county of MEATH, from which it is separated by the Naul river: it comprises 3496½ statute acres, including two commons, called the common of Balcaddan and the bog of the Ring; and there is a quarry of good building-stone on the lands of Milestown. Part of the demesne of Gormanston Castle is within its limits, but the castle itself is in the adjoining county. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Christ Church, Dublin; the rectory forms the corps of the treasurer in the cathedral of Christ Church, in the gift of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge is £135, of which £90 are payable to the treasurer, and £45 to the vicar. There is neither church nor glebe-house, but in a burial-ground in the village are the ruins of a church: the glebe consists of 4 acres of profitable land. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Balrothery and Balbriggan: the chapel, situated in the village, is a neat structure, built by subscription in 1819, at an expense of more than £500. Local tradition states that a battle was fought near the village, at a place called Cross Malin, where a small mound has been raised and a wooden cross erected on its summit; and it is said that there was an encampment on the common. The well of Tubbersoele was formerly resorted to, from an opinion of its efficacy in healing diseases of the eye.

BALSOON, a parish, in the unions of TRIM and NAVAN, barony of LOWER DRECE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (E. by N.) from Trim; containing 340 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Boyne, and on the road from Athboy, by Beehive Bridge, to Dunshaughlin; and comprises 1269½ statute acres. The land is principally under tillage; the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture is improved. Fairs are held at Beehive Bridge, near the boundary of the parish. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and is part of the union of Assey: the tithe rent-charge is £51. 18. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is within the district of Dunsany and Kilmessan, at which latter place is the chapel for the union.

BALTEAGH, or BALLYDAIGH, a parish, in the union of NEWTOWN-LIMAVADY, barony of KENAUGHT, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (S. E.) from Newtown-Limavady; containing 3371 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the Balteagh water and bounded on the west by the river Roe, is intersected by the roads leading respectively from Dungiven and Garvaghy to Newtown-Limavady, and by the road from Coleraine to Londonderry. It comprises 11,505½ statute acres, and, except a small portion belonging to the see of Derry, is the property of the Marquess of Waterford, being part of the grant made by James I. to the Haberdashers' Company, of London, who long since alienated it in perpetuity. About one-fourth part of the land forms a portion of the mountains of Cedy and Donaldshill, which latter is the highest ground in the parish, having an elevation of 1315 feet above the sea at low water. Much of the mountainous land affords excellent pasture for cattle, and might easily be reclaimed; and the lower grounds, extending from the bases of these mountains towards the river Roe, are rich and fertile, and in a good state of cultivation, producing abundant crops. In the front of the Cedy mountain is a large quarry of white limestone, which rock is there and elsewhere topped by the lofty mountains of basalt stretching on the east to Coleraine, on the south-east to Garvaghy, and on the north-east to Magilligan. In the bed of the Balteagh water, freestone, calcareous sandstone, and thin layers of coal are found alternating. The weaving of linen is carried on in some of the farmhouses; and there are a flour-mill, two oatmeal-mills, and two flax-mills, in the parish. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe-rent charge is £260. 9. The church, a small edifice with a square tower crowned with pinnacles, was erected in 1815, on a site near the ruins of the old church at the base of Donaldshill, at an expense of £700, a gift from the Board of First Fruits, which also granted a loan of £277 for its enlargement and repair in 1824. The glebe-house, situated about a quarter of a mile to the north of it, is a good residence; the glebe comprises 93 acres, lying on both sides of the Baltesh water. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Newtown-Limavady, and contains a chapel. At Lislane is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. There are remains of an extensive cromlech; and the walls of the ancient church form an interesting ruin. In several parts are sulphureous and chalybeate springs. Numerous fossils are imbedded in the limestone of Cedy, particularly belemnites, trilobites, and dendrites.

BALTIBOYS.—See BOYSTOWN.

BALTIMORE, a village and sea-port, and formerly an incorporated parliamentary borough, in the parish of TULLAGH, union of SKIBBEREEN, Eastern Division of the barony of WEST CARBERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (S.W.) from Skibbereen; containing, according to the census of 1841, 168 inhabitants. This place is situated on a fine harbour to which it gives name in St. George's Channel, and was anciently called Dunashad. It is supposed to have been a sanctuary of the Druids, and one of the principal seats of the idolatrous worship of Baal, whence its present name, Beal-ti-mor, signifying in the Irish language "The Great Habitation of Baal," is probably derived. In 1537, the men of Waterford, in revenge for an attack made by Fineen O'Driscoll and his son on some merchant vessels consigned to that port, fitted out three armed ships with 400 men on board, which, arriving in the harbour, anchored under the castle: the garrison fled on their approach, and this force, after having laid waste the adjacent island of Innisharkin, landed here and set fire to the castle and town of Baltimore. So great was the resort of foreign fishermen to this coast, that, in 1552, Edward VI. was advised by his parliament to erect a fort on the harbour, and compel them to pay a tribute; but the proposal was not carried into effect. In 1602, Sir Fineen O'Driscoll surrendered the castle to the Spaniards; and supplies of artillery and ammunition were conveyed into it for its defence by the Spanish commander, Don Jean D'Aquila, on whose capitulation soon after at Kinsale, it was delivered up according to the terms of the treaty. The town was, in 1629, reduced to great distress by Sir Walter Coppinger, who claimed and took possession of the castle, with the manor and town of Baltimore, upon which last the English inhabitants had expended more than £2000. Sir Walter was summoned before the lords-justices, but in the mean time sold the property to Mr. Becher, who dispossessed the English colonists, and they never afterwards recovered their property. About two years subsequently, the Algerines made a descent upon this coast, attacked the castle, plundered the town, and carried away with them to Algiers more than 200 prisoners, most of whom were English settlers. After these two calamities the town never regained its former prosperity, and in a short time dwindled into an insignificant village. In 1645 the castle, which was well fortified, and amply supplied with ordnance and ammunition, was taken by Captain Bennet and held for the parliament.

The inhabitants received a charter of INCORPORATION from James I., dated March 25th, 1613, by which the government was vested in a sovereign, twelve burgesses, and a commonalty: the sovereign was empowered to hold a court of record in personal actions not exceeding five marks, and the privilege of returning members to parliament was granted. In 1689, James II. bestowed another charter, dated subsequently to the accession of William III., and which recites that the provost, free burgesses, and commonalty had enjoyed many privileges that had been seized into the king's hands by a judgment of the exchequer. From the time of its first incorporation the borough continued to return two members to the Irish parliament till the Legislative Union, when it was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded as compensation for the abolition of the franchise were paid to Sir John Evans Freke, Bart., who in 1807 succeeded to the title of Lord Carbery; the right of voting was vested in the householders, and the seneschal of the manor was the returning officer. The limits of the old borough cannot now be well defined by any marked boundaries; they included part of the manor, and extended for about a quarter of a mile round the town by land. The corporation is extinct, and the only official person now remaining is a water-bailiff appointed by the proprietor and lord of the manor, by whose authority he collects certain dues from all vessels not belonging to the port, which enter it, whether they discharge their cargoes or not.

The village is situated on the eastern shore of the harbour, and immediately around the ruins of the ancient castle: in 1833, a substantial pier was constructed at the joint expense of the Fishery Board and Lord Carbery. The trade of the port consists chiefly in the export of swine, corn and provisions, copper-ore, &c., of which the estimated value in a recent year was £37,144; and in the import of sugar, tea, coffee, spirits, iron, coal, &c., amounting, in the same year, to £17,767. In 1835, nine vessels of the aggregate burthen of 2030 tons entered inwards, and the same number cleared outwards either with passengers or ballast, as connected with the foreign trade; and 173 vessels of the aggregate burthen of 10,300 tons entered inwards, and 299 of the aggregate burthen of 17,643 tons cleared out, as connected with the coasting-trade. The amount of duties paid at the custom-house for that year was £2060; but much of the timber imported, being for the use of copper-mines, the greater part of the duty was returned. In 1844, 214 vessels, of the burthen of 9629 tons, entered inwards, coastways; and 399 vessels, of the burthen of 15,398 tons, cleared outwards, coastways: 7 vessels of 1428 tonnage entered, and 6 vessels of 1483 tonnage cleared out, in connexion with the colonial and foreign trade. The number of vessels registered as belonging to the port is 115, of the aggregate burthen of 3620 tons: the custom-house is at Castle-Townsend, a distance of 10 miles from this place. These statements of the number of vessels and the amount of duties, of course, do not refer merely to the insignificant village of Baltimore: the jurisdiction of the port extends from Galley Head, on the east, to Mill Cove on the west, and includes the creeks or harbours of Bearhaven, Bantry, Crookhaven, Baltimore, and Castle-Townsend, together with all rivers, bays, and creeks within its limits. The harbour is situated about seven miles (E. by N.) from the south-west point of Cape Clear, and is convenient for shipping, bound either eastward or westward. The pier, though small, is a great accommodation to the fishermen as a landing-place on the mainland, for the fishery of Cape Clear; and a small quayside is collected for keeping it in repair. There are neither fairs nor markets. A coast-guard station has been established here, which is one of the nine that constitute the district of Skibbereen. The parish church, a handsome building with a lofty square tower, is situated in the village: it was erected in 1819, and forms a very conspicuous feature in the landscape, as seen from the harbour. A school-house for male and female children was built at the expense of Lord Carbery in 1832; and there is a dispensary for the benefit of the inhabitants of the numerous islands in the bay. The ruins of the castle, on the summit of a lofty rock over the pier, and commanding every part of the harbour, are extensive and beautifully picturesque.—See TULLAGH.

BALTINGLASS, an ancient borough, market, and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, partly in the barony of RATHVILLY, county of CARLOW, but chiefly in the barony of UPPER TALBOTSTOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 36½ miles (W.S.W.) from Wicklow, and 35 miles (S.S.W.) from Dublin; containing, with the town of Stratford-on-Slaney, 4336 inhabitants, of whom 1928 are in the town of Baltinglass. This place, in the opinion of most antiquaries, derives its name from Baal-Tin-Glass, signifying, according to common acceptation, "the pure fire of Baal," and is thence supposed to have been one of the principal seats of Druidical worship. At the time of the English invasion it formed part of the inheritance of the princes of Leinster; and about the year 1148, or 1151, Diarmid Mac Murchad O'Cavanagh, the reigning monarch, founded here a monastery for Cistercian monks, in the church of which he was afterwards interred. Among the most distinguished benefactors to this establishment which became a mitred abbey, was John, Earl of Morton, afterwards King of England; and among its abbots was Albion O'Molloy, one of the most zealous advocates of the Irish clergy, in opposition to the overbearing allegations of Giraldus Cambrensis. The monastery was frequently plundered by the mountain-septs of the O'Byrnes and the O'Tooles; and in 1314 the abbot obtained from the English government permission to hold a conference with the chiefs of those formidable septs, who in the deed for this purpose are designated "Irish Felons," in order to recover "the goods and chattels of which he had been robbed, or a full equivalent for the same." The monastery was suppressed in 1537, and, with its extensive possessions, including the castle and manor of Baltinglass, was granted in 1541 to Thomas Eustace, Lord Kilcullen, whom Henry VIII. created Viscount Baltinglass. In the reign of Elizabeth a parliament was held here, in which was passed an act rendering every kind of inheritance forfeitable for high treason, emphatically called the Statute of Baltinglass. James, the third viscount Baltinglass, and his four brothers, having joined in the great Desmond insurrection, were convicted of high treason; and their estates, being confiscated under this statute, were granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir John Harrington. The manor is now the property of Henry Carroll, Esq., of Ballynure; and the castle, with the town and other considerable property in the neighbourhood, is in the possession of the Earl of Aldborough.

During the disturbances of 1798, the insurgents, after their defeat in the county of Wexford, stationed themselves in the mountains of this neighbourhood, and continued for some time to commit outrages on the peaceable inhabitants of the surrounding county.

The town is pleasantly situated in a romantic vale watered by the Slaney, over which is a stone bridge of three arches, connecting those parts of it that are on the opposite banks of the river. It consists of four principal streets, with two or three others of less importance, and contains 303 houses: it is amply supplied with water from springs, and, from its situation on the great road from Dublin, by Tullow, to Wexford, enjoys a considerable traffic. There are infantry barracks for one officer, and 25 non-commissioned officers and privates; and a constabulary police and a peace-preservation force are stationed in the town. The manufacture of linen, woollen, and diaper was formerly carried on here extensively: there are still two bleach-grounds in the town in full operation, and an extensive flour-mill, also some cotton spinning and weaving works at Stratford-on-Slaney. A market and some fairs were granted, in 1617, to Sir Thomas Willmott by James I. Charles II., in 1663, gave by charter a market to be held on Friday, and two fairs for three days each in May and September, to Sir Maurice Eustace, with the tolls thereof; and four more fairs were granted, in 1763, to John, Lord Baltinglass, by a patent, which also contains a grant of a market on Tuesday, not now held, and of the tolls and customs of the markets and fairs to his lordship. The market is on Friday; and the fairs are held on Feb. 2nd, March 17th, May 12th, June 1st, Sept. 12th, and Dec. 8th. Until within the last few years the tolls and customs were received by the corporation, but the collecting of them has been discontinued.

The town was incorporated by charter of Charles II., in the 15th year of his reign (1663), under the designation of the "Sovereign, Burgesses, and Free Commons of the Borough of Baltinglass." The corporation continued to exercise its functions until October 1841, when it was dissolved under the act of 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108, and any property it possessed became vested in the guardians of the poor of the union. It consisted of a sovereign, twelve burgesses, a recorder and town-clerk, a serjeant-at-mace, and a clerk of the market. The sovereign was elected annually by and from the burgesses, on the Monday next after the feast of St. John the Baptist, and was sworn into office on the Monday after Michaelmas-day; he had power to appoint a deputy from among the resident burgesses, by consent of a majority of that body. The sovereign or deputy was a justice of the peace within the borough during the year of office, and the former for one year after; the sovereign was also coroner. Burgesses were elected for life, but had no functions to perform. The power of appointing the recorder and town-clerk during pleasure, and also the clerk of the market, was vested by the charter in Sir Maurice Eustace, his heirs and assigns; and the serjeant-at-mace was appointed by the sovereign and burgesses. The freedom of the borough was obtained only by gift of the corporation; the freemen were exempted from serving upon juries without the limits of the borough, which, according to the charter, extended beyond the town, and comprised 300 acres lying on the west and south sides. The corporation had nearly become extinct, there being only two burgesses, and not one freeman, in 1832, when ten burgesses were chosen. The town returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when it was disfranchised, and the sum of £15,000 awarded as compensation was paid to the trustees of the Earl of Albemarle: the sovereign was the returning officer. The borough was included in the manor of Balinglass, and the manor court was constituted a court of record, in which the seneschal presided, with jurisdiction to the amount of £10; but this court has been long discontinued. The quarter-sessions for the western division of the county are held here; as are also petty-sessions for the upper division of the barony of Talbotstown, every alternate Friday, before the county magistrates. The court-house stands at the extremity of the principal street, on the eastern bank of the river. The district bridewell, situated in the town, contains thirteen cells, four day-rooms, a small hospital, and three airing-yards, in one of which is a tread-wheel; and though badly planned and inconveniently situated, it affords sufficient facility for the classification of the prisoners usually confined within its walls.

The parish comprises 6149 statute acres. The lands are in a state of good cultivation: the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture is improved; there is very little bog or waste land. Stratford Lodge is a spacious mansion pleasantly situated in a demesne of 100 acres tastefully laid out and planted, ornamented with several ponds of water, and commanding from the house some extensive views, including the town, the valley, and a magnificent range of mountain scenery. Saunders Grove is a handsome mansion of hewn stone lined with brick, beautifully situated in a rich demesne adorned by the windings of the Slaney. Golden Fort is situated on an eminence over the Slaney, opposite the demesne of Saunders Grove: Slaney Park and Whitehall are also in the parish; and on the townland of Ladytown, which is part of this parish, but detached and completely surrounded by the county of Carlow, is Mount Lucas, commanding extensive mountain views and the scenery of the valley. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Ballynure, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the patronage of Henry Carroll, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge of Balinglass is £463. 17. The church, which occupies the site of the chancel of the ancient abbey, was repaired, and a square tower added to it, in 1815, at an expense of £500; and a grant of £252 has been made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for its further repair. The churchyard is the burial-place of the Stratford family, and over the remains of his deceased ancestors, the present Earl of Albemarle, in 1832, erected a massive mausoleum of granite, terminating in a pyramidal spire. There is a chapel of ease at Stratford-on-Slaney. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parish of Ballynure, those parts of the parishes of Timolin and Moon which are in the county of Wicklow, and that part of Kineagh which is in the county of Kildare; the chapel near the town is a neat edifice with a tower, and there is also a chapel at Stratford-on-Slaney. In the town of Balinglass is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, and at Stratford is one for Presbyterians. A second infirmary for the county of Wicklow, containing four wards, in which are 20 beds, with a dispensary annexed to it, has been established in the town; there is also a savings' bank. Within the demesne of Stratford Lodge is a shop for supplying the poor with goods at cost price. The workhouse of the union, on a site of 7½ acres held at a rent of £23. 10., was completed in 1840, at a cost of £5750, and is constructed to receive 500 paupers.

There are some considerable remains of the Cistercian abbey, chiefly consisting of a series of seven pointed arches springing from alternated round and square pillars with curiously carved capitals, which formerly separated the south aisle from the nave; the church appears to have been a spacious cruciform structure, and the west end, which is still standing, has the remains of a lancet-shaped window of three lights. The walls inclose a large area, which appears to have been surrounded with monastic buildings. Of the ancient castle, now converted into a farmhouse, two Norman doorways leading into a court-yard are still remaining; and formerly many fragments of stone, highly wrought, lay scattered in all directions. Near the town is a cromlech, and numerous other relics of antiquity are said to have been lately existing there. On the eminence on which Golden Fort is built are two circular intrenchments or raths, surrounded by moats: in one of these the proprietor of the estate discovered, a few years since, a number of gold coins, from which circumstance the seat derived its name; and in the other, of larger dimensions and in a much more perfect state, was found a kistvaen containing an urn of rude pottery, in which were ashes, with a number of human bones scattered around. In the same demesne is an ancient cemetery. Balinglass gives the title of Baron to the noble family of Stratford, earls of Albemarle.—See STRATFORD-ON-SLANEY.

BALTRAY, a village, in the parish of TERMONFECKAN, union of DROGHEDA, barony of FERRARD, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (E.) from Drogheda; containing 423 inhabitants. It is situated at the estuary of the river Boyne, on the eastern coast, and contains 89 dwellings, of which the greater number are thatched cabins.

BANADA, a village, in the parish of KILMACTIGUE, poor-law union of SWINFORD, barony of LENEX, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Tubbercurry: the population is returned with the parish. It comprises about 30 cabins, and is beautifully situated on the banks of the river Moy, which winds through it in a broad deep stream, and on the road from Tubbercurry to Foxford. A friary of Eremites, following the rule of St. Augustine, was founded in 1423, through the industry of a brother of the order, and was dedicated to Corpus Christi: here is now a modern seat called the Abbey, and from a plantation rises the lofty steeple of the ancient monastery, built of hewn stone, and still entire. Fairs are held on Jan. 17th, May 19th, and Aug. 7th.—See KILMACTIGUE.

BANAGHER, a market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of RYNAGH, union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of GARRYCASTLE, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Parsonstown, and 64 miles (W. S. W.) from Dublin; containing 2927 inhabitants. This town is situated on the side of a hill, on the south-east bank of the Shannon, just above the influx of the little Brosna river, and at the junction of the roads from Parsonstown to Cloghan and Eyrecoort. The late bridge, connecting it with the Galway shore, was one of the oldest across the Shannon; it consisted of several small arches with projecting piers, and was very narrow and inconvenient, but of great strength and solidity. Latterly, this bridge, which is supposed to have stood between 400 and 500 years, shewed numerous symptoms of decay, and completely obstructed the navigation of the river: to remedy this evil, a canal with a swing-bridge over it was formed on the Galway side; and in August 1843 a new bridge was opened by the Shannon Commissioners, at a cost of £30,000, and the old one removed. The present structure consists of six stone arches, of 90 feet span each, and has a swivel-bridge for ships to pass through. Its military defences are very strong: on the King's connty or Banagher side is a l'ite-du-pont mounting three pieces of heavy ordnance, and about a quarter of a mile lower down the river is a circular field-work with six pieces of ordnance; on the Galway side to the right is a Martello tower, and on the left a small battery. The town comprises 478 houses, mostly well built; the streets are Macadamised. It has a reading-room; and close to the bridge are infantry barracks for 3 officers and 63 men. There are a distillery, brewery, malt-house, and some tanyards; and the town has a good general trade with the rural population of the surrounding district. It is also well situated for trade with distant places, having the advantages of steam navigation to Athlone, Limerick, and the sea, and of simple water communication with Ballinasloe and Dublin by the Grand Canal: the introduction of steam vessels on the Shannon has greatly benefited the general trade of this town, and in the autumn of 1836 extensive surveys were made by order of government, with a view to improve the river. The market, originally granted in 1612 to Sir John McCoghlan, Knt., to be held on Thursday,—and to the corporation in 1628, on Monday,—is now held on Friday, and is a considerable corn market. Fairs are held on May 1st, Sept. 15th and three following days, Oct. 28th, and Nov. 8th; that held in September is a large fair for live stock, inferior only to that of Ballinasloe. Here is a station of the constabulary police.

The inhabitants were incorporated in 1628 by CHARTER of Charles I., by which it was ordained that certain lands, altogether comprising 200 acres of arable and pasture, and 70 acres of wood and moor, should be a free borough. One-thirteenth of these lands was granted to Sir Arthur Blundell and his heirs, 1-13th to Sir Matthew Derenzie and his heirs, and 1-13th to each of the other burgesses named in the charter, to be held in free burgage at a rent of 3s. 1d. respectively. The charter further granted to the corporation 222 acres of arable and pasture land, and 7 acres of wood and moor, for the support of a resident preaching minister, whom they were to appoint; and 200 acres of arable and pasture, and 85 of wood and moor, for the maintenance of a schoolmaster in the town, to be appointed by the vicar, or, in default, by a majority of the burgesses. It also contained a grant of a court with jurisdiction to the amount of £20; constituted the sovereign, or his deputy, a justice of the peace within the borough, and coroner and clerk of the market; and empowered the corporation at large to send two members to the Irish parliament. The corporation was styled "The Sovereign, Burgesses, and Free Commons of the Borough and Town of Banagher alias Bannagher;" and consisted of a sovereign and twelve burgesses, with power to admit freemen, and appoint a recorder and other officers; but the corporate offices have not been filled up since the year 1600, when the borough was deprived of its right of parliamentary representation, and the £15,000 awarded as compensation was paid to the Right Hon. William Brabazon Ponsonby. The sovereign held, under the charter, a court for the recovery of debts to the amount of £20 late currency: the only court now held is a court of petty-sessions every alternate Monday.

The lands granted by the charter for a preaching minister are said to have been formerly held by a clergyman appointed by the corporation, who officiated in a church now fallen into decay, in the town; but they have for many years become united to the rectory, and are now held by the incumbent of the parish. At the entrance to the town is the parish church, a handsome edifice in the ancient English style of architecture with a tower and spire, built in 1829 at an expense of £2286, of which £2030 were granted on loan by the Board of First Fruits. There is also a Roman Catholic chapel, a large plain building in good repair. A school was established by the corporation, pursuant to the charter granting lands for its endowment. By an act of the 53rd of George III., cap. 107, these lands, which according to a survey made in 1817 comprised about 370 acres, of which 233 were arable and pasture, were vested in the Commissioners of Education, and the school was placed under their control. The lands were formerly let at a rent of £300, but are now held by the master at a rent of £148 per annum: the Board recently proposed to allow him a salary of £200 on the condition of his surrendering all interest in them, with a view to their being placed under the superintendence of a local qualified agent. The school was suspended from 1798 to 1807: there are no free scholars on the establishment, which in no respect differs from an ordinary classical school, except that it is under the control of the Board. In the vicinity is Cloghan Castle, one of the oldest inhabited castles in Ireland; and a short distance to the south of the town, near the banks of the Little Brosna river, are the ruins of Garry Castle, which gave name to the barony.—See RYNAGH.

BANAGHER, a parish, in the union of LONDONDERRY, partly in the barony of TIRKEERAN, but chiefly in that of KENAUGHT, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (W. by S.) from Dungiven; containing 5810 inhabitants. This parish, which for extent is the second in the county, is situated on the road from Toome to Londonderry, and is nine miles in length from east to west, and seven miles in breadth from north to south. It contains 27 townlands, 16 being in the barony of Tirkeeran and 11 in that of Kenaught; and comprises 32,475 statute acres, of which 17,748½ are in the latter barony. The early history of this place is involved in great obscurity; by some writers it is said that St. Patrick, when he crossed the Foyle, visited it and founded the church, the ruins of which are still remaining, and contain a stone inscribed in modern capitals, "This church was built in the year of God 474." The style of the building, however, is evidently of a much later period, and corresponds with a local tradition that the church was built by St. O'Henry, and with the style of the tomb erected to his memory in the adjoining cemetery. It is also said that a monastery, of which St. O'Henry was abbot, formerly existed here; but though there are, near the church, the remains of a small square building called the Abbey, of ancient erection, and evidently used for domestic purposes, no mention occurs in historic records of any religious establishment, nor are there any monastic lands in the parish, except such as belonged to the abbey of Dungiven.

The PARISH is divided among several proprietors: seven townlands belong to the see of Derry, six to the Skinners' Company, and three to the Fishmongers' Company; ten are freeholds, of which nine pay a chief rent to the Skinners' and one to the Fishmongers'; and one, on which are the church, glebe-house, and parochial schools, belongs to the rector. The land in many places is well drained, and in a good state of cultivation; but not less than 13,432 acres are mountain land, though affording good pasturage; and there are 546 acres of flow bog, which is however being rapidly reclaimed. In the mountains, particularly in Finglen, are found very large and beautiful specimens of rock crystals, or Irish diamonds, generally truncated pentagonal prisms, with facets often of the clearest lustre, and sometimes of the colour and brilliancy of the beryl. These crystals vary, however, in colour and lustre, and are met with of all sizes. The largest ever discovered was found in Finglen water, in 1796; it weighs 84½ lb., and is in the possession of Michael Ross, Esq., of Banagher Cottage; it is called the Dungiven Crystal, and has been noticed by several writers as an object of admiration. Freestone is found in great quantities, and is of a bright fawn colour, and very durable, as appears from the old churches of Banagher and Dungiven; limestone is also abundant. There are several handsome seats in the parish, and most of them are embosomed in rich and flourishing plantations. At Knockan was formerly a large bleach-green, where 8000 pieces of linen were annually bleached and finished for the English markets: the site is now occupied by a flax-mill. Some linen-cloth, also, used to be woven by the farmers in their own houses, but the greater number of the inhabitants are now employed in agriculture.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, united to the vicarage of Dungiven, and the two parishes form the union of Banagher, in the patronage of the Skinners' Company: the tithe rent-charge of Banagher is £487. 10., and the gross value of the incumbent's benefice, including glebe, is £960. There is a church in each of the parishes. The church of Banagher, a large edifice with a tower surmounted by a beautiful octagonal spire, is situated on elevated ground about a mile west of the old church, and was built in 1782, by parochial assessment; the spire was added at the expense of the Earl of Bristol, then Bishop of Derry. The glebe-house, nearly adjoining the church, is a handsome residence, built in 1819 by the Rev. Alexander Ross, the incumbent, at an expense of £2350, of which £1500 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe contains 312 acres, Cunningham measure, of which 70 are mountain. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in their report for 1831, recommended the dissolution of the union, and that each parish should become a separate benefice on the next avoidance. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parishes of Bovevagh and Learmount, and contains three chapels; one at Feeny, one at Altinre in the mountain district, and one at Foreglen. There is a place of worship at Ballyhenecdin for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly; it is a handsome building in the Grecian style of architecture, erected in 1825, at the expense of the Fishmongers' Company.

The chief ruins are situated on the summit of a sandy ridge on the south side of the river Owenreagh, in a retired and beautiful valley, and are very interesting; they consist of the church, and the small square building already referred to. The church comprised a nave and chancel, but the partition wall, the arch, and the eastern gable have disappeared; the side walls and the west front are remaining, and tolerably entire. The nave and chancel seem each to have been lighted by a very narrow lancet window on the south side, ornamented externally with curious circular mouldings; the entrance appears to have been from the west, through a square-headed doorway with a bold architrave, and on one of the stones on the north side is the inscription in modern capitals before noticed. There are also the ruins of an ancient church at Straid, said by the country people to have been the second founded by St. Patrick in this part of the kingdom; but the style of the building is of much less remote antiquity. In the townland of Templemoyle are the foundations of a third church, but no part of the building is remaining, nor is there any history or tradition of it extant. On the glebe is a curious vitrified fort, on which the Middenmer fires are made; and near the present church is an extensive artificial cave. In the cemetery of the old church is a curious monument to the memory of St. O'Henry, of a square form, with sharp pointed gables and a roof of stone; on the western side is an effigy of the saint in tolerable preservation. Here, also, is a very curious ancient cross, with the fragments of a second; which, with three others, marked out the consecrated ground around this venerable pile, that served as a sanctuary to criminals.

BANBRIDGE, a market and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of SKAPATRICK, barony of UPPER IVEAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 10 miles (N. N. E.) from Newry, and 60 miles (N.) from Dublin; containing 3324 inhabitants. This flourishing town was anciently called Ballyvally, and acquired its present name from the erection of a bridge over the Bann, in 1712, on the formation of a new line of road from Dublin to Belfast. The old road passed a little to the north of it, and crossed the Bann at Huntley Glen by a ford through which the army of William III. passed on the 11th of June, 1690, on its march to the Boyne. The town is situated on both sides of the river, and contains 642 houses, many of which are well built; the larger portion is on the western side, on an eminence sloping to the river, and of course communicates with the smaller by the bridge, a handsome structure of hewn granite. The streets are wide, and the entire town wears an aspect of neatness and comfort surpassed by few places in the country. Since 1828 the act for lighting, paving, and cleansing towns in Ireland, has been wholly in operation, under twelve commissioners, who assess the rates. In the centre of the principal street to the west of the river formerly stood the market-house, a large and inconvenient building, which was taken down in 1832 to make way for a series of improvements. Prior to that period the street was very steep, and difficult of access; but an excavation, 200 yards long and 15 feet deep, has been made along its centre, crossed by a handsome viaduct of one elliptic arch of hewn granite, under which the vehicles pass. The street being very wide, a carriage road was left on each side of the excavation, running parallel with it and on a level with the ground-floors of the houses, shops, and public buildings: these side roads are protected throughout their entire length by a stone wall rising from the bottom of the excavation to the height of three feet above their level. The excavation interrupts the communication between the houses on the opposite sides of the street; but the viaduct, placed at the intersection of the streets, obviates that inconvenience. This great undertaking was completed in 1834, and has much facilitated the passage through the town.

The town is comparatively of modern origin, and has risen with uncommon rapidity to an eminent degree of commercial importance as the head of the principal district of the LINEN MANUFACTURE. Even when almost every port was closed against the introduction of Irish linens, and the trade was nearly lost to the country, those of Banbridge found a ready market; and when the energies of the linen merchant on the old system were nearly paralysed by foreign competition, the merchants of this place created a new trade, by commencing as manufacturers on an extensive scale, and opening an intercourse with America and other parts. The numerous falls on the river, and the uniform supply of water, appear to have attracted the attention of the manufacturers soon after bleaching became a separate branch of the trade; and shortly after the application of machinery to this department, several mills were erected on its banks, though mostly on a small scale, as the process at that time was very tedious and every web of considerable value. Notwithstanding that a formidable barrier to enterprise resulted from the unsettled state of the country, and that the system of selling only through the factors in Dublin restricted the operations of the trade and regulated the prices, the linen merchants of this district seem to have gradually prospered, as, in 1772, there were no less than 26 bleach-greens on the Bann river. At that time, however, the trade was principally carried on at Gilford; the webs were mostly marked as "Gilford linens;" and, after the introduction of linen seals, were nearly all sealed there. The Dro-more merchants also transacted an important business; the finer fabrics had even acquired the name of "Dro-mores," and a great quantity of the higher numbers is still woven in and around that town, but principally for the Banbridge manufacturers. At present, comparatively very little business is done at either of those places, the entire trade of this part of the country having concentrated itself in the vicinity of Banbridge, which has thus become one of the most important inland manufacturing towns in Ireland.

Linen of every description is manufactured and bleached in the neighbourhood. At Brookfield, Huntly Glen, Seapatrick, Millmount, Ballydown, and Ashfield, are manufacturers on a large scale, for whom more than 60,000 webs, comprising linens of various quality, sheeting, diapers, damasks, drills, cambrics, &c., are annually finished by a vast number of weavers, who work in their own dwellings and are dispersed over the surrounding parishes. There are very extensive bleach-greens at Ballievey, Ballydown, Clibborn Vale, Millmount, Milltown, Springvale, Mill-Park, Hazelbank, Banford, and Mountpleasant, where 185,710 webs were bleached and finished in 1834, being nearly equal to the entire quantity bleached in this county at the end of the last century. At Seapatrick is an extensive establishment for weaving union cloths by machinery, in which are employed 100 power-looms, impelled by a water-wheel 15 feet in diameter and 22 feet broad on the face. There are also very large thread manufactories, for home consumption and exportation, at Huntley Glen, Milltown, and Banbridge; a mill for spinning linen-yarn at Coose; and, adjoining it, chymical-works for the supply of the bleachers. These different establishments provide employment for more than 2000 persons connected with this branch of the linen trade alone. Branches of the Provincial Bank of Ireland and the Ulster Banking Company have been established here. The situation of the town on the great north road to Belfast, and in the centre of a fertile and highly cultivated district watered by the Bann, is very advantageous to its interests. It is also within three miles of the Newry and Lough Neagh canal, to which a branch may be formed at little expense; this improvement appears to have been at one period contemplated, as an excavation is still traceable from Millmount down the valley on the south side of the Bann. Within an extent of four miles there are six good stone bridges over the Bann, besides several of wood; in 1690 there was not one bridge over this river throughout its entire course of 36 miles, from the mountains of Morne to Lough Neagh. The Marquess of Downshire is proprietor of Banbridge. There are several gentlemen's seats in the vicinity, and some handsome houses in the town, the residences of wealthy merchants and professional gentlemen; the farmhouses around are also built in a superior style of convenience and comfort.

The market is on Monday, and is abundantly supplied with all kinds of provisions, and with pedlery and other commodities: the sale of yarn and holly linens, formerly very extensive, has declined since the new system of spinning and manufacturing was established, but considerable quantities of both are still disposed of. The market-house, situated in the centre of the town, close to the viaduct, is a large edifice surmounted by a dome, built by the late Marquess of Downshire in 1834, at an expense of £2000: a brown-linen hall was also erected by him in 1817, and a market-place for meal and grain in 1815. Fairs are held on the first Monday in every month; and other fairs, for horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, and manufactured goods, on Jan. 12th, first Saturday in March, June 9th, August 26th, and Nov. 16th: the last is a very noted fair for horses. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Lisburn: petty-sessions are held once a fortnight, and here is a chief station of the constabulary police. The parochial church, situated in the town, is a handsome cruciform edifice with a tower surmounted by a spire, built at an expense of about £3000, of which sum £1500 were granted by the Board of First Fruits, and the residue was provided by private contributions, including £600 subscribed by the Marquess of Downshire, who also gave the site: it is capable of accommodating 1800 persons. There is a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, besides a place of worship each for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. Here is also a dispensary. The workhouse is built on a site of $5\frac{1}{2}$ acres purchased for £316; it was completed in 1841, at a cost of £6300, and is constructed to contain 800 paupers. Within half a mile from the town, on the Dromore road, a sulphureous chalybeate spring has been discovered, the water of which, having been analysed, is found to equal that of Aix-la-Chapelle, and is efficacious in scorbutic complaints. This was the birth-place of the late Baron McClelland, third baron of the exchequer; and near the town was born Dr. Dickson, Bishop of Down and Connor.—See SEATRICK.

BANDON, or BANDON-BRIDGE, a borough, market, and post town, and the head of a union; partly in the parish of KILBROGAN, barony of KINALMEAKY; but chiefly in the parish of BALLYMODAN, partly in the barony of KINALMEAKY, and partly in the East Division of the barony of EAST CARBERRY; county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W.) from Cork, and $14\frac{1}{2}$ (S.W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 9049 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the erection of a bridge over the river Bandon, and owes its origin to the English planters on the great Desmond forfeitures in the reign of Elizabeth. It is first noticed in 1609, when James I. granted to Henry Becher the privilege of a Saturday's market and two fairs at the town lately built on the south side of the river Bandon, near the bridge; and in the grant made to Becher, in 1612, of a moiety of the territory of Kinalmeaky, which was erected into the manor of "Castle Mahowne," power was given to him and his heirs to appoint a clerk of the market in the newly erected town called Bandon-Bridge, or in any other town within the said territory, with the privilege of licensing all tradesmen and artisans settling therein. These grants were shortly afterwards purchased by the first earl of Cork, whose exertions in promoting its growth and prosperity entitle him to be regarded as the founder of the town, which be peopled with a colony of Protestants from Bristol, and which, in a few years, from a mere waste of bog and wood, became a spacious, handsome, and well-fortified place, continuing to flourish and to increase in extent and importance. At the commencement of the civil war in 1641, the town was placed under the government of Lord Kinalmeaky, son of the Earl of Cork, who took possession of it in January 1642, and, mustering all the inhabitants, put it into an excellent state of defence. As it was the only walled town in this part of the country, it became an asylum for the English of the surrounding district; and by its own resources it maintained four companies of foot, raised a corps of volunteers, and made every preparation both for offensive and defensive warfare. On the 18th of February a party of Irish under McCarty Reagh approached, when Lord Kinalmeaky rallying out with 200 foot and 60 horse, a severe conflict ensued, in which, without the loss of a single townsman, more than 100 of the assailants were killed. The inhabitants soon afterwards, in conjunction with a troop from Kinsale, defeated another party that had lain in ambush to surprise them, and in a short time took several forts in the adjacent territory which had been held by the Irish; they also killed fifty who had made an attempt to carry off their cattle. On Cromwell's approach in 1649, they declared for the parliament. In 1688, hearing that the Earl of Clancarty was advancing with six companies of foot of the army of James II., to reinforce the two companies of foot and the troop of horse already stationed here, the inhabitants disarmed the garrison, killed several of the soldiers, took possession of their arms and horses, and shut the gates against the earl. At length, however, they were obliged to yield for want of provisions, but still refused to give up any of their leaders, consenting only to pay £1000 as the price of their pardon; on this submission the walls were razed to the ground, and they have never been rebuilt.

The town is situated on the river Bandon, and on the coach-road from Cork to Bantry. The principal part lies in a valley environed with lofty hills, and watered by the river, which separates the parishes of Ballymodan and Kilbrogan, the former on the south and the latter on the north bank, and which near the bridge receives a tributary stream called the Bridewell. Under the various names of Boyle-street, Shannon-street, and Main-street, the town extends on the south side for about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile parallel with the river: on the north it stretches for about half that distance. It is also built partly on the acclivities of the hills on each side of the river, which are agreeably wooded, and ornamented with several mansions, villas, and cottages, that give to the environs a pleasing and picturesque appearance. The old town is on the estate of the Duke of Devonshire, who repairs its streets and is reimbursed by a poundage of five per cent. on the rent, reserved in all leases of houses in this part: what is called the Irish town, including Boyk, Shannon, and Main streets, with an estate adjoining, belongs to the Earl of Shannon; and the western portion is the property of the earls of Cork and Bandon. The total number of houses, in 1841, was 1391, the greater number of which were slated: many respectable private houses have been built in the more elevated parts of the town, chiefly of a durable freestone of a light brown colour found in the neighborhood. The streets are very indifferently paved, and only partially flagged. The inhabitants are supplied with water principally from wells and public pumps, the latter erected and kept in repair by the Duke of Devonshire and the Earl of Shannon, on their respective estates; and in 1835 a company was formed for lighting the town with gas. The place is watched and cleansed agreeably with the provisions of the act 9th George IV., under a board of eighteen commissioners, who assess the rates. A public library was established in 1825 by a proprietary of £5 shareholders, who pay a subscription of 10s. annually, and annual subscribers of £1 are admitted by ballot: it contains several hundred volumes, including a copy of Rees's Encyclopædia presented by the Duke of Devonshire, and one of Rymer's Fædera presented by the government in 1835. The parochial library, under the management of the Protestant clergy, was established in 1823; and a similar library was formed by the Wesleyan Methodists in 1830. There are also two reading-rooms supported by annual subscribers. Assemblies are held at the Devonshire Arms, a large and well-conducted inn and posting-honse, containing a spacious ball-room, in which also concerts and music meetings occasionally take place. The barracks, a neat and commodious building on the north side of the town, afford accommodation for 8 officers and 119 non-commissioned officers and men, with stabling for 61 horses, and are under the inspection of the barrack-master at Kinsale. Near the town is Castle Bernard, the seat of the Earl of Bandon; also many other gentlemen's seats, which with their extensive woods and plantations, particularly the hanging-woods to the east of the town and extending two miles beyond Innishannon (noticed by Spenser), impart to the scenery of the neighbourhood a high degree of richness and luxuriance of character.

The manufacture of camlets, stuffs, and other woollen goods, prevailed here to a great extent at the close of the last and beginning of the present centuries, and was succeeded by the spinning and weaving of cotton, which continued to flourish till 1825; spinning mills were erected on a large scale, and more than 1000 persons were employed in weaving, but both branches have fallen off, inasmuch that the mills are in ruins and not more than 100 weavers are employed. A manufacture of fine stuffs was introduced in 1835 by Mr. Scott, who erected a steam-engine for preparing the wool and spinning the yarn: this establishment affords employment to a number of operatives in the town and neighbourhood, and its produce has already obtained considerable celebrity for its superior texture. Here are several breweries; also two very large distilleries, one of which is capable of producing 200,000 gallons of whisky annually; the other was built by Maurice Fitzgerald, Esq., in 1835, and consumes annually 1400 barrels of malt and 5800 barrels of oats and barley, yielding 60,000 gallons of whisky. Connected with the latter is a large flour-mill, and there is another likewise on an extensive scale. This place has long been noted for the tanning of leather, which is in great demand; there are nine tanyards in active operation, employing more than 100 men. From the great consumption of the breweries, distilleries, and mills, very little grain is exported; the imports are coal, culm, timber (in which a considerable trade is carried on direct with St. John's, New Brunswick, and Quebec), and iron, which are brought in sloops to Colliers' Quay, three miles from the town, and thence by land carriage. Articles of domestic consumption are brought by land carriage principally from Cork. A canal from Colliers' Quay to Dunmanway has been at different times contemplated, and surveys have been made, but the design has not yet been carried into effect; a railway, also, has been projected from Rockpoint, four miles to the east, which, if brought through the town, would be of great benefit to its trade. A branch of the Provincial Bank of Ireland has been established here.

The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, the latter of which is the principal, and is abundantly supplied with provisions of all kinds; fairs are held on May 6th, Holy-Thursday, Oct. 29th, and Nov. 8th, for live stock and general merchandise. There are three convenient market-places, built at the expense of the Duke of Devonshire. The meat and fish markets, on the north side of the river, are held in a commodious building in the form of a polygon, surrounded by stalls, and forming a piazza for the market people: the potato, corn, and egg markets, on the south side, are held in an oblong edifice conveniently fitted up, and well adapted to its several uses. More than 20,000 eggs are sold here every week during the spring, and are conveyed to Cork to be shipped for England. The tolls of the town belong to the Duke of Devonshire, and, after the determination of a demise of them to the corporation in 1806, were paid until 1830, when his grace suspended the collection of them until some arrangement should be effected by the legislature. A regular and extensive intercourse is maintained between this town and Cork, for which city several stage-coaches leave daily, returning the same evening; the Cork and Bantry mail passes and re-passes daily, and every alternate day a stage-coach from Skibbereen to Cork runs through the town. There are also mail-coaches to Kinsale, Dunmanway, and Timoleague. In 1845 an act of parliament was passed for constructing a railway from Bandon to Cork, a distance of 20 British miles; the expense is estimated at £240,000, and the company are authorized to borrow £80,000 beyond that sum. In the excise arrangements the town is the head-quarters of a district; it is also a chief station of the constabulary police.

The inhabitants were incorporated by charter of the 11th of James I. (1614), and, by letters-patent of the 19th of Charles II. (1667), received a grant of lands in the baronies of Ibane and Barryroe. James II., in the 4th of his reign, granted a new charter founded on a seizure of the franchises, but it soon became inoperative. The corporation, which was dissolved by the act 3rd and 4th Victoria, was styled "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Bandon-Bridge;" and consisted of a provost, 12 burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen, assisted by a town-clerk and two sergeants-at-mace. It had also a common-council, constituted by a by-law of the corporation made in 1621, and which consisted of twelve members, who were elected from the freemen by the corporation at large, as vacancies occurred. The burgesses were chosen from the common-council, on vacancies occurring, by the provost and burgesses; and the provost was elected annually from and by the burgesses at Midsummer, and entered upon his office at Michaelmas: the provost and burgesses also appointed the town-clerk and sergeants-at-mace. The freedom was acquired by grace, by birth for the eldest son of a freeman, and by nomination of the provost, who during the year of his office had the privilege of naming one: the freemen were elected by a majority of the body at large, assembled in a court of d'oyer hundred; neither residence nor any other qualification was considered necessary. On the dissolution of the corporation, under the above act, any property it possessed became vested in the commissioners for lighting and paving the town. The borough sent two members to the Irish parliament prior to the Union, since which period it has returned one to the Imperial parliament. The right of election was formerly vested in the provost and burgesses only, but by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 88, was extended to the £10 householders; and a new boundary was at the same time formed for electoral purposes, closely encircling the town, and comprising an area of 439 acres. The number of voters registered in 1843 was 486. The quarter-sessions for the West Riding are held here in October; and petty-sessions for the division are held every Monday by the county magistrates. The court-house is a neat substantial building; and not far from it is a commodious county bridewell. Manorial courts for the recovery of debts under 40s. are held once in three weeks, respectively, by the seneschals of the different manors: the manor of Castle Mahon or Castle Bernard belongs to the Earl of Bandon; Coolfadda, to the Duke of Devonshire; and Clough McSimon, to the Earl of Shannon. The late corporation possessed lands under the patent of Charles II., amounting to about 1340 statute acres, which, having mortgaged at different periods, they finally disposed of with a view to pay certain debts in 1809.

The parish churches of Ballymodan and Kilibrogan are both in the town. The former is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance; it contains, however, a handsome monument to Francis Bernard, Esq., one of the justices of the court of common pleas, and an ancestor of the Earl of Bandon. The church of Kilibrogan, commonly called Christ Church, was begun in 1610 by Henry Becher, and finished by the first earl of Cork in 1623, as appears by a date on a stone in the south wall: it is a cruciform structure, and occupies the site of a Danish encampment; in the churchyard are the graves of three of Clancarty's soldiers, who were slain in the attempt to take the town for James II. In the Roman Catholic divisions this place is the head of a district which comprises the parishes of Ballymodan and Kilibrogan, and part of that of Desertserges: the principal chapel is a handsome edifice, built by subscription in 1796, and situated on an eminence in the south part of the town; there is also a chapel at Agrohil, in Kilibrogan. On an elevated site in the north part of the town is a convent of the Presentation order, established in 1829, and having attached a domestic chapel and a spacious schoolroom, in which, according to the season, from 200 to 400 poor female children are gratuitously instructed. There is a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the Synod of Munster; also places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, of which that for the latter is a large edifice. The classical school of Bandon was founded by the Earl of Boringdon: the master has a commodious residence, with suitable offices attached, and receives a salary of £40 per annum from the Duke of Devonshire. A suitable building in the old Cork road, comprising separate schoolrooms for boys and girls, and an infants' school, was erected at the expense of the Duke of Devonshire: the former, containing about 100 children, is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's foundation; and the latter, in which are 90 infants, by the joint contributions of the duke and the vector of the parish. A handsome school in Shannon-street, in which a number of girls and infants are gratuitously taught, was built in 1814 by the proceeds of a repository and by contributions, and is supported by subscriptions of the Duke of Devonshire and others. His grace has also built a school on Cavendish-quay, towards the support of which he subscribes £50 per annum, the remainder of the expenses being defrayed by local contributions; about 100 children are taught. Adjoining the Roman Catholic chapel is a school aided by a subscription of £30 per annum from the duke, in which 200 boys are taught; and the Wesleyan Methodists have three schools, in which a considerable number of children receive instruction: one for boys is supported by H. Cornwall, Esq. An infirmary, fever hospital, and dispensary are maintained in the customary manner. A savings' bank was established in 1817, and a handsome building was erected from the surplus funds in 1835. Several bequests have been made for the benefit of the poor. The workhouse, on a site of 6½ acres held at a rent of £13. 18s., was completed in 1841, at a cost of £6600, and is constructed to contain 900 paupers. Sir Richard Cox, an eminent statesman and historian, born in 1650; Dr. Nicholas Brady, who assisted Tate in composing a new version of the Psalms, born in 1659; and Sir William Jumper, a distinguished naval officer, were natives of this place. The town gives the titles of Earl, Viscount, and Baron to the family of Bernard, earls of Bandon; and the inferior title of Baron of Bandon-Bridge to the family of Boyle, earls of Cork and Orrery.—See BALLYMODAN and KILBROGAN.

BANGOR, a sea-port, market, and post town, and a parish, in the union of NEWTOWNARD, partly in the barony of LOWER CASTLEREAGH, but chiefly in that of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 11½ miles (N.E. by E.) from Belfast, 21 miles (N.) from Downpatrick, and 91½ miles (N. by E.) from Dublin; containing 10,060 inhabitants, of whom 3116 are in the town. The origin and early history of this ancient town are involved in some obscurity, and have been variously described by different writers. The most authentic records, however, concur in stating that, about the year 555, St. Comgall founded here an ABBEY of Regular Canons, which may have led to the formation of a town, if one did not exist previously, and over which he presided fifty years; he also died and was enshrined in it. Some time subsequently to the foundation of the abbey a school was established here under the personal direction of St. Carthagus, which in progress of time became one of the most eminent seminaries in Europe, and was resorted to by numbers of young persons of distinction from various parts; so that, according to some writers, when Alfred founded or restored the university of Oxford, he sent to the great school at Bangor for professors. In 613 the town was destroyed by fire, and in 674 the abbey was burnt. In the beginning of the ninth century they both suffered severely from the predatory incursions of the Danes, in one of which, about the year 818, these merciless marauders massacred the abbot and about 900 monks. In 1125 the abbey was rebuilt by Malachy O'Morgair, then abbot, with the addition of an oratory of stone, said by St. Bernard to have been the first building of stone and lime in Ireland, and from which this place, anciently called the "Vale of Angels," derived the name of Beanchoir, now Bangor, signifying the "White Church," or "Fair Choir." Malachy was soon afterwards appointed to the see of Connor, and held with it the abbacy of Bangor till his preferment to the archbishopric of Armagh.

The abbey continued to flourish, and was endowed with extensive possessions, which after the conquest were considerably augmented by the kings of England: amongst its lands was a townland in the Isle of Man, called Clenanoy, which the abbot held on the singular condition of attending the king of that island at certain times. In 1469, the buildings having fallen into decay through the abbot's neglect, Pope Paul II. transferred the possession of the abbey from the Regular Canons to the Franciscans, who continued to hold it till the Dissolution. After that period, a great part of its lands was either granted to or seized by the O'Nials, who kept possession till the rebellion of Con O'Nial in the reign of Elizabeth, when it was forfeited to the crown. James I., on his accession to the throne, found the northern part of Ireland in a deplorable condition, indeed almost depopulated; and in the third year of his reign, resolving to plant English and Scottish colonies in Ulster, he granted the site of the abbey, with all its former possessions in this county, to Sir James Hamilton, afterwards created Viscount Clanaboye, who brought over a large number of Scots from Dunlop in Ayrshire, accompanied by their own minister, Robert Blair. Blair, although a Presbyterian, was presented to the church living of Bangor, and ordained in 1623 according to the Presbyterian form, the Bishop of Down officiating as a presbyter: he was afterwards appointed Scottish chaplain to Charles I. From him were descended, Robert Blair, of Athelstaneford, author of the poem called The Grave; and the celebrated Hugh Blair, D.D., of Edinburgh; the former his grandson, and the latter his great-grandson. From Sir J. Hamilton are descended, either lineally or collaterally, the families of Bangor, Dufferin, Killileigh, and some others of principal note in Ulster. In 1689, the advanced army of William III. arrived here in seventy sail of transports under the command of Duke Schomberg, and disembarked at Groomsport, then a small fishing-village about a mile from the town, where they encamped for the night; being well received, and finding plenty of provisions, the transports, which had been furnished with supplies, sailed back to Chester for a reinforcement of troops.

The town is advantageously situated on the south side of Belfast Lough or Carrickfergus bay, and on the direct sea-coast road from Belfast to Donaghadee; it contains 622 houses, most of which are indifferently built, and is much frequented for sea-bathing during the summer. The streets are neither paved nor lighted, though kept very clean; and the inhabitants are but indifferently supplied with water. There is a public library; and an historical society has been formed in connexion with it. The cotton manufacture is carried on to a considerable extent in the town and neighbourhood, and affords employment to a great number of the inhabitants of both sexes in the weaving, sewing, and ornamental branches. It was established here in the finer branches, between the years 1783 and 1786, by George Hannay, who, if not the first, was at least one of the first persons who introduced that department of the manufacture into the north of Ireland. Two spinning-factories were subsequently erected under the patronage of the late Right Hon. Colonel R. Ward, who constantly resided here, and took an active interest in the improvement of the town. One of these was built in 1800 by two gentlemen from Scotland, who conducted it till 1813, when it was purchased by a company, who kept the concern in full work till 1826, when it became the property of one of the partners: the other, in which Colonel Ward held a share, and of which, on the dissolution of the partnership by the death of Mr. Hannay, he became sole proprietor, was built in 1804. A large number of persons find constant employment in these factories; and agents have been commissioned by the Glasgow merchants to get goods manufactured here, from the superior manner in which the weaving and sewing are executed in the houses of the lower classes in and near the town. The linen-trade is also carried on to a limited extent, chiefly for home consumption. The trade of the port is inconsiderable: black-cattle, horses, grain, and flax are exported; the imports are coal and timber. The bay is well sheltered, and affords good anchorage in deep water for vessels detained by an unfavourable wind; the harbour is capable of great improvement, although attempts made at the expense of individuals have failed. A small pier was built about the year 1760, by means of a parliamentary grant of £500 to the Corporation for promoting and carrying on the Inland Navigation of Ireland. The market is on Tuesday, but is not well attended: the market-house was built of late years, by the lords of the manor. Fairs for black-cattle, horses, and pedlery are held on Jan. 12th, May 1st, Aug. 1st, and Nov. 22nd. The only toll or custom which appears to have been ever paid was that of the "tongues" of cattle slaughtered in the market. A constabulary police force, and an establishment of the coast-guard in connexion with the Donaghadee district, are stationed here.

The inhabitants were incorporated by charter of the 10th of James I. (1613), under the style of "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Bangor." The corporation, previously to its dissolution in Oct. 1841 under the act of the 3rd and 4th of Victoria, cap. 108, consisted of a provost, 12 other free burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen, with two serjeants-at-mace, but of whom only one was latterly appointed. The provost was elected from and by the free burgesses annually on the Feast of St. John (June 24th), and were sworn into office at Michaelmas; the free burgesses were appointed, as vacancies occurred, by a majority of the provost and remaining free burgesses: there was no separate class of freemen distinct from the free burgesses. The property of the corporation is now vested in the guardians of the poor of the union of Newtownards, towards the liquidation of the rates. The borough returned two members to the Irish parliament until the Union, when the £15,000 granted in compensation for the abolition of its franchise were awarded in moieties to Henry Thomas, Earl of Carrick, and the trustees of the estate of Nicholas, Viscount Bangor: the right of election was confined to the provost and free burgesses, and the provost was the returning officer. The charter constituted the provost clerk of the market, and judge of a borough court of record, to be held every Saturday, with jurisdiction in personal actions to the amount of five marks; but it does not appear that this court has ever been held. Petty-sessions are held once a fortnight; and a manorial court every third Thursday before the senechal, with jurisdiction to the amount of £20, late currency: the proceedings are by attachment or civil bill. A court lect is held by the seneschal once a year, at which constables for the several townlands in the manor are appointed. The manor is held in moieties by Viscount Bangor and a member of the same family, Mr. Ward, who is the representative of the Earl of Carrick. The property of the dissolved corporation consists of several plots of ground, lying in various directions around the town, and containing altogether 59a. 1r. 18p., now occupied in very small lots and at low rents by 43 tenants, and producing a gross rental of £52.

The PARISH is bounded on the north by the bay of Belfast, and on the east by the Northern Channel; and contains the Copeland Islands, including which it comprises 17,097 statute acres, of which 12,597½ are in the barony of Ardes. The greater part is good arable and pasture land, mostly in excellent cultivation, especially the extensive estate of Portavo, and there are several others in the parish little inferior to it in point of husbandry; the farm-buildings are neat and comfortable, and the peasantry are of moral and very industrious habits. The first parochial ploughing society in Ireland was established here in 1816, by the exertions and under the patronage of J. Rose Cleland, Esq.: from it may be dated the origin of the North-East Farming Society, and the commencement of agricultural improvement in the north of Ireland. Bangor Moss is now nearly exhausted, and is gradually being brought into cultivation; but there is still a large extent of bog called Cotton, and in the townland of Ballow is a small bog in which were found the skeletons of several elks, the head of one of which, with the antlers measuring nine feet from tip to tip, is preserved in the Royal Institution at Belfast. Several streams on which are corn and flax mills intersect the parish, and there are three windmills for corn. The neighbouring bays produce a variety of fish; oysters of large size are taken in abundance. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and enriched in some parts with stately timber, chiefly fir and oak; and in the vicinity of the several gentlemen's seats are thriving plantations of beech, sycamore, ash, and poplar, of comparatively modern growth. The principal seats are, Ballyleidy, that of Lord Dufferin, a handsome and spacious mansion pleasantly situated in a rich and extensive demesne; Bangor Castle, late the seat of the Right Hon. Colonel Ward, surrounded with extensive grounds tastefully laid out; Crawfordsburn, of W. Sharman Crawford, Esq., M.P., situated on the shore; Portavo, of D. Kerr, Esq., in a well-planted and richly cultivated demesne; and Ballow and Rath-Gael House, both also embellished with thriving plantations. Slate is found in several parts, but has been only procured in one quarry, which has not been worked sufficiently deep to produce a quality capable of resisting the action of the atmosphere. There are likewise mines of coal, especially on the estate of Lord Dufferin, whose family opened and worked them some years ago on a small scale, since which time they have been abandoned; and a lead-mine was worked here to some extent about 40 years ago, in which copper-ore and manganese were also found.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Down, and in the alternate patronage of Viscount Bangor and Robert Ward, Esq., in whom the rectory is inappropriate. The parish is tithe-free, except two townlands, the property of Lord Dufferin, which pay a tithe rent-charge of £39. 5.; the curacy is endowed with £55. 8. 8. per annum by the impropricators. The old church was built near the site of the old abbey, in 1623, and a very neat tower and spire were subsequently added to it by a bequest of the late A. Moore, Esq., of Tyrone. In attempting to enlarge it, in 1832, the foundation was so much disturbed by injudicious excavations that it was found necessary to take the whole down, with the exception of the tower; and a spacious and handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture, was erected in the following year, at an expense of £935, which was defrayed by the parishioners, aided by subscriptions to a considerable amount from some of the landed proprietors. There is a very good glebe-house, built in 1776 by the then incumbent at a cost of £500; also a glebe of 12 Cunningham acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Newtownards; but there is no chapel within its limits. Here are two meeting-houses for Presbyterians: the first was built originally about the year 1650, but the congregation began the erection of a new and beautiful building in 1831; the other was built in 1829 by a new congregation: they are both in connexion with the General Assembly. The Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists have also each a place of worship; and there are numerous schools, of which eleven are Sunday schools: the first Sunday school in Ireland was formed at Rath-Gael in 1788, by J. R. Cleland, Esq. Here is a dispensary; a mendicity society is supported by subscription, and there are a friendly society and a savings' bank. Adjoining the town is a property called "Charity Lands," let for £42. 11. per annum, which is applied towards the support of some of the above institutions and to other charitable purposes. Of the ancient abbey there is only a small fragment remaining, in part of the garden-wall of the glebe-house. Near the quay is an old building supposed to have been used as a custom-house, and the tower of which has been converted into dwelling-houses. Vestiges of 25 raths and forts may be traced in the parish: the largest was Rath-Gael, or "fort of the strangers," which extended over more than two acres and was encompassed by a double vallum; part of it is now occupied by the plantations and house of that name. Druidical relics, also, have been frequently found in various parts of the parish. Christian O'Conarchy, the first abbot of Mellifont, was born at or near this place: he was consecrated bishop of Lismore about the year 1150, and was constituted the pope's legate in Ireland; he died in 1186. William Hamilton, a very ingenious poet, was also born here, in 1704; his works were printed in 12mo. at Edinburgh, in 1760, eight years after his death. Bangor gives the titles of Viscount and Baron to the family of Ward, to whom the town and a considerable portion of the parish belong.

BANGOR, a village, in the parish of KILCOMMON, union of BALLINA, barony of ERRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 10 miles (E. S. E.) from Belmullet: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the road from Castlebar to Belmullet, and contains two comfortable inns. Fairs are held on the 20th of Jan., Feb., March, and April, May 10th, June 11th, July 20th, Aug. 11th, Sept. 8th, Oct. 16th, Nov. 16th, and Dec. 11th; and here is a station of the constabulary police. The parochial Roman Catholic chapel of East Kilcommon is situated in the village. The surrounding country is mountainous, and grouse is abundant during the season. Near the village is the lake of Carramore, celebrated for its salmon and trout; it communicates with the bay of Tulloghane by the rivers Munning and Owenmore.—See KILCOMMON.

BANNOW, a parish, and formerly a corporate town and parliamentary borough, in the barony of BARGY, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. E. by E.) from Fethard; containing 2378 inhabitants. This parish is of a peninsular form, being bounded on the south-east by Ballyteigue bay, in St. George's Channel, and on the west by the bay or harbour of Bannow, which forms the estuary of the Scar river; it is situated near the new line of road along the east side of the mountain of Forth to Wexford. Bannow formed part of the territory originally granted by Dermot Mac Murrough, last king of Leinster, to Hervey, who accompanied Robert Fitz-Stephen in his expedition, which landed at Bag-and-bun bay, within sight of this place. From an early period after the English settlement, here was a town of some note, it being mentioned in the earliest charter of New Ross, by which, in the reign of Edward I., Roger Bigod granted to the burgesses of that town "as extensive privileges as were enjoyed by the men of Bannow, Kilkenny, or any other town in Leinster." The old town has long since disappeared: part of its site is covered with sand drifted from the sea, in some places to the depth of many feet; and the inequalities of the surface immediately adjoining the churchyard are supposed by some to be occasioned by the ruins of the town lying at a considerable depth, from which circumstance it has obtained the appellation of the Irish Herculaneum. It does not appear that there is any charter of the borough on record: there are extant numerous inquisitions, post mortem, of the reigns of James I. and Charles I., finding the seisin of certain parties in premises and reuts in the town and burgages, which appear to have been held in burgage tenure; but they make no mention of a corporation. Notwithstanding the decay, if not the total annihilation, of the town, it continued to send two representatives to the Irish parliament until the Union, when the £15,000 awarded in compensation for the abolition of the franchise were paid to Charles, Marquess of Ely, and Charles Tottenham, Esq., of Ballycurry, in the county of Wicklow. The names of St. Mary's, St. Tullock's, and St. Benedict's streets are retained on the quit-rent books of the crown, but their sites are merely conjectural. The only perceptible remains of antiquity are the ruins of a venerable church, situated within a walled inclosure at a short distance from the shore, and at an elevation of about 30 feet from the level of the sea: they are of considerable extent, and consist of the walls of the nave and chancel, surmounted by embattled parapets, and having two small chapels attached, the whole being unroofed. The east window of the chancel appears to have been in the decorated English style, and still retains some fragments of flowing tracery; the font was removed some years since to the Roman Catholic chapel at Danescastle, where it is preserved with care. There are many ancient tombstones in the churchyard, one of which records the death of a person named French, at the age of 140.

The PARISH comprises 6551 statute acres. The soil, though light, is fertile and in a high state of cultivation, the system of husbandry having greatly improved; the land is well adapted to the growth of corn; the situation is favourable for an abundant supply of sea manure, and has the advantages of navigation on both sides of the parish. The neighbourhood is thickly studded with comfortable farmhouses, decent cabins, and cottages of a superior description let to numerous families that resort hither during summer for the benefit of sea-bathing; the roads, also, throughout the parish are kept in excellent order. A lead-mine was worked to some extent by the late celebrated George Ogle, Esq., but since his death the works have been discontinued, it is said from the vein being exhausted. According to Mr. Frazer, in his statistical survey of the county, silver was anciently procured on the lands of Barrystown; but this silver-mine was probably the lead-mine worked by Mr. Ogle, which might have contained more than the usual proportion of silver, and have thence derived its denomination of silver-mine. The small farmers and the peasantry are comfortable in their circumstances, and highly exemplary in their manners. This is attributable to the active exertions of T. Boyse, Esq., and to the beneficial effects of an agricultural school established some years since by the Rev. W. Hickey, then vicar, under the auspices of S. Boyse, Esq., father of the above, who granted 40 acres of improvable land for that purpose. The pupils divided their time between the pursuits of study and agricultural labour; the best practical treatises on agriculture were adopted, and the most improved agricultural implements were in use: the school-house was built partly by a grant from the fund at the disposal of the lord-lieutenant, and the school was conducted by Mr. Hickey until his removal to another benefice. This gentleman has distinguished himself by many popular writings on agriculture and gardening, and in 1830 gave evidence of the efficiency of the establishment before a parliamentary committee.

BANNOW BAY produces an abundance of various kinds of fish, and is navigable for vessels of 120 tons' burthen. One side of the entrance to it is called the Isle of Bannow, it being connected with the main land only by an isthmus of sand; from this there is a ferry to the barony of Shelburne, and between the ferry and the little port of Fethard or Feathard, is Bag-and-bun bay, where Robert Fitz-Stephen landed his troops for the conquest of Ireland. The harbour or creek is an out-port of Wexford; and the business of the customs here, and of the bar of Lough at the south-eastern extremity of the parish, is transacted by an officer residing at Cullinstown, near the latter place. At Newtown is a quay where coal, culm, and Welsh slate are landed and stored; timber is also brought hither from Waterford, and corn is occasionally shipped here, though mostly sent to Wexford by land: limestone from Slade, on the eastern side of Hook peninsula, is brought up the bay in boats averaging from 14 to 20 tons' burthen. An agent of Lloyd's resides in the parish. At the har of Lough is a coast-guard station, being one of the five comprised in the Wexford district, and there is a small detachment at the Isle of Bannow. Off this bar, and about half a mile from the shore, are two small islands, called the Keroc Islands, on the larger of which a house was built a few years since by Mr. Boyse, as a temporary shelter for shipwrecked persons. The coast on both sides of the parish is much frequented, as already observed, for the purpose of sea-bathing; accommodation is partly afforded by the farmers, most of whom let their houses during the season. Some of the inhabitants are engaged in the herring and cod fishery. At Collinstown are the remains of a castle which about 80 years since was converted into a dwelling-house; the parapet and upper story have been taken down, and it has now the appearance of a modern building.

Ecclesiastically, Bannow is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, and forms part of the union of Kilcavan or Kilkevan; the rectory is inappropriate in the family of Colclough. The tithe rent-charge is £273. 13., of which £159. 4. 8. are payable to the improprator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church of the union is within the border of the parish of Kilcavan: the glebe-house, in this parish, about 2½ miles distant from the church, was built in 1823, by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £330 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Ballymitt, also called Bannow; the chapel is at Danescastle. On the decline of the agricultural school after the removal of Mr. Hickey, a private school, called the Bannow grammar school, for the preparation of young men for the Irish University, was established here by the Very Rev. H. Newland, D.D., Dean of Ferns. A dispensary is supported in the usual manner. About a mile from Danescastle is a small convent of Augustine friars, who are reputed to be the representatives of the more sumptuous monastery of that order, the ruins of which are among others in the neighbourhood of Clonmices: attached to it is a small but elegant chapel, erected in 1829.—See CARRIG.

BANSHA, or TEMPLEKERRY, a parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, union and county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Tipperary; containing 3700 inhabitants, of whom 378 are in the village. The village is pleasantly situated on the coach-road from Limerick, through Cahir, Clonmel, and Carrick-on-Suir, to Waterford, and contains 78 houses. A mill is worked by a stream from the river Arra. There is a receiving-house for letters to and from Clonmel and Tipperary; and a court-house has been recently built, in which petty-sessions are held every alternate Monday: here is also a station of the constabulary police. Fairs for cattle and pigs have been lately established, and are held on Feb. 17, April 16, Aug. 17, and Nov. 30. The PARISH is bounded on the south by the summit of part of the Galtee mountains; on the west, by Trinity College lands, and a stream which separates it from part of the parish of Kilsnane; on the north, by the parish of Clonfinglass and the river Arra; and on the east, by the parish of Clonbullogue. It comprises 12,840 statute acres, of which more than one-half is arable and pasture land, and the remainder mountain. The rivers Arra and Aherlow flow through the parish: the Arra is remarkable for its excellent trout, which are of a rich pink colour, and in season throughout the year; the Aherlow abounds with trout and eels, and frequently has salmon. A considerable portion of the Galtee mountains extends through the parish from east to west, ranging from 1558 to 2588 feet above the level of the sea; it is partly pasturable for sheep and goats and a few mountain cattle, producing various kinds of heath and fern, and abounding with grouse, hares, and rabbits. A portion of the Tipperary hills is also in the parish; these hills stretch in a direction parallel with the Galtees, and are much frequented by woodcocks and foxes. The intervening valley is very fertile and in a high state of cultivation. In the bogs near the base of the hills, have been found several large black oaks lying horizontally near the surface. The parish is well wooded throughout: on the Galtees is Ballydavid, an extensive wood of oak, beech, birch, larch, fir, and Weymouth pine; and on the Tipperary hills is Bannha Wood, abounding with thickset, beech, birch, fir, and oak. There are also several plantations; and nearly adjoining the village was a good nursery, which, however, has been lately broken up, and the land converted to other purposes. Limestone is the prevailing substratum, and is quarried for building, repairing the roads, and burning into lime for manure. A road from Cashel to Mitchelstown intersects the parish, and there are numerous other roads, kept in excellent repair: the projected line of the Waterford and Limerick railway, also, will pass through the parish. Among the seats is Lismacoe, a handsome mansion, pleasantly situated in a highly cultivated demesne embellished with stately avenues of lime and beech trees, which latter are considered to be the finest in the kingdom. Bannha Castle, an elegant building in the castellated style, and Aherlow Castle, are also prettily situated. Ash-Grove Castle, or Castle-Mary, the seat of the Rev. Trevor Lloyd Ashe, lord of the manor of Bannha, is a castellated mansion in the Italian style of architecture, situated at the base of the Galtee mountains, 4000 acres of which are attached to the estate: the mountain scenery is exceedingly wild and romantic, and the rich and well-wooded vale beneath presents a pleasing contrast with the grandeur of the adjacent heights. On the estate is an ancient well, dedicated to St. Berryheart, which is much frequented by the peasantry; and in the demesne is a small temple in the Grecian style, with pleasure-grounds attached, dedicated to the Virgin. About halfway to the summit of the mountains is Lake Mugrave, an extensive sheet of water, imbedded within rocks, whose frowning summits afford secure eyries to eagles, and retreats to other birds of prey.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, united from time immemorial to the rectory and vicarage of Graystown and the vicarage of Donohill, together constituting the corps of the precentorship of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of Bannha is £173. 1. 6., and the rent-charge of the whole benefice, payable to the incumbent, is £506. 10. 9.: the entire value of the precentorship, including glebe, is £554. 10. 9. The church is a neat building, to which a handsome spire was added in 1814, by aid of a loan from the Board of First Fruits; it contains a marble monument to William Baker, Esq., of Lismacoe. The glebe-house, near the church, is a commodious residence, built in 1793, at an expense exceeding £1000: the glebe contains nine acres, and there are also two pieces of ground in the parish of Donohill, containing 58a. 2r. 6p., belonging to the precentor, and let on lease at £7 rent and a renewal fine of £14 annually. The Roman Catholic parish is larger than that of the Established Church; the chapel, adjoining the churchyard, is a neat building. In the marsh lands have been found heads, horns, and skeletons of the moose-deer, one of which, of large dimensions, was found some few years since. The only relic of antiquity is a ruined wall, said to have formed part of the ancient castle of Bansha, but its history is quite unknown.

BANTEER, or BANTYRE, a village, in the parish of CLONMEEN, union of KANTURK, barony of DUBHALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (S.) from Kanturk; containing 137 inhabitants. It is seated on the Blackwater river, and on the road to Cork.

BANTRY, a sea-port, market and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of KILMACMOGUE, barony of BANTRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 47½ miles (W. S. W.) from Cork, and 173½ (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 4082 inhabitants. This place, called anciently Kilgoban, derived that name from St. Goban, its original founder or patron, and its present appellation, Bantry, from Beant-Mac-Farriola, a descendant of the O'Donovans and Mahonys, chieftains of the western portion of this country. During the insurrection of the Earl of Desmond, in 1581, Lord Barry and Goran Mac Swiney attacked the garrison here, but were repulsed with the loss of many of their men. In 1699, a French fleet entered the bay, and, being pursued by the English fleet under Admiral Herbert, bore down upon the latter in a line of 28 ships of war and 5 fire-ships, when a brisk action ensued, in which the English stood to sea in order to gain some advantage by manœuvring, and which terminated by the French admiral's returning into the bay. In 1691, a Dutch ship was captured in the bay by the native Irish in the interest of James II., but was retaken by Colonel Becher, with the loss, on the part of the Irish, of 36 men drowned and as many taken prisoners. In March of the same year, Sir David Colclier, with 300 men advanced to this place, where he encamped, and defeated a party of the Irish forces, of whom 70 were killed and 15 made prisoners: in the following May, some smaller skirmishes occurred here; and in June, Colonel Townsend with his forces killed 100 of the rapparees or insurgent marauders, and brought away a quantity of plunder. In 1697, a body of troops in the service of William III. arrived from Flanders, and landed in the harbour; and in 1796, a French fleet with 15,000 men intended for the invasion of Ireland appeared in the bay; but being dispersed by a storm, in which one-fourth of their ships were lost, they returned without attempting to make a descent upon the coast. In 1800, while the main body of the Channel-fleet was at rendezvous here, the crew of his Majesty's ship Temeraire, mutinied; but by the spirited firmness of the captain, Admiral Eyles, 20 of the ringleaders were seized, taken to Portsmouth, and tried, and 13 of them were executed at Spithead.

The town is situated at the northern extremity of the bay to which it gives name, in a small valley encircled by lofty mountains, which, attracting the clouds in their passage over the Atlantic, involve it in almost continual rains. Until lately it consisted of two parallel streets leading towards the bay, on opposite sides of the river, over which were two bridges, and of a cross street, affording communication between them; the river, however, has been lately arched over, so that what were formerly two streets now appear to be only one. The town is indifferently paved, and not lighted; the inhabitants are supplied with water from numerous springs.

VOL. I.—177

The approaches, with the exception of the new mail-coach road along the margin of the bay, are steep and incommodious, and are lined with cabins of very inferior description. Indeed, little improvement has been made in the town, except by the erection of some very extensive stores, the erection of some new houses, and the enlargement of the principal hotel, which now affords ample accommodation to the numerous tourists who, during the summer season, frequent this place on their way to Glengarriff and the lakes. A new and important line of road has been lately made from Kenmare to Bantry, through Glengarriff: it affords a view of some of the most beautiful scenery in this part of the kingdom, embracing Glengarriff and Bantry bay, of which latter it commands an extensive prospect; it forms a continuation of the new line from Killarney to Kenmare. New roads had previously been opened from this town to Skibbereen, which are highly advantageous to the neighbourhood; and other roads from Glengarriff to Cork are in contemplation. Nearly adjoining the town is Sea Court, the seat of Lord Viscount Bearhaven, situated on a gentle eminence commanding a magnificent view of the noble harbour and bay, with the lofty mountains on the opposite shore. The mansion is a spacious square edifice, considerably enlarged and beautified by the present owner in 1845; the walls throughout the interior are covered with tapestry, and it contains a fine collection of paintings, and some pieces of armour brought from Spain by the viscount. Immediately in front of it is the undulating and fertile island of Whiddy, formerly a deer-park, but now converted into valuable farms, and the picturesque appearance of which is heightened by the ruins of an ancient castle, built by the O'Sullivan's in the reign of Henry VI.; the eminence behind the house is finely planted, and the demesne, including an extensive deer-park, is tastefully laid out, and forms an interesting feature in the landscape.

The TRADE of the port was formerly very considerable, and the town had attained a high degree of commercial importance. Previously to the withdrawal of the protecting duties, the manufacture of coarse linen and cotton began to thrive here, and afforded employment to several hundred persons; these linens, here called "Vitries," were striped pieces chiefly used for haggings; and the sales frequently exceeded £4000 per annum. Butter, pork, and beef were formerly shipped from the port in great quantities, and about the year 1775, several cargoes of butter were sent annually to Portugal. The only manufacture at present is that of flour, of which the Bantry Mills are capable of producing 12,000 bags annually; a small porter-brewery was till lately carried on in the town, and at Donemarek are a brewery and some mills. A considerable trade prevails in corn raised in the neighbouring parishes, and since 1815 has been rapidly increasing; in a recent year, not less than 10,000 barrels of wheat, and 3000 barrels of oats, were shipped from this port to the English markets. The imports are tea, sugar, spirits, tobacco, iron, &c. A very lucrative pilchard-fishery was for many years conducted, but has long been discontinued, that fish having left the shores. The present fishery is principally confined to hake, for which 94 hookers are engaged, each carrying 15 men; but mackerel, herrings, and sprats are also taken. The fish are cured in houses formerly called fish palaces, and of late the sales of the three last kinds have produced more than £2000 per annum; they find a ready market within a circuit of 50 miles. The shores of the bay abound with a calcareous deposit, which forms a valuable manure, and which, about Glegariff and in other parts of the bay, is so thickly impregnated with coral as to be considered little inferior in strength to pure lime: a considerable number of men are employed in procuring it, and the quantity raised produces on the average more than £4000 per annum. In a recent year 31 vessels of the aggregate burthen of 1010 tons, principally laden with corn, cleared outwards from this port; and 26 vessels of the aggregate burthen of 814 tons entered inwards, of which number two were foreign ships laden with timber from America, and the remainder coasters with cargoes of salt, coal, earthenware, and iron. The bay is spacious, safe, and commodious for ships of any burthen.

The principal market is on Saturday, and is amply supplied with provisions of all kinds; there is also a market for provisions daily, and fairs are held on March 19th, May 1st, June 9th, July 15th, Aug. 21st, Oct. 15th, and Dec. 1st. Here is a chief constabulary police station. The resident magistrates sit every Thursday; and the quarter-sessions for the West riding of the county are held here in February. The court-house is a neat building ornamented with a cornice and pediment supported by two broad pilasters, between which is a handsome window; behind the edifice is the hridewell for the barony. The parish church, a neat structure in the early English style, with a lofty tower, is situated on the bank of the river, at the western extremity of the town; and on an eminence at the eastern extremity is a large Roman Catholic chapel, erected at an expense of £2500. There is also a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In the town are two school-houses, one erected by subscription, and the other by a bequest of £200 from the Rev. Dr. Crowley, late parish priest of Bantry; likewise a dispensary. The workhouse is on a site of six acres, was completed in 1842 at an expense of £5990, and is constructed to receive 600 paupers. Bantry gives the titles of Earl, Viscount, and Baron, in the Irish peerage, to the ancient family of White; the present earl having been created Baron in 1797, Viscount in 1800, and Earl of Bantry and Viscount Bearhaven in 1816.

BAPTIST GRANGE.—See GRANGE ST. JOHN.

BARNA, a village, in the parish of RAHOON, union, barony, and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (W.) from Galway. It is situated on the coast of Galway bay, and is noted for its butter and oats. A pier was built by Mr. N. Lynch, grandfather of the present proprietor of the estate, in 1799, and rebuilt in 1822; but being only indifferently constructed, it was destroyed in 1830, and partially rebuilt in the following year by the officer of the coast-guard, and the collector of Galway, with the aid of charitable funds at their disposal. In 1837 the Board of Works gave £1000, and A. H. Lynch, Esq., an equal sum, for the enlargement of the pier, which is now accessible to vessels of 100 tons' burthen. The village is in course of considerable improvement, and has a receiving-house for letters to and from Galway, and a coast-guard station forming one of the seven stations that constitute the district of Galway. The Roman Catholic chapel for the parish is situated here.—See RAHOON.

BARNAHELY, a parish, in the union of CORK, barony of KERRICKURRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Carrigaline; containing 1183 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the south-west shore of Cork harbour, and was anciently part of the possessions of Gill abbey: it comprises 895 statute acres, and is almost entirely under tillage, which is gradually improving. There is no waste: a tract of marshy land on the estate of Castle-Warren has been reclaimed, and is now applied to grazing. Some valuable limestone-quarries are worked, chiefly for burning. Ringaskiddy, or Ring, a small village on the shore, is resorted to in summer for sea-bathing: the building of boats and yachts is carried on here to some extent, and during the winter season a considerable number of yaws are engaged in fishing. Ballybricken, an elegant mansion, is delightfully situated on the margin of the harbour, of which it commands a most beautiful view; the grounds rise with a gentle acclivity, and are embellished with a profusion of fine timber. Prospect Villa is a little to the east of it; the grounds are well planted, and these two seats form prominent and attractive objects in every view of the harbour. Castle-Warren is a spacious mansion, erected in 1796, and incorporated with the ancient castle of Barnahely, said to have been built by Milo de Cogan, one of the early Norman settlers, who obtained extensive grants in this county, and is represented by local tradition to have been interred in the churchyard of this parish: the castle, a portion of which remains, belonged to the archdeacons of Monks-town in the middle of the 17th century. Several ornamental cottages also contribute to embellish the scenery of this beautiful district. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork: the entire tithe rent-charge, amounting to £75, is inappropriate in the Earl of Shannon. The Protestant inhabitants attend divine service at the church of Carrigaline. In the Roman Catholic divisions Barnahely forms part of the district of Passage; the nearest chapel is that of Shanbally, in the parish of Carrigaline. There is a Danish fort in good preservation on the lands of Prospect Villa; and as some labourers employed in the construction of a new line of road were cutting through a limestone rock, a short time since, they discovered in its cavities a number of marine shells, at a distance of at least two miles from the nearest part of the strand.

BARNANE, or BARNANEELY, a parish, in the poor-law union of ROSCREA, barony of IKERRIN, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 2½ miles (W. N. W.) from Templemore; containing 752 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Burris-o-leigh to Dunkerrin, and comprises 2167 statute acres: about 100 are common, 46 woodland, and the remainder principally arable. It includes the "Devil's Bit Mountain," so called from its form, which appears as if a bit had been taken out of it; this mountain rises 1583 feet above the level of the sea, and at the foot lies the demesne of Barnane, tastefully laid out and well planted, and within which are the ruins of the old parish church. Barnane is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and is part of the union of Fithmore: the tithe rent-charge is £78. 15.

BARONSTOWN, a parish, in the union of DUNDALK, barony of UPPER DUNDALK, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (W.N.W.) from Dundalk; containing 967 inhabitants. It is situated on the turnpike-road from Dundalk, by Castle-Blayney, to Monaghan, and comprises 2208½ statute acres. The lands are nearly all arable and pasture; the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture has been greatly improved; there is very little waste land, and not more bog than is sufficient to supply the inhabitants with fuel. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, with the curacies of Philipstown-Nugent, Kene, and Roche, united by act of council in 1755, forming the union of Baronstown, in the patronage of the Lord-Primate for three turns, and of the Dean and Chapter of Christ Church, Dublin, for one. The tithe rent-charge of Baronstown is £164. 13. 3., and the whole union produces to the incumbent a rent-charge of £310. 16. The church, a neat edifice with a tower and in good repair, is situated on an eminence at Philipstown-Nugent, nearly in the centre of the union; and almost adjoining it is the glebe-house, to which are attached 17 acres of profitable land. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly united with Philipstown-Nugent and Dunbin, forming the district of Baronstown, and partly included in that of Haggardstown; the chapel, called the chapel of Kilcurly, is close on the confines of this parish and of that of Dunbin. At Belrobin was an ancient castle, formerly the residence of a branch of the Bellew family; its site is now occupied by the residence and offices of one of the most extensive occupiers of land in the county. There is also a rath or fort at the same place, which has been planted; and another on the towland of Milltown.

BARR, a district parish, in the barony of OMAGH, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 1 mile from Trillick. This parish, which consists of twenty-two townlands, and is situated on the road from Enniskillen to Omagh, has been formed out of the parishes of Dromore, Donaghcavey, and Kilsillery. About one-half of the land is arable, and the remainder pasture with a small portion of wood: the soil on the low grounds is rich, but poor where the surface is wild and mountainous. The living is a district incumbency, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage, by turns, of the incumbents of Dromore, Donaghcavey, and Kilsillery. The church, a very plain edifice, was built in 1843 by the Rev. J. G. Porter, rector of the last-named parish, by whom, also, one townland was given for a glebe: a glebe-house is about to be built. There are many mineral springs in the neighbourhood.

BARR of INCH, DONEGAL.—See INCH.

BARRAGH, a parish, in the union of CARLOW, partly in the barony of UPPER ST. MULLINS, but chiefly in that of FORTH, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER; containing, with a part of the post-town of Newtown-Barry, 3742 inhabitants. It is situated upon the river Slaney, and on the roads from Myshall to Cloncal, and from Enniscorthy to Carlow; and comprises 13,294 statute acres. About 1600 acres are mountain and bog, 789 woodland, and the remainder arable and pasture; the state of agriculture is improving. Fine granite for building is found in the parish. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge is £519. 4. 8., of which £346. 3. are payable to the lessee of the appropriators. The church, situated at Kildavin, is a small edifice, built in 1815 by aid of a gift of £800 from the Board of First Fruits; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £123 for its repair. About twenty years since, Captain Nicholas Brown built a very spacious house, commanding a fine prospect, between the village of Kildavin and Newtown-Barry, but situated on an unreclaimed bog: this was purchased by a grant from the Board of First Fruits for a glebe-house, with the land, during the incumbency of the Rev. E. Pepper. The whole pays £42 annual rent to the landlord, the Hon. S. Maxwell, and £6. 6. to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: the bog has been drained at a heavy expense by the present incumbent, the Rev. Robert Cooper. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is, with the exception of one townland, included in the district of Clonegal or Moyacomb; there is a chapel at Kildavin. The estate of Clonmullen belonged to the Kavanaghs, but was forfeited in the war of 1641; it is said to have been the residence of Ellen Kavanagh, the heroine of the celebrated Irish ballad of Aileen Aroon. There are some remains of the old church, clad with ivy; the burial-ground is separated from them by a rivulet.—See NEWTOWN-BARRY.

BARRANAGH, an island, in the parish of KILMORE, union of BALLINA, barony of ERRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It lies on the western coast, in the harbour of Elly, and comprises 63 acres.

BARRETT'S-GRANGE, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (S.E.) from Fethard; containing 424 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1056 statute acres. It is in the diocese of Cashel, and is one of the parishes that constitute the union of Killenale, to which the rectory is annexed: the tithe rent-charge is £36. 15.

BARRINGTON'S-BRIDGE, a village, in the parish of CLONKEEN, union of LIMERICK, barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (E.) from Limerick: the population is returned with the parish. This place is situated on the road from Limerick to Abington, and on the river Mulken, over which is an elegant bridge of one arch of cast iron, from which the village derives its name. The surrounding country is fertile, and the scenery agreeably diversified and embellished with modern cottages and substantial farmhouses, mostly with gardens and orchards attached to them. Though small, the village has a pleasing and cheerful aspect; there are a neat and commodious hotel, and a receiving-house for letters from Limerick; and it is a chief station of the constabulary police. At a short distance is the ancient parish church, in the Norman style, the western entrance of which presents some very beautiful details.—See CLONKEEN.

BARRY, a village, in the parish of TASHINNY, union of LONGFORD, barony of ABBEYSHAUL, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (W. S.W.) from Colehill; containing 125 inhabitants. It is situated on the road to Ballymahon, and is a station of the constabulary police. Fairs are held on January 27th, April 28th, July 28th, and October 27th.

Near the village was formerly an ancient castle, of which only some trifling vestiges can be traced; and in the immediate vicinity is a high moat.—See TASHINNY.

BARTRA, or BARTRACH, an island, in the parish of KILLALA, union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (S. E.) from Killala: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated at the mouth of the river Moy, forming part of the coast of the harbour of Killala, and comprises 316½ statute acres. At the south-east end is the bar of Moy, on which there are only three feet of water.

BASLICK, a parish in the union and barony of CASTLEREA, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (N. E.) from Castlereagh; containing 3608 inhabitants. This parish, which was anciently called Baileac-mor, is situated on the road from Elphin to Castlereagh, and comprises 15,395½ statute acres. According to the Annals of the Four Masters and other authorities, here was an abbey in the time of St. Patrick, of which St. Sacell was abbot or bishop; and in the year 800, St. Cormac, its abbot, died here. The state of agriculture is almost wholly unimproved: there is little woodland, except in the demesnes of the several seats; of the remainder of the parish, about three-fourths are arable and one-fourth pasture, or what is called "Bottom" land. There are several quarries of limestone, used in constructing fences. Fairs are held at Castle-Pinnicket on the first Thursday in May (O. S.) and on Aug. 13th and Oct. 11th. Baslick is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and forms part of the union of Kilkeevan and corps of the prebend of Ballintobber; the rectory is inappropriate in the Earl of Essex. The tithes rent-charge is £262. 10., payable in moieties to the improprator and the vicar. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a small building on the town-land of Kilmurry. The remains of the parish church are situated within a cemetery inclosed by iron-railings and still used for interment.

BATTERSTOWN.—See RATHREGAN.

BATTLEBRIDGE, a village, in the parish of TUMNA, union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6½ miles (N.) from Carrick-on-Shannon; containing 147 inhabitants. It is seated on the river Shannon, over which is a bridge leading to the county and to the town of Leitrim; there are 24 houses.

BAULICK.—See BUOLICK.

BAUNROSMORE, an island, in the parish of KILLALA, union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It is situated in Killala bay, and comprises 9½ acres: near it is Baunrosbeg, an islet of small extent, not exceeding an acre.

BAUNSKHAHA, a village, in the parish of JERPOINT WEST, union of KILKENNY, barony of GOWRAN, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (E.) from Knocktopher; containing 168 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Thomastown.

BAURROE, a village, in the parish of FEAKLE, union of SCARIFF, barony of LOWER TULLA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Scariff; containing 121 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Gort to Tulla.

BAWN, or BLACKNOW, a grange, in the union of KILKENNY, barony of GALMOY, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER. It is also called Baunrichen, and is said to have been part of the possessions of the monastery of Fertagh. In ecclesiastical matters it is one of the denominations which constitute the union of Burnchurch, in the diocese of Ossory. Fairs are held on Ascension-day, July 8th, Sept. 8th, and Oct. 29th.

BAWNBOY.—See KILSUB.

BAYLIN, a village, in the parish of BALLYLOUGHLOE, union of ATHLONE, barony of CLONLONAN, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (E.) from Athlone, on the road to Mullingar. It is a constabulary police station; and a manorial court is held on the first Monday in every month. A school-house was built here by Lord Castlemaine, who endowed it with an acre of land, and the school is supported by his lordship and Lady Castlemaine. There is a mineral spring in the village, strongly impregnated with iron.—See BALLYLOUGHLOE.

BEAGH, of ST. ANNE'S, a parish, in the union of GORT, barony of KILTARTAN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, containing, with part of the post-town of Gort, 5751 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the confines of the county of Clare, and on the road from Galway and Loughrea to Ennis. A monastery of the third order of Franciscans was founded here about the year 1441, but by whom is unknown: in an inquisition of the 28th of Elizabeth it is denominated a cell or chapel, and its possessions appear to have consisted of half a quarter of land, with its appurtenances and tithes, which had been long under concealment. The parish comprises 14,581½ statute acres; there is a large tract of waste land and bog, with much limestone. Loughcooter Castle is the splendid seat of Viscount Gort. Large fairs for cattle, sheep, and pigs are held at the village of Toberindony, on July 12th, and Sept. 20th. Beagh is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, united with a portion of the rectory, and forming part of the union of Ardbrann; the remaining portion of the rectory is appropriate to the see. The tithes rent-charge is £163. 11., of which £29. 1. 6. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who now receive the bishop's share, and the remainder to the incumbent. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a new building. Here are the remains of the ancient castles of Fidan and Ardameilvan; those of the former are in good preservation, and very massive. At a place called the Punch-bowl, the Gurtamackin river first disappears under ground.

BEATÉ-MARIE-DE-FORÉ.—See FEIGHAN OF FORÉ, ST.

BEAULIEU, county KILKENNY.—See OWNING.

BEAULIEU, a parish, in the poor-law union of DROGHEDA, barony of FERRARD, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (E. by N.) from Drogheda; containing 688 inhabitants. This place was occupied by Sir Phelim O'Neil and the insurgent forces during the siege of Drogheda, which was defended by Sir Henry Tichborne, one of the lords justices of Ireland, who, on the forfeiture of the estate by the Plunkett family, purchased and obtained a grant of it from Charles II.; the Rev. Alexander Johnson Montgomery, his descendant by the female line, is the present proprietor.

The parish is situated at the estuary of the river Boyne, on the eastern coast, and comprises 873 statute acres. Beaulieu House, a stately mansion, was built by the lady of Sir H. Tichborne: it is situated in an extensive and finely planted demesne, bounded on the south by the Boyne, and containing an ornamental sheet of water; a very handsome lodge has been erected, and is the residence of the Rev. Edward Groome, rector of the parish. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Lord-Primate: the tithe rent-charge is £85. The church, a neat structure with a tower, was built by aid of a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1807. A good gallery was added in 1845, partly by the rector, and partly by subscriptions collected by his lady before her death in February in that year; and the pulpit and reading-desk have lately been removed to either side of the communion-table, so as to face the new gallery, at the expense of the Lord-Primate: a seraphine organ has also been put up. There are some marble monuments to the Montgomery family; one to the Donagh family, of Newtown; and a very handsome one of black and white marble, in the front of the gallery, to the memory of Mrs. Groome, wife of the rector, with a suitable inscription. In the churchyard is a curious stone with the figure of a skeleton in high relief, and the date, apparently 1117. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Termonfeckan. The parochial school, of 10 boys and 10 girls, is aided by an annual donation from the rector, and the master has a house and land from the Rev. A. J. Montgomery.

BEAUMONT, a village, in the parish of KILSHARVAN, union of DROGHEDA, barony of LOWER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (E.) from Duleek. This village is situated on the road from Duleek to Laytown, and on the Nanny water, which is crossed by a stone bridge. Here is an extensive flour and oatmeal mill, with six pairs of millstones and a steam-engine of 20-horse power; it was recently erected, and is fitted up with the most improved machinery.—See KILSHARVAN.

BECAN, or BEKAN, a parish, in the union of CASTLEREA, barony of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Ballyhaunis; containing 5589 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Claremorris to Frenchpark, and comprises 15,372½ statute acres, principally under tillage, with the exception of a few grazing-farms. The river Robe has its source within the limits of the parish. Becan is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tnam, and is part of the union of Kiltullagh: the tithe rent-charge is £95. 11. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a plain thatched building. There are some ruins of the old church, with a burial-place annexed, which is still used.

BECTIVE, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of UPPER NAVAN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Navan; containing 602 inhabitants. This parish, called also De Beattidine, was granted by Charles I. to Sir Richard Bolton, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in 1639, and is now the property of his descendant. It derived considerable celebrity from a Cistercian monastery founded here, in 1146 or 1152, by Murchard O'Melaghlin, King of Meath, and which was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and richly endowed. This establishment, the abbot of which was a lord in parliament, continued to flourish; and in 1195, by order of Matthew, Archbishop of Casbel, at that time apostolic legate, and John, Archbishop of Dublin, the body of Hugh de Lacy, which had been for a long time undiscovered, was interred here with great solemnity: his head was placed in the abbey of St. Thomas, Dublin. In the same year, the Bishop of Meath, and his archdeacon, with the prior of the abbey of Duleek, were appointed by Pope Innocent III. to decide a controversy between the monks of this abbey and the canons of St. Thomas, Dublin, respecting their right to the body of De Lacy; the decision was in favour of the latter. This Hugh de Lacy, who was one of the English barons that accompanied Henry II. on his expedition for the invasion of Ireland, received from that monarch a grant of the entire territory of Meath, and was subsequently appointed chief governor of the country. He erected numerous forts within his territory, encouraging and directing the workmen by his presence, and often labouring in the trenches with his own hands. One of these forts he was proceeding to erect at Durrrow, in the King's county, in 1186, on the site of an abbey; but this profanation of one of their most ancient and venerable seats of devotion so incensed the native Irish and inflamed their existing hatred, that whilst De Lacy was employed in the trenches, stooping to explain his orders, a workman drew out his battle-axe, which had been concealed under a long mantle, and at one blow smote off his head. The abbey of Bective and its possessions, including the rectory, were surrendered in the 34th of Henry VIII., and were subsequently granted to Alexander Fitton.

The parish, which is situated on the river Boyne, and on the road from Trim to Navan, comprises 3385½ statute acres, chiefly under tillage; the system of agriculture is improved, and there is neither waste land nor bog. Limestone of very good quality is abundant, and is quarried both for building and for burning into lime, which is the principal manure. Bective House is a handsome modern residence, pleasantly situated on the bank of the river. The parish is in the diocese of Meath. The rectory is inappropriate in the family of Bolton. There is no church; the Protestant parishioners attend divine service in the neighbouring parishes of Kilmessan and Trim. In the Roman Catholic divisions Bective is included in the district of Navan; the chapel, at Robinstown, is a neat modern edifice. The ruins of the abbey occupy a conspicuous site on the west bank of the river, and have a very picturesque appearance; they consist chiefly of a lofty square pile of building, the front of which is flanked by a square tower on each side. The walls and chimneys of the spacious hall, and part of the cloisters, are remaining; the latter present a beautiful range of pointed arches resting on clustered columns enriched with sculpture, and displaying some interesting details. There are also some picturesque remains of an ancient chapel in the vicinity. Bective gives the inferior title of Earl to the Marquess of Headfort.

BECTIVE-BRIDGE, a village, in the parish of BALSOON, union of TRIM, barony of LOWER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (E.N.E.) from Trim. This place is situated on the road from Dunshaughlin to Athboy, and on the river Boyne, over which is a stone bridge connecting it with the parish of Bective, from which circumstance it derived its name. It has two annual fairs; one on the 16th of May, principally for dry cows and young heifers, which is well attended; and the other on the 1st of November, chiefly for cattle and pigs.—See BALBOON.

BETLE ISLANDS, in the parish and barony of BURRISHOLE, union of WESTPORT, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; comprising $3\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres.

BEG-ERIN, or BEGRIN, a small island, in the parish of ARDCOLM, union of WEXFORD, barony of SHELMALIER, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Wexford. This island, the name of which signifies in the Irish language "Little Ireland," is situated in the northern part of Wexford harbour, and was, at a very early period, distinguished as the residence of St. Ibar, or Ivore, who, according to Ware and Archdall, founded here, in 420, a celebrated monastery for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, over which he presided till his death. He also established a school, in which he instructed numerous scholars in sacred literature and various sciences; and in such reputation was he for learning, as well as for the sanctity of his life, that he obtained the appellation of Doctor Begerenis: he died on the 23rd of April, in the year 500, and was interred in the monastery. St. Eogrus, in his litany, invokes 150 saints, all of whom were disciples of St. Ibar. Of this monastery there are now no vestiges, unless the ruins of a small chapel, of which the rudeness of the masonry indicates a very remote antiquity, may be regarded as such. In 1171, Robert Fitz-Stephen, after having been deceived into the surrender of his castle of Ferry-Carrig, was, with such of his garrison as had not been perfidiously put to death, brought to this place, where they were detained prisoners till the landing of Henry II. at Waterford, soon after which they were liberated by the efforts of that monarch. The island was, in 1549, alienated by a fee-farm lease, at a rent of seven shillings, to James Devereux, and is now occupied by Henry Cooper, Esq., who has built a handsome rustic cottage for his residence, which is surrounded with thriving shrubberies and plantations. Mr. Cooper has made several improvements in farming and embanking; and his family, with one or two of his workmen, constitute the whole of the population of the island.

BEGGARSBRIDGE.—See ROCHFORD-BRIDGE.

BEGGARS-BUSH, a village, in the parish of DONNYBROOK, union of SOUTH DUBLIN, barony and county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E.) from the General Post-office of Dublin; containing 855 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Dublin, via the Grand Canal docks, to Ball's-Bridge; and near it is the recruiting depot of the district.

BEG-INNIS, or BEGNERS ISLAND, in the parish of CAHRI, county of CAHIRIVEEN, barony of IVERAGH, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, lying near the north-east end of the island of Valencia: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated nearly in the centre of the chief entrance to the harbour of Valencia on the western coast, from which island it is separated by a channel varying in breadth from one-eighth to one-half of a mile. The area is about 330 statute acres. An opening to the north, called Lough Kay, has deep water, but is much exposed to the great ocean swell: the south-eastern shore of the isle is covered with a fine shell sand, which forms a valuable manure, and is conveyed in boats to a considerable distance. There is a quarry of slate, in the working of which the greater portion of the inhabitants are employed. Nearly in the centre of the island is a remarkable conical hill, called the Sugar Loaf.

BELAN, a parish, in the union of ATHY, barony of KILKEA and MOONE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Ballytoe; containing 286 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Dublin to Castledermot, and comprises 1197 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. Belan House, the late seat of the Earl of Aldborough, was an extensive pile of building, situated at the foot of Bolton hill, and occupying the site of an ancient castle that belonged to a branch of the Fitzgerald family and was destroyed by Cromwell in the parliamentary war. This mansion, which has been lately thrown down, contained an ancient bed, in which James II. and William III. successively slept in the year 1690. Belan is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, and is part of the union of Timolin: the tithe rent-charge is £76. 17. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Castledermot.

BELANAGARE, a village, in the parish of KILCORREY, union and barony of CASTLEREA, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Frenchpark; containing 209 inhabitants. This place is situated on the mail-coach road from Longford to Ballina, and consists of 33 houses, several of them neatly built. It was formerly the residence of the O'Connor Don, who lately removed to a new lodge in the immediate neighbourhood, since which the village has been neglected: the old mansion, now in ruins, was an irregular building with numerous gables and tall chimneys, and surrounded with stately trees. The scenery is interesting, and the roads leading to the village are shaded by trees growing in the hedge-rows. Fairs are held on Jan. 6th, and the first Wednesdays in March, Aug., and Nov.; the January fair is noted for young horses and for pigs. Petty-sessions are held here irregularly. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel is situated in the village, and was built by the late O'Connor Don, in 1819; the roof is covered with sandstone slate found in the neighbourhood.—See KILCORREY.

BELCARRA, a village, in the parish of DRUM, union of CASTLEBAR, barony of CARRA, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S.) from Castlebar: the population is returned with the parish. This place, which is on the road from Castlebar to Hollymount, and comprises about 35 houses, is a constabulary police station, and has fairs on Feb. 2nd, June 4th, and Nov. 10th. It contains the parish church and a Roman Catholic chapel. In the immediate vicinity is Elm Hall, once the seat of Lord Tyravell, but now in ruins.—See DRUM.

BELCLARE, or BELCLARE-TUAM, a parish, in the union of TUAM, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Tuam, on the road to Headfort; containing 2663 inhabitants. A monastery of Franciscan friars was founded here, at Tampil na Braher, in 1291. The parish comprises 7847 statute acres, and includes the hill of Knockman, commanding a delightful view: there are two extensive bogs, parts of which are reclaimable; and large quantities of limestone. Agriculture is in a backward state. Belclare is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and, with a portion of the rectory, forms part of the union of Tuam; the other portion of the rectory is appropriate to the deanery of Tuam. The tithe rent-charge is £176. 5., of which one-half is payable to the dean, and the other to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Clare-Tuam, comprising the parishes of Belclare, Kilmoylan, and Kilmacraea, and containing two chapels situated respectively in Belclare and Kilmacraea, besides a private chapel at Silane; the first is a good slated building, lately erected.

BELCOE, a village, in the parish of BOHOE, union of ENNISKILLEN, barony of GLENAWLEY, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, 9 miles (W. S. W.) from Enniskillen: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated near Lough Macnean, on the confines of the county of Cavan, and has fairs on April 5th, June 5th, Aug. 5th, Oct. 6th, and Nov. 26th. Here is a noted well, called Darugh Phadric.—See BOHOE.

BELFAST, a sea-port, borough, market-town, and parish, and the head of a union, partly in the barony of LOWER, but chiefly in that of UPPER, BELFAST, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 8 miles (S. by W.) from Carrickfergus, 13½ (S. E. by E.) from Antrim, and 80 (N.) from Dublin; containing, in 1821, 44,177, in 1831, 60,388, and in 1841, 75,308 inhabitants, of which last number, 70,447 were within the municipal boundary, and 63,625 in the parliamentary borough. At a very early period this place obtained, according to some writers, the appellation of Beala-farsad, which has been supposed to signify "Hurdlesford town;" and according to others that of Bela-fearad, "the town at the mouth of the river;" a name accurately descriptive of its situation on the river Lagan, near its influx into the lough or bay of Belfast. But perhaps a still more probable conjecture is that which ascribes its etymology to the Irish Ball-Fosight, signifying "the town with a ditch or foss;" for it appears that, from its low situation, a foss was anciently constructed round the town, to protect it from the tide. Previously to the English conquests in the province of Ulster, it seems to have been a fortified station commanding the passage of the river, which is here fordable at low water, and to have been important also from its position on the line between the ancient stations of Carrickfergus and Ardes respectively in the counties of Antrim and Down, between which the Lagan has ever been regarded as the boundary. The original fort, the site of which is now occupied by St. George's church, was taken and destroyed about the year 1178, by John de Courcy, who soon after erected a noble CASTLE on a more eligible spot. King John, also, marched his army to this place, in 1210; but no notice of any town occurs till the year

1316, when the destruction of the town and castle by Edward Bruce is recorded. The Irish chieftains, having by his aid recovered their ancient territories, rebuilt the castle, of which, through the intestine divisions in England and their union with the English settlers in Ulster, they kept uninterupted possession for nearly two centuries, till the reign of Henry VII., when the Earl of Kildare, at the head of a large army, in 1503, took and destroyed the town and castle. The latter was soon afterwards repaired by the native chieftains; but their forces were again driven from it by the earl, in 1512, and compelled to retire to the mountains. From this period Belfast remained in a ruined and neglected state, till the year 1552, when Sir James Crofts, lord-deputy, repaired and garrisoned the castle. During the same year the Irish of Ulster again appeared in arms, under the command of Hugh Mac Nial Oge; but the English government offered terms of accommodation which that chieftain accepted; and, swearing allegiance to Henry VIII., he obtained a grant of the castle and town of Belfast, with other extensive possessions. After the death of Hugh, who was killed in 1555 by a party of Scottish marauders, his possessions passed to other branches of his family, with the exception of the castle, which was placed in the custody of Randolph Lane, an English governor; in the 13th of Elizabeth it was granted, with its dependencies, to Sir Thomas Smythe and his son, on condition of their keeping a certain number of horse and foot in readiness to meet at Antrim after a brief notice, to attend upon the lord-deputy. In 1573 the Earl of Essex visited the fortress, which the Irish had previously, on different occasions, frequently attempted to take by surprise; and in 1575 the Lord-Deputy Sydney encountered the Irish forces at the ford of this place. About that period, Belfast is said to have had a forest and some woods, of which all traces have long since disappeared. After the death of Elizabeth, the garrison, influenced by Hugh O'Nial, Earl of Tyrone, refused submission to the English crown; but, on the defeat of that powerful leader and his adherents, the English gained the ascendancy, and Sir Arthur Chichester, lord-deputy in the reign of James I., issued his summons requiring the supplies of horse and foot, according to the tenure by which the castle was held; and no one appearing in answer to this requisition, the castle and demesne became forfeited to the crown, and were given to Sir Arthur in 1612.

Prior to the civil war in 1641, the town had attained a considerable degree of commercial importance, and was the residence of many merchants and men of note; but the inhabitants, being chiefly Presbyterians, suffered severely for refusing to conform to the Established Church; numbers of them left the kingdom, and those who remained embraced the parliamentary interest. One immediate local effect of this rebellion was the suspension of all improvements, but the town was saved from actual assault by the defeat of the rebels near Lisburn; and, while the insurgents were overpowering nearly all the surrounding country, Belfast was kept in security by the judicious arrangements of Sir Arthur Tyringham, who, according to the records of the corporation, cleared the water-courses, opened the sluices, erected a draw-bridge, and mustered the inhabitants in military array. In 1643 Charles I. appointed Colonel Chichester governor of the castle, and granted £1000 for the better fortification of the town, which now threw aside its Presbyterian spirit, and, while the people of the adjacent country were joining the Scottish covenants, alone maintained a firm adherence to the royal interest. The royalists in Ulster, anticipating an order from the parliament for a forcible imposition of the Scottish covenant, assembled here to deliberate upon the answer to be returned to General Monroe, commander of the Scottish forces in Ireland, when required to submit to that demand; but the latter, being treacherously informed of their purpose, and favoured by the darkness of the night, marched to Belfast with 2000 men, surprised the town, and compelled them to retire to Lisburn. The inhabitants were now reduced to the greatest distress; Colonel Hume, who was made governor of the castle for the parliament, imposed upon them heavy and grievous taxes, and the most daring of the Irish insurgents were constantly harassing them from without. After the decapitation of Charles I., the presbytery of this place, having strongly expressed their abhorrence of that atrocity, were reproachfully answered by the poet Milton; and the Scottish forces of Ulster having, in common with the covenants of their native country, embraced the royal cause, the garrison kept possession here for the king. But General Monk, in 1648, seized their commander, Monroe, whom he sent prisoner to England, and having assaulted Belfast, soon reduced it under the control of the parliament, who appointed Colonel Maxwell governor. In 1649, the town was taken by a manoeuvre of Lord Montgomery; but Cromwell, on his arrival in Ireland, despatched Colonel Venables, after the massacre of Drogheda, to reduce it, in which enterprise he succeeded.

On the abdication of James II., the inhabitants fitted out a vessel, and despatched a congratulatory address to the Prince of Orange, whom they afterwards proclaimed king; but, within a few days, James's troops having obtained possession of the place, many of the inhabitants fled to Scotland and elsewhere for safety, and several of the principal families were placed under attainer. Upon the landing of Duke Schomberg at Bangor, however, on Oct. 13th, 1689, with an army of 10,000 men, the Irish forces evacuated the town, which Colonel Wharton entered in the name of King William. A reinforcement of 7000 well-appointed troops from Denmark shortly after joined the forces of Schomberg, which had encamped under the walls; and on June 14th, 1690, the king arrived in person, and issued from this town a proclamation to the army, forbidding them to lay waste the country. The king remained for five days at Belfast, whence he proceeded to the Boyne by way of Hillsborough, and on his march he issued an order to the collector of the customs at Belfast, to pay £1300 per annum to the Presbyterian ministers of Ulster, which grant was the origin of the more extensive royal bounty at present paid to that body. The castle was destroyed by an accidental fire in 1708, and has not been rebuilt. In 1715, on the threatened invasion of the Pretender, the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood formed themselves into volunteer corps for the better defence of the country; in 1745 they again had recourse to arms; and in 1760, by their prompt muster, in conjunction with the people of the surrounding country, they saved their town from the French under Thurot. He had landed at Carrickfergus, intending to surprise Belfast; but, overawed by the muster of 12,000 men, posted within two miles of Carrickfergus on the road to Belfast, he hastily re-embarked, after having obtained a considerable supply of brandy, wine, and provisions from the merchants of that town. The formation of the Irish volunteers, induced all the principal young men of Belfast again to accoutre themselves, and they assumed a formidable political attitude, until suppressed with the rest of that body. Notwithstanding the powerful excitement which prevailed towards the close of the 18th century, and although Belfast was the centre of motion to the northern union, it was preserved in peaceable subjection by the precaution of government in placing in it a strong military force: the spirit of disaffection had nevertheless diffused itself considerably, and seven individuals were executed here for treason. With the exception of commercial difficulties, from which, however, this town has suffered less than any other of equal importance in the kingdom, few circumstances have occurred in modern times to retard its progress; and it is now the most flourishing in the island, celebrated alike for its manufactures and commerce, and for the public spirit of its inhabitants in the pursuit of literature and science, and in the support of benevolent institutions.

The town is advantageously situated on the western bank of the river Lagan; a long narrow bridge of 21 arches, erected in 1686, connecting it until lately with the suburb of Ballymacarrett in the county of Down, and the river expanding below into the noble estuary called Belfast or Carrickfergus Lough. This bridge has been taken down, and a new bridge, called Queen's bridge, erected on its site, at a cost of £27,000. The new structure consists of five segmental arches, each fifty feet in span, and has foot-paths, and a breadth of carriage way of thirty feet; it is of superior granite, obtained in large blocks from the neighbourhood of Newry, and was completed in 1842. Another bridge over the Lagan into the county of Down had been previously erected, and there is a third at some distance to the south. The general appearance of the town is cheerful and prepossessing; the principal streets and squares, which are well formed and spacious, are macadamised, and the footpaths are mostly flagged with Carlow stone of hard substance and blue colour, and in a few instances are laid with asphalt; some streets are paved with wood. The houses are handsomely built of brick, and slated; and several new squares, terraces, and ranges of building have been recently erected, making the total number of houses within the municipal boundary 12,068, and throughout the entire town and suburbs 12,875. The town is lighted with gas from works belonging to a company established by act of parliament in 1822. The inhabitants, previously to 1795, were but scantily supplied with water; but the late Marquess of Donegal then granted to the trustees of the Incorporated Charitable Society a lease, for 61 years, of all the springs of water on his estate; and in 1805 the Malone springs were purchased, and the water brought to the town at an expense of £3650. In 1817 an act was obtained, under the authority of which the trustees appointed water applotters, who took upon themselves the whole management, and now receive the rates, paying to the society £750 per annum. A supply of water is also obtained from new water-works, connected with streams originating about Cave Hill, of which the reservoir is from 100 to 130 feet above the level of the town.

Though situated little more than six feet above high-water mark of spring tides, the town is considered healthy, the air being pure and salubrious; and the surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and in many parts picturesque. An extended range of mountains, 1100 feet in height, rises at the distance of two miles to the north-west; and within the limits of the parish is Divis mountain, 1567 feet above the level of the sea at low water. The views down the lough in a north-eastern direction are strikingly beautiful, the shores on both sides being decorated with elegant country seats and plantations. The inhabitants have long been distinguished for their zealous encouragement of LITERARY pursuits, and the first edition of the Bible ever published in Ireland was printed at Belfast in the year 1704. In this town, also, was established, in 1737, the Belfast News-Letter, the first newspaper printed in the north of Ireland; there are now several others, also a Mercantile Register and some monthly periodicals. The Society for Promoting Knowledge, established in 1784, is supported by annual subscriptions of one guinea; the library contains more than 8000 volumes, and there are a cabinet of minerals, and a valuable philosophical apparatus. The Literary Society, for improvement in literature, science, antiquities, and the arts, was established in 1801; and the Historic Society, for the study of general history, the British laws and constitution, and the cultivation of oratory, in 1811. The Natural History Society, established in 1821, has since erected a very handsome building. The lower story is an imitation of the Choric monuments of Thrasylus, with a portico which is an exact copy of that of the octagon tower of Andronicus at Athens; and the upper portions are designed after the model of the temple of Minerva. The interior comprises several spacious, lofty, and elegant apartments, with lecture-rooms, an observatory, and a very valuable museum. Belfast also possesses a Botanical and Horticultural Society; a Statistical Society, established 30th March, 1836; a Society of Fine Arts; a Rhetorical Society; and a Mechanics' Institute, in Queen-street. The Botanic Gardens were formed in connexion with the Natural History Society, by some of the members, who, in 1827, purchased for that purpose 16 acres of land on the banks of the Lagan, about a mile from the town, on the Malone road. They are under the direction of a committee of 21, elected from the holders of 500 shares of five guineas each, of whom those holding less than four shares pay also a subscription annually; the society has expended more than £4000 on these gardens, to which persons may subscribe without being shareholders. A spacious and handsome news-room, to which respectable strangers have free access on entering their names in a book kept for the purpose, occupies the lower story of the Commercial Buildings: there is another large news-room in one of the wings of the White-Linen Hall; a third was opened in connexion with the office of the Northern Whig newspaper, now a leading journal in Ulster, but it did not succeed; and another has been established under the patronage of the Society for Promoting Knowledge. Over the Exchange is an elegant suite of assembly-rooms; there are others in the Commercial Buildings, and a neat theatre in Arthur-street. On the north-eastern side of the town are artillery and infantry barracks; and a town-major is regularly appointed, this being nominally a garrison town, and the head-quarters of the district: it is also a chief constabulary police station for the county.

Belfast owes much of its importance to the increase of the LINEN TRADE of Ulster, of which it is now become the grand depôt. In 1830 a very extensive mill was erected for spinning linen-yarn upon the same principle as in the chief houses at Leeds, in order to meet the increasing demand of the manufacturers; and, in 1832, a large cotton-mill was adapted to the spinning of the refuse flax of the linen-mill, for the use of the canvas weavers. In these two mills more than 700 persons are employed, and, since their erection, a linen-cloth manufactory has been established on a very large scale at Ligonell, two miles distant, which is the first of the kind in this part of the country. Seven more spinning-mills, containing 48,000 spindles, and affording employment to more than 5000 persons, were built in 1834; and several others, owing to the immense increase of the linen manufacture, have been erected since; they are all of brick, roofed with slate, and mostly five stories high. The total number of flax and tow spinning-mills in Belfast, at the beginning of 1846, was 28. The celebrated Ardoyne damask manufactory was established in 1825; and the elegance of the fabric soon extended its reputation, and obtained royal patronage. Linsens and sheetings of the stoutest fabric, for the London market, are likewise manufactured in this establishment, the proprietor of which, Michael Andrews, Esq., obtained the gold medal of the Royal Dublin Society for specimens of his productions, shewn at their exhibition of national manufactures, held in Dublin, in May 1835. The business of the linen trade of the whole kingdom was for a long time transacted solely in Dublin, by agents resident there; but the serious inconvenience experienced by the numerous bleachers in the province of Ulster, in consequence of the remoteness of the principal mart, prompted them to the establishment of a linen-hall at Belfast; and in 1785 a spacious and handsome quadrangular building was erected in the centre of Donegal-square, by public subscription, and called the White-Linen Hall. It affords great facility for making up assorted cargoes for foreign countries; large quantities are exported to America, the West Indies, and various other places, and nearly all the London merchants are supplied by factors resident here. The Brown-Linen Hall, erected about the same time, is an inclosed space on the south side of Donegal-street, containing several detached platforms, where the merchants attend every Friday for the purchase of brown webs from the weavers, who assemble here from the surrounding districts. The webs brought to this mart are principally one yard in width, and of the finest quality; and so great is the quantity purchased by the merchants, who are also bleachers, that in the Belfast district, extending only a distance of six miles from the town to the west and south-west, and containing in all fourteen bleaching-grounds (of which eleven are within the parish of Belfast), 260,000 pieces are annually bleached, exceeding by 87,000 the number of pieces bleached in the same district in the year 1822. The value of the goods finished annually in these estaishments is little less than one million sterling. The Society for the Promotion and Improvement of the Growth of Flax in Ireland, whose office is in the Commercial Buildings, Belfast, was established in the year 1841 by a number of the nobility and gentry, landed proprietors in Ulster, and by many of the gentlemen connected with the linen trade in its various branches. Its object is, to introduce a better system of growing and preparing flax in the island, so as to suit it for the large market offered by the flax-spinning trade of the United Kingdom. It appears that at the time when the society was founded, about 60,000 tons, in addition to the quantity grown at home, were annually imported from the continent of Europe, Egypt, and other parts, worth five millions sterling; and the society is using its influence to have as much as possible of this grown in Ireland. Already it has succeeded in raising the amount of the Irish flax crop from 25,000 to 40,000 tons, and it is now endeavouring to extend its culture throughout the provinces of Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, where it would afford a great source of profitable employment to the agricultural labouring population.

The cotton manufacture, of which Belfast is the centre and the principal seat, was originally introduced here in 1777, by Mr. Robert Joy, father of Chief Baron Joy, and at that time one of the proprietors of the Belfast News-Letter. That gentleman had been chiefly instrumental in establishing the Incorporated poor-house, which under his auspices became the nursery of this important branch of manufacture, then unknown in any other part of Ireland, but which, after struggling with various difficulties, at length attained rapid progress. In 1800 it afforded employment to 27,000 persons within a circuit of ten miles round Belfast; and it is still carried on here in all its branches, more especially in the spinning department, for which alone there were till lately, in the town and neighbourhood, no less than 21 factories. The machinery used in these works was partly impelled by steam, but chiefly by water, for which the streams in the neighbourhood are particularly favourable, by reason of the rapidity of their currents and their numerous falls. The buildings, now 10 in number, are of very large dimensions, in general from six to eight stories in height; and in some of them from 800 to 2000 persons are employed. The principal articles manufactured in Belfast are, velvets, fustians, jeans, ticking, checks, gingham, quiltings, calico muslins, and muslins. There were formerly also very extensive print-fields, bleach-greens, dye-works, and establishments for every department of the manufacture; but latterly the cotton trade has been in rather a declining state, and, in consequence, some of the works have been suspended, and others applied to different purposes.

An iron foundry was first established here in 1792. In 1798 the Lagan foundry, in Ballymacarrett, was erected, where steam-engines are now made; and in 1811 the Belfast foundry, in Donegal-street, was built, in which the patent rotatory steam-engines, originally invented by one of the proprietors, have been manufactured. In 1834 the manufacture of machinery for spinning flax was first successfully introduced into Ireland, by the proprietors of the Belfast foundry; two other foundries have been since established, namely, the Phoenix in York-street, and the Soho foundry in Towns-end-street, where spinning machinery is made; and there are several foundries on a smaller scale. The making of vitriol was introduced in 1799; at present there are various establishments. The manufacture of flint-glass was commenced in 1776; in a few years several extensive glass-houses were erected, and a company has lately been formed for manufacturing crown-glass; these glass-houses and the vitriol-works are all situated in the suburb of Ballymacarrett, which see. There are two distilleries, which annually produce 311,000 gallons of spirits, nearly the whole for home consumption: about 150 men are employed in the process; and at Brookfield, adjoining the town, is a third, also upon an extensive scale. There are twelve ale and porter breweries, from which many thousand barrels are annually exported; some large flour and meal mills, worked by steam and water; and manufactories for tobacco, soap, candles, glue, and paper, both for home consumption and for exportation. In the manufacture of starch from sixty to seventy tons of wheat are weekly consumed. The tanning of leather for exportation was formerly carried on to a great extent, and at the commencement of the present century there were 36 tanyards in the town and neighbourhood; but it has much declined, and is at present chiefly confined to the home market. The manufacture of ropes and canvas was originally introduced in 1758: to it were added, in 1784, the making of sail-cloth, and, in 1820, the making of sails, which has since grown into celebrity, and affords employment to a great number of persons of both sexes. Ship-building was commenced in the year 1791, prior to which time all vessels belonging to the port had been built and repaired in England or Scotland; there are now two extensive yards, with graving-docks and every requisite appendage, in which more than 300 men are constantly employed, and from which four or five brigs of the first class, and schooners of from 100 to 360 tons' registered burthen, are annually launched. Several ships have also been lately built, among which is the Hindoo of 400 tons' register, for the East India trade.

The TRADE OF THE PORT, comparatively of modern origin, has been rapid in its growth and uniformly increasing in its progress. It originally rose into some importance on the purchase by the crown, in 1637, of the privilege possessed by the corporation of Carrickfergus (of which port Belfast was formerly only a dependency), of importing merchandise at a far lower rate of duty than was paid at any other port. After the completion of this purchase, the custom-house of that place was removed to Belfast, which, however, arose into distinguished notice only with the linen trade, as, at the commencement of the last century, there were but five vessels, of the aggregate burthen of 109 tons, belonging to the port; and the amount of custom-house duties, in 1709, was not more than £1215. In 1740 it had not only become well known on the continent as a place of considerable trade, but was in equal repute with the most celebrated commercial towns in Europe; and in 1785 it became the principal depot of the linen trade, from which time its commerce rapidly increased. During the fluctuations of trade by which other places suffered so severely, Belfast experienced comparatively but little diminution of its commerce; and in 1825 it derived a considerable addition to its trade in the increase of the cross-channel intercourse, from the introduction of steam navigation. In 1833, the number of larger vessels which entered inwards at the port was 2445, and which cleared outwards, 1391; and the amount of duties paid at the custom-house exceeded £412,000. The trade has since been increasing every year: in that ending Jan. 5th, 1836, the number of larger vessels that entered inwards was 2730, and that cleared outwards, 2047; and the amount of duties paid at the custom-house, was £357,645, and of the quaysage dues at the ballast-office, £9289. 19. The gross produce of the customs' duties in 1838 was £315,774; in 1843, £339,959; and in 1844, £366,415. The commerce of the port consists of various branches. The most important at present is the CROSS-CHANNEL trade, which in 1747 employed only three vessels, collectively of 198 tons' burthen: from that time it appears to have rapidly increased; and since the more direct and expeditious intercourse with the principal ports of Great Britain, afforded by the introduction of steam navigation, it has absorbed a considerable portion of the foreign and colonial trade. The principal exports connected with this branch are linen-cloth, manufactured cotton goods, and agricultural produce. Its extensive trade in provisions is of very recent introduction, and affords a striking demonstration of the great improvements in the system of agriculture which have taken place since the commencement of the present century; considerable quantities of corn were formerly imported, and in 1789 the only articles shipped from this port were beef and butter, in very limited quantities. The curing of pork is now a very extensive business, carried on by many wealthy firms; and butter is largely exported, and brings higher prices in London than the best Dutch butter, the institution of butter societies having tended to improve its quality, as well as regulate its sales. The chief imports by the cross-channel trade are tea, sugar, cotton, wool, and various articles for the use of the manufacturers, bleachers, and dyers; also British manufactured goods, and articles of general merchandise. The number of vessels that entered inwards from British ports during the year 1835, including repeated voyages, was 2949, and the number that cleared outwards, 1534; of these there were nine steam-boats, of which four were employed in the Glasgow, three in the Liverpool, and two in the London trade. In the year 1844, the number of sailing vessels that entered the port, in the cross-channel and general coasting trade, was 3533, of 222,209 tons; and of steamers, 852, of 212,790 tons: the number of sailing vessels outwards was 860, of 47,579 tons; and of steamers, 865, of 216,641 tons. The first steam-boat that crossed the channel to this port was from Liverpool, in 1819, but it was not till 1824 that steam-boats were employed in the transmission of merchandise; the passage by steam navigation to Liverpool is performed, on the average, in 14 hours, to London in 132 hours, to Glasgow in 14 hours, and to Dublin in 14 hours.

The trade with the United States and with British North America is very considerable: the chief exports are linen-cloth, manufactured cotton goods, blue, starch, and whisky; the imports are timber and staves, tobacco, cotton, wool, ashes, and flax and clover seeds. In 1835, the number of vessels in this trade which entered inwards was 78, and of those that cleared outwards 76, the latter taking 2675 emigrants, of whom 1824 were destined for the British American colonies, and 851 for the United States. The trade with the West Indies commenced in 1740, and, of late, several first-class vessels have been built expressly for it; 9 vessels entered inwards, and 15 cleared outwards, in 1835, in connexion with the British West India Islands only. The trade with the Baltic, which is on the increase, consists in the importation of tallow, timber, ashes, flax, and hemp. Tallow and hides are also imported from Odessa; mats, pitch, tar, flax, and flax-seed, from Archangel; and wine, fruit, lemon and lime juice, olive and other oils, brimstone, and barilla, from the Mediterranean and the Levant. The total number of vessels employed in the foreign trade, which entered inwards in 1835, was 184, and of those that cleared outwards, 145; in 1844, the number that entered was 215, and that cleared out, 133. The coasting-trade, exclusively of the regular steam-packets for goods and passengers to Liverpool, London, Dublin, Fleetwood, Ardrossan, Greenock, Glasgow, and Stranraer, employs packets, in the summer season, to the Isle of Man, North Wales, Port-Stewart, Derry, and to several other places on the Irish and Scottish coasts. There is also engaged in this trade, among other vessels, a regular establishment of vessels of different classes to Maryport, Workington, and Whitehaven, chiefly employed in the coal-trade; the imports supply the greater part of the north of Ireland. The number of vessels belonging to the port is 365, of an aggregate burthen of 50,391 tons; but they are very inadequate to the extent of its commerce, a large portion of which is carried on in ships belonging to other countries. The total estimated value of the exports, in 1835, amounted to £4,341,794, of which £2,738,746 were in linens, £148,730 in cottons, £615 in woollens, £9006 in whisky, porter, and agricultural products, £148,597 in corn, meal, and flour, £17,520 in cattle, sheep, and pigs, £35,580 in horses, and £916,913 in provisions; besides hides, feathers, flax, ore, &c. The total estimated value of the imports, in the same year, amounted to £3,695,437, whereof £151,450 were in coal, &c., £181,260 iron and other metals, hardware, &c., £1,836,047 woollens, cottons, silks, &c., £452,347 tea, coffee, and sugar, £14,640 wine, £94,229 tobacco, and the remainder in spirits, ale, beer, and other articles. Among the exports for the year ending 1st of August, 1845, may be named, 11,430 barrels, and 7906 tierces, of pork; 29,419 hales of bacon; 41,658 firkins, and 41,760 casks, of butter; 27,381 cwt. of lard; 1958 tierces of beef; 4820 hogsheds of hams; 24,672 barrels of wheat, 35,362 of oats, and 3335 of barley; 44,778 boxes of linen; 13,529 sacks of flour; 20,076 bales of hay; 7222 cows, and 3690 pigs; 3734 puncheons of whisky; and 69,635 cwt. of potatoes.

The port is very advantageously situated for trade at the mouth of the Lagan in Belfast Lough, also called Carrickfergus bay, a noble arm of the sea forming a safe and commodious harbour, well sheltered and easy of access. The entrance is about six miles in breadth from the Point between Groomsport and Ballyholm bay, in the county of Down, to White Head in the county of Antrim; the length from the latter point to the quays at Belfast is 1½ miles, the bay decreasing gradually in breadth towards the bridge, where the river is very much contracted by the different quays and landing-places, and the embankments of Ballymacarrett. The preservation and improvement of the port and harbour were formerly vested in the Ballast Corporation constituted by act of parliament in 1785; but this act was repealed by an act obtained in 1831, and a new "Corporation for Preserving and Improving the Port and Harbour of Belfast" was created, consisting of "the lord of the castle" and "sovereign;" the parliamentary representatives for the counties of Antrim and Down, and the boroughs of Belfast, Carrickfergus, and Downpatrick; and sixteen other commissioners, of whom four go out of office annually, their successors being elected subject to the approbation of the lord-lieutenant and privy council. The annual income of this corporation, arising from pilotage, tonnage, quayage rates on imports and exports, ballastage, &c., on an average of five years ending Jan. 5th, 1836, amounted to £8868, and the expenditure to £8789. The objects of obtaining the new act in 1831 were, to enable the commissioners to purchase quays and grounds for the improvement of the harbour, and to render the enactments suitable to the present state of the trade of the town, which had increased nearly tenfold since the passing of the former act. Below the bridge, a fine range of quays extends along the north-west bank of the river, with two graving-docks, which were constructed soon after the port was frequented by large vessels; three wet-docks extend into the principal streets of the town. A spacious graving-dock was completed in the year 1826, at an expense of £26,000, by the Ballast Corporation; and several extensive wet-docks, quays, and warehouses were lately constructed below the town, under an act of parliament obtained in 1829, by Messrs. Holmes and Dunbar: the first of these docks, completed in 1832, is 400 yards in length and 100 yards in breadth, and is intended for the large ships in the timber trade. The harbour commissioners, under the act of 1831, contemplate the deepening and enlarging of the harbour, the formation of a new channel from the quays to the Mile-water river, the construction of floating-docks with entrance locks, and other improvements; and it has been determined to construct a new range of quays from the bridge to Dunbar's dock, the quays to be set out in the river 100 feet, and thus increase the accommodation by allowing space to erect sheds, &c.: the wet-docks which now run up the streets will, under these new arrangements, be removed. The custom-house, situated on Hanover-quay, is a very indifferent building, as is the post-office; but hopes are entertained that new and more commodious edifices will soon be erected.

The Lagan navigation extending in a line 22 miles from the port to Lough Neagh, by way of Lisburn, was constructed under an act of the 27th of George III., confirmed by others down to the 54th of the same reign, by which the proprietors were invested with a small duty on beer and spirits in the excise district of Lisburn, since commuted for an annual money payment out of the consolidated fund: the number of debentures issued from 1755 to 1793 was sixty-two, amounting to £62,000. The navigation is continued partly in the bed of the river, and partly by collateral cuts, to a mile above Lisburn; but, from its circuitous course and the high rate of the tolls, goods are conveyed by land with greater expedition and at less expense. Divers new roads have been formed in the immediate neighbourhood of Belfast; and, under an act of parliament obtained in 1833, a railway from the harbour to Cave Hill has been constructed, in a double line, which is the first work of the kind in the north of Ireland. The Ulster railway, opened in 1841, proceeds from Belfast, by Lisburn, Moira, and Lurgan to Portadown, a line of 25 miles; and in 1845 an act was passed to enable the company to form a branch from Portadown to Armagh, being that portion of the original Ulster line for which, owing to pecuniary difficulties, the parliamentary powers were suffered to expire. The length of this extension is 11 miles, and the estimated cost £133,035. An act was also obtained in 1845 for forming a railway called the Dublin and Belfast Junction, to proceed from Portadown to Drogheda, with a branch to Navan: this undertaking completes, by a main line of 56 miles from the Ulster railway, at Portadown, by way of Newry and Dundalk, a railway communication from Belfast to Drogheda; and thence there is a line, already in operation, to Dublin. The branch to Navan is 17½ miles long; its proposed extension to Kells has been for the present abandoned. The total length of this railway is 73½ miles; the capital is £950,000, and the company are empowered to raise £316,666 by loans. In 1845 a third act was obtained, for a railway between Belfast and Ballymena, with branches to Carrickfergus and Randalstown: the length of the main line, which it is proposed to extend to Coleraine, is nearly 33 miles; the Carrickfergus branch is about three miles, and the Randalstown branch two miles. It is also in contemplation to construct a railway between Belfast and Downpatrick. All these lengths of railways are in British miles.

The Chamber of Commerce was originally established in 1783; its meetings were suspended from 1794 to 1802, since which time they have been resumed without interruption, greatly to the benefit of trade and the interests of the town. The Old Exchange, situated nearly in the centre of the town, at the end of Donegal-street, is the private property of the Marquess of Donegal; it was formerly the place of public resort for the merchants, but, since the erection of the Commercial Buildings, has been used only for the election of the chief magistrate. The Commercial Buildings were erected in 1822, opposite to the Exchange, at an expense of £20,000, by a proprietary of 200 shareholders, incorporated under act of parliament in 1823, and a committee of whom, annually elected, conduct the affairs of the institution. The buildings comprise an excellent commercial hotel, a spacious and handsome news-room over which is an elegant assembly-room, and behind these an area with a piazza for the use of the merchants; in connexion with the edifice are numerous offices principally occupied by professional men. The north front, of Irish granite, is decorated with eight lofty Ionic columns, and the west front is chiefly occupied by shops: the merchants assemble in the news-room and hold 'Change on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Banking establishments are, the Northern Company, established in 1824; the Belfast Company, in 1826; and the Ulster Company, in 1836: all have branches in the different large towns throughout the province. There are also branches here of the Bank of Ireland and the Provincial Bank. James I., in 1605, 1608, and 1611, made grants of Markets and Fairs, which were all included in one grant to Arthur Lord Chichester, in 1621, of a market to be held on Friday, and fairs annually on Aug. 1st and 2nd, and Oct. 28th and 29th; this grant was confirmed by Charles II. to Arthur, Earl of Donegal, in 1668. Though the markets are open daily, the principal market-day is Friday: the two fairs are now held on Aug. 12th and Nov. 8th. There are in Smithfield two market-places for meat, two for fish, and one for hay, straw, and hides, besides several others for meat and vegetables in various parts of the town, all of which are adequately supplied: the market for pork and butter is in the weigh-house and buildings adjoining; the sale of poultry of all kinds, collected from a great distance, forms a regular trade; and the fish-market is well supplied with turbot and salmon from the coasts of Antrim and Derry.

Belfast is in some measure indebted for its INCORPORATION to the favour shewn to the Chichester family by James I., who, in 1612, granted the castle and an extensive surrounding territory to Sir Arthur Chichester, who had previously established a number of Devonshire men in the townland of Malone: in the following year the king incorporated the inhabitants by charter. In the 4th of James II., on a seizure of the franchises, a charter was granted, the provisions of which were in most respects similar to those of the former; and George II., in the 33rd year of his reign, also granted a charter, which, however, is only an inexpressum of the charter of James I. The corporation was formerly styled "The Sovereign, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Belfast;" and prior to the act for the Regulation of Municipal Corporations, 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108, it consisted of a sovereign, lord of the castle, constable of the castle, twelve other free burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen, assisted by a town-clerk and two sergeants-at-mace. The sovereign was chosen annually on the 24th of June by the free burgesses, from three of their own body nominated by the lord of the castle (or, in default of such nomination, which seldom occurred, elected by themselves), and was sworn into office before the lord, or in his absence before the constable of the castle, on Michaelmas-day. The lord of the castle was a member of the corporation by tenure of the castle of Belfast; the office was held by the Marquess of Donegal, in whose family it had continued from the date of the charter: the constable was appointed by instrument under seal of the lord of the castle, and became a free burgess. The other free burgesses were chosen, as vacancies occurred, by the sovereign and the remainder of their body; the town-clerk was elected by the sovereign and burgesses; and the sergeants-at-mace were chosen by the corporation at large. The freedom of the borough was acquired only by gift of the sovereign and free burgesses; latterly there were no freemen. Conformably with the act above-mentioned, the borough now consists of five wards, and the corporation of a mayor, ten aldermen, thirty councillors, and an unlimited number of burgesses. The mayor is elected annually, on the 1st of December, from and by the aldermen and councillors, who are themselves elected by and from the burgesses of each ward; one-half of the aldermen go out of office every three years, and one-third of the councillors retire annually. The qualification of the mayor, aldermen, and councillors, is the possession of £1000 above all debts, or a house of not less than £25 per annum rent; and that of the burgesses a house of £10 rent, and residence within seven miles of Belfast. The borough returned two representatives to the Irish parliament from the date of its incorporation till the Union, after which it sent one to the Imperial parliament, but its original number was restored by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 88, passed to amend the representation. The right of election was formerly vested exclusively in the free burgesses, but by the act above-named was extended to the £10 householders: the number of voters registered in 1843, was 4890, of whom 4986 were £10 householders, and four were burgesses; the mayor is the returning officer. The jurisdiction of the corporation and of the town police extends on the north to the Mile-water, and on the south to the Black-staff, both tributaries of the Lagan, which forms the boundary on the east; on the west is also a boundary, but till lately so imperfectly defined that disputes were constantly arising with respect to the county cess, which within it is levied on the houses, and without it only on the acre. Under the act now regulating the harbour a jurisdiction was given to the judges of assize, the justices of the peace for Antrim, and the sovereign of Belfast, over all offences committed within the limits of the port and harbour, or within 500 yards of the quays in the county of Down, as if such offences had been committed within the county of Antrim. The act of the 2nd and 3rd of William IV., cap. 89, assigned a new boundary for parliamentary purposes.

Under the old regime, the sovereign was a justice of the peace for the borough, and usually held the commission of the peace for Antrim and Down; he was also clerk of the market, and, ex officio, a member of different bodies incorporated under local acts for the improvement of the town and port. The charter granted a court of record for the recovery of debts not exceeding £20 arising within the borough or its liberty, to be held every Thursday before the sovereign; but it has long since fallen into disuse. The manor court, held every third Thursday before the seneschal (who is appointed by the Marquess of Donegal, as lord of the manor of Belfast, within which the borough is situated), has jurisdiction over the entire parish, and over the townland of Ballynafeigh in the county of Down, to the amount of £30 present currency, by process of attachment or arrest; the seneschal also proceeds by civil bill under the Manor-court acts: the prison of the court was abolished in 1829, and defaulters are now sent to the county gaol. Courts leet for the manor are likewise held by the seneschal; at that in May, constables, apploters, and appraisers are appointed for the ensuing year. The mayor holds petty-sessions every Monday and Wednesday at the sessions-house; county magistrates may also attend. The stipendiary police magistrate, whose office was instituted in 1816, holds a court of petty-session at the sessions-house every Thursday, at which other justices attend; and presides at a magistrate's court at the police-office every Tuesday and Saturday, where he disposes of cases respecting servants' wages, and other matters not requiring the attendance of two justices: he also sits daily at the office of the nightly watch establishment. The county quarter-sessions are held in this town, in conjunction with other places, four times in the year; and the assistant barrister then determines causes by civil bill under his statutable jurisdiction, for the division of Belfast. The old house of correction, adjoining the quarter-sessions' court-house, was a good building of brick, erected in 1817, but not sufficiently adapted for the classification of prisoners, who were chiefly employed in breaking stones for the streets of the town: the present house of correction was built on the model of the Pentonville prison, London, and will contain 300 prisoners. Commissioners of police were appointed by an act of parliament passed in 1800 and amended in 1816, under which a police tax, amounting on an average of five years to £9000 per annum, is levied for the maintenance of patrols by night and by day, and for lighting, cleansing, and paving the towns and precincts.

The parish comprises 19,559 statute acres: it was anciently called Shankill, but no church having existed at the latter place for more than two centuries, it is now generally designated the parish of Belfast. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor and province of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Donegal, to whom the impropriate rectory belongs; the entire parish is under the Tithe Rent-charge act, and, with the exception of a portion called the Upper Falls, pays £712. 10. per annum, of which £450 belong to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar, who has also a glebe-house near the church, and 20 acres of land. The parochial church, dedicated to St. Anne, was erected in 1778, at the expense of the Marquess of Donegal. It consists of a nave and chancel, with a lofty Ionic tower surmounted by a Corinthian cupola covered with copper, forming an interesting and conspicuous object for many miles round; the original portico, which was inferior in character to the rest of the building, has been replaced by one of loftier elevation. About 1830 the Board of First Fruits gave £666 for the repair, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners more recently granted £375 for the improvement of the church. St. George's church, or chapel of ease, was erected in 1812, on the site of a former edifice called the Corporation Church, which had been built on the ruins of the ancient castle. It is a fine structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a magnificent and highly enriched portico of six noble columns and four fluted pilasters, supporting a cornice and pediment, in the tympanum of which are the arms of the united sees of Down and Connor, and of the town, in alto-relievo. This splendid specimen of Corinthian architecture was formerly the portico of a palace built by the Earl of Bristol, when Bishop of Derry, on the shore of Lough Beg, and the materials for which were quarried from the Derry mountains, and worked by Irish artists: after that noble prelate's decease it was purchased, on the demolition of the palace, by the late Dr. Alexander, then Bishop of Down and Connor, and afterwards of Meath, and by him presented to this church. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £123 for the repair of the building. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar; it was endowed by the Board of First Fruits with £3000, laid out in the purchase of the tithes of Naas, in the county of Kildare, producing a rent-charge of £94. 10. per annum, and was further endowed by the vicar with a portion of the tithes of the Upper Falls, now producing to the curate £37. 10. per annum. Christchurch, containing 1000 free sittings, and situated near the Royal Institution, was erected by the Board of First Fruits, aided by subscription, and was opened for divine service in 1833: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £50 per annum by the Board, together with the rents of the pews, and in the patronage of the Vicar. In the townland of Upper Malone, about three miles south of the town, is a church of recent erection, dedicated to St. John, and the living of which is a perpetual curacy: other places of worship in connexion with the Establishment are, St. Anne's chapel of ease; the chapel in the Magdalen Asylum, the minister of which is presented by trustees; St. Matthew's church, Shankill, in the gift of the Vicar; and Trinity church, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of Trustees.

Belfast is the seat of the Roman Catholic see of Down and Connor, and the residence of the bishop: there are two spacious chapels in the town, one of which, erected in 1811, and considered as the cathedral, is an elegant edifice in the later style of English architecture; other chapels are situated at Ballymacarrett, Hollywood, Green Castle, and Ballyclare, all in the Roman Catholic parish of Belfast. There are more than a dozen places of worship for Presbyterians, of which that for the third congregation (so called from the order of its formation), built in 1831 at an expense of £10,000, by Mr. Miller, a native and resident architect, is perhaps the most elegant edifice of its kind in the three kingdoms. The front is enriched with a stately Grecian-Doric portico of ten lofty columns, resting on a basement of twenty steps, and surmounted by an attic balustrade, composed of a series of pedestals and light pierced work, having a novel and pleasing effect; the other portions of the building are also noble and elegant in design, and beautiful in detail, especially the grand staircase leading to the gallery, from which may best be observed that agreeable harmony of plan and unity of effect which are strikingly characteristic of this chaste edifice. The meeting-house for the fifth congregation, in Fishervick-place, erected in 1827 at an expense of £7000; and that for the sixth, in May-street, built in 1829 at an expense of £9000, are likewise spacious structures. There are also two places of worship for Covenanters, two each for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and one each for General Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Independents. Nearly all of the Presbyterian meeting-houses are in connexion with the General Assembly, including those of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh congregations; two only are in connexion with the Presbytery of Antrim, namely, those of the first and second congregations, the first being a collegiate charge.

The Royal Belfast Academical Institution, which reflects so much honour on its founders, was projected in 1807; and, within a few weeks from the first promulgation of the design, subscriptions to the amount of £16,000 were raised for carrying it into effect. This sum was increased by subscriptions from other parts of Ireland, and from England; and, under the patronage of the Marquess of Hastings, and by the unwearied exertions of several gentlemen, nearly £5000 were subscribed in India: making the total amount £25,000. In 1810, the patrons and principal subscribers were by act of parliament incorporated a body politic, to consist of the Lord-Primate, the Marquess of Donegal, the Bishop of Down and Connor, and more than 70 of the subscribers, including all who should subscribe 20 guineas; with power to elect a president, vice-presidents, treasurer, secretary, managers, visitors, and auditors; to transact all business relative to the institution; to take lands not exceeding £2500 per annum; and other privileges. The buildings were completed at an expense, including furniture and apparatus, of £28,954, leaving no provision for the endowment of professorships. For this object the managers applied to government, and in the year 1814 they received from parliament a grant of £1500, which was continued during the years 1815 and 1816; after which it ceased till 1824, when it was renewed on the recommendation of the Commissioners of Education. In the year 1834 the grant was increased to £3500; of which sum £2000 were for additional buildings, and £1500 for general expenditure. The institution comprehends a collegiate and a school department, the former, till lately, under the direction of seven professors of natural philosophy, moral philosophy, logic and the belles-lettres, mathematics, Latin and Greek, Hebrew, and anatomy, respectively; there were also two professors of divinity, appointed by the General Assembly. At present there are, in addition, six professors of chemistry, materia medica and pharmacy, botany, the theory and practice of physic, surgery, midwifery and the diseases of women and children; together with a professor of Biblical criticism, and one of Church history, to the General Assembly; a professor of Church history and the pastoral care, under the Non-subscribing Association of Ireland; and a professor of criticism and theology, also under the Association. The professors were, in 1818, constituted a board of faculty for superintending the courses of instruction and discipline observed in the institution, as were also the masters of the school department for that branch of it. The collegiate department is conducted on a plan similar, in most respects, to that of the university of Glasgow; the session commences in November and ends in May, when public examinations take place. The mathematical class is generally very numerous, and is considered equal to any in the United Kingdom; the classical course is also extensive. The moral philosophy class has no prescribed course of reading, but lectures are given and examinations are held; the course of anatomy was till lately pursued rather as a branch of general education than as a medical study, though admirably calculated as a first course for medical students. The school department comprises the mercantile, English, classical, mathematical, Italian, French, Spanish, writing, and drawing schools. There are at present about 200 students in the collegiate, and 210 pupils in the school department of the institution; to which are attached a good library, a museum, and a valuable philosophical apparatus. Nearly all the candidates for the Presbyterian ministry in Ireland are educated here; and the General Assembly, by whom the institution is cordially patronised, consider the general certificate of the faculty equivalent to the degree of M.A. in any of the Scottish universities, or to that of B.A. in Trinity College, Dublin, or either of the English universities. The total receipts of the establishment, in a recent year, were £3646, and the expenditure was £3735.

Belfast is also the site of one of the three Irish Colleges, founded by the act 8th and 9th of Victoria, cap. 66, passed on the 31st of July, 1845. By this measure, the lords of the treasury are directed to issue a sum of £100,000 out of the consolidated fund, to provide sites and buildings for the colleges to which Her Majesty may have granted letters-patent; and the Commissioners of Public Works are constituted trustees for carrying out the provisions of the act so far as the choice of land and erection and furnishing of the buildings are concerned. The annual expenses of the colleges will also be mainly defrayed by government, who are empowered to assign £7000 every year to that of Belfast, and a similar sum to each of the two other colleges, for the payment of the stipends of the president, vice-president, professors, bursar, and other officers, of each establishment, and for providing such prizes and exhibitions as the Queen may deem it expedient to institute. Reasonable fees, however, may be demanded from the students by the professors, for attendance on their lectures, and by the bursar, for matriculation and other collegiate proceedings, agreeably with the rules and statutes, as approved by Her Majesty. Her Majesty is constituted visitor of the college of Belfast, as well as of the other colleges, but may appoint persons under the sign-manual to execute the office, and she is also invested with the right of choosing the president, vice-president, and professors, until the end of the year 1848, and afterwards unless otherwise arranged by parliament. Lecture-rooms are to be set apart for religious instruction, to be given by teachers recognised by the governing body; but students will not be compelled to attend, should their parents or guardians consider it unnecessary; and no religious test will be administered as a qualification for any collegiate office or privilege. Every student must dwell with his parent or guardian, or some near relation, or with a tutor or master of a boarding-house licensed by the president, or in a hall founded and endowed for the reception of students; and in every boarding-house thus licensed, provision must be made for securing to the student the means of due attendance upon such religious instruction and divine worship as may be sanctioned by his parents and by the college authorities. The act likewise lays down some regulations with a view to the extension of the original plan of the college. The seventeenth section empowers any one to give property for the endowment of halls for the reception of students, subject to the inspection of a private trustee or, if the founder please, of the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests: the deed or will under which a new foundation is created, must establish rules for its government, or name an authority for the purpose, and must also specify an authority to enforce observance of the rules. But the hall cannot be incorporated with the college, and recognised by the governing body, unless the rules are approved by Her Majesty, or by the visitor whom she may have appointed. By the 18th section of the act, the Commissioners of Public Works are authorised to make loans for halls, to such persons as may have been incorporated by letters-patent to found them; and under the 19th section, estates or other property may be given or bequeathed to the college for providing additional religious teachers. The Rev. Pooley S. Henry, D.D., of Armagh, has been appointed first president of Belfast College.

There are of course numerous National and other schools in the parish. One on the Lancasterian plan was formerly a Sunday school, and was converted into a day establishment in the year 1811, when a spacious school-house of brick, with a residence for the master, was built at an expense of £2000, raised by lottery and by local subscriptions. The school in Brown-street was established in the year 1812, under the patronage of the Marquess of Donegal; and a handsome brick building, with houses for the master and mistress adjoining, was erected by subscription, at an expense of £1500. The school in Donegal-street, which was the first in the north of Ireland that placed itself in connexion with the National Board, was founded in 1829, under the patronage of the Right Rev. Dr. Crolly; and two large school-houses were built adjoining the Roman Catholic cathedral. In the townland of Malone the Marquess of Donegal, in 1765, built a very large school-house on the demesne of Willmount, and endowed it with the rent of an adjoining farm, now let for £40 per annum; it appears to have been originally a charter school, but is now open to all children of the neighbourhood, of whom those attending it are educated gratuitously, and supplied with books.

The Incorporated Poor-house, for the reception of the aged and infirm poor, and the support of poor children during infancy, was built at an expense of £7000, raised by a lottery and by public subscription, on an elevated site at the upper end of Donegal-street, granted in 1771 by the Marquess of Donegal; and the founders of this humane institution were incorporated by act of parliament in 1774, under the title of "the President and Assistants of the Belfast Charitable Society." The funds, which from the improvement in property are likely to increase, at present exceed £2500 per annum, arising from an annuity of £750 paid by the commissioners of water; from the surplus of the revenue of the harbour commissioners after paying the necessary expenses of improving and maintaining the harbour; from rents of land and houses, annual subscriptions and donations, and collections at the churches and principal chapels. More than 480 individuals are lodged, clothed, and fed in the house. The aged, both male and female, are employed in some useful occupation, or in domestic management; and the children, for whose instruction a master and a mistress are appointed with salaries respectively of £25 and £20 per annum, are taught some business in the house, or apprenticed to trades, or to the sea service. Each is at liberty to attend his own place of worship on Sunday; and ministers of all denominations are allowed to officiate in the house during the week. The House of Industry, for the suppression of mendicancy and the promotion of industry among the poor, was established in Smithfield in 1809; it is principally supported by voluntary contributions, and affords employment in weaving, spinning, knitting, net-making, and other branches of industry, to the unemployed poor, making up any deficiency in their earnings by donations of food and clothing. It assists poor housekeepers, relieves strangers and forwards them to their destination, supplies deserving mendicants with food and punishes the refractory, accommodates industrious families with small loans or occasional grants, and has diffused great benefit over this populous town, in which it has entirely abolished mendicancy. The Fever Hospital was established in 1817; and a dispensary, instituted in 1792, has been incorporated with it: the buildings, situated in Frederick-street, are handsome and commodious, with a spacious area in front, and are adapted to the reception of 226 patients. It is supported by donations, bequests, and subscriptions, also by fines levied by magistrates, and grand jury presentments, the last of which alone amount to about £400 per annum; and its total annual income is £1000: it is open to patients not only of the town, but from the county at large, and a great number are annually relieved. The Lying-in Hospital was originally established in Donegal-street, in 1794, but in 1830 was removed to a more spacious building erected for it on the new road; it is liberally supported by subscription.

The Belfast District Lunatic Asylum, for the reception of pauper patients from the counties of Antrim and Down, and from the county of the town of Carrickfergus, was erected on an eminence one mile from the town, near the Falls road, in 1829, at an expense, including furniture and other contingencies, of £25,319, defrayed by government under an act of the 1st and 2nd of George IV. The buildings, which are handsome, were originally adapted only for 104 patients, but are now capable of receiving 250, and consist of a centre comprising the house of the governor and the committee-rooms, and two wings, in which are numerous corridors containing each about thirteen cells for patients, and two others of smaller size containing six cells each for those of more violent derangement; each corridor has a day-room for the patients, and one also for the keeper. The grounds surrounding the house comprise an area of more than 21 acres, to which the patients have free access; and the whole is inclosed by a stone wall fourteen feet high, with a porter's lodge at the entrance. The males are employed in weaving linen and cotton, gardening, and cultivating the land; and the females in spinning, knitting, and domestic occupations. The general management of the asylum is vested in a committee appointed by the general board in Dublin; the medical department is superintended by a physician, governor, and matron, assisted by keepers and others: the expenditure is advanced by government, but repaid by the grand juries of the respective counties. Many extraordinary cures have been effected; and upon an average, nearly one-half of the patients have been restored to sanity by the skilful and humane system of treatment introduced and successfully practised by the governor. From the period when the asylum was first opened, to the 31st of March 1841, as many as 1129 patients were admitted; of this number, 554 recovered and were discharged, and 110 were discharged relieved. The expenditure for the year ending 31st March, 1841, was £4051: in 1844 the expense was £3244. A savings' bank was established in 1816, for which a handsome edifice was erected in 1830, at an expense of £1400, raised from a fund which had accumulated from the gratuitous superintendence of the committee for the fourteen years preceding; the amount of deposits at present is nearly £150,000. A deaf and dumb asylum, also a handsome building, was erected in 1843. There are likewise several minor establishments for the benefit of the poor, among which may be noticed the female penitentiary; the loan fund, with the Mont de Piété attached; the society for the relief of the destitute sick established in 1826; the society for clothing the poor, in 1827; the society for discountenancing vice and promoting the Christian religion, also in 1827; the society for the religious improvement of the poor, in 1830; a Bible society, some tract societies, and a library of religious books for the use of the poor. The workhouse, on a site of twelve acres purchased for £2130 and rented at £28. 12., was completed in 1841, at a cost of £7000, and is constructed to receive 1000 paupers.

There are no remains of ANTIQUITY in the town, but some are scattered over the parish. Near Stranmillis, on the Lagan, was an ancient chapel, called Capella de Kilpatrick; on the summit of a hill in Upper Malone was the Capella de Crookmuck; near Callender's Fort, on the Falls road, about two miles from the town, was that of Cranock, of which traces of the foundations and a large cemetery are still remaining; and on the same road was the chapel of Kiltece, where numerous elegantly carved crosses and other sepulchral monuments have been found. About three miles on the Carrickfergus road is a small fragment of an ancient fortress, called Greencastle; in Upper Malone was an extensive fort called Castle Cam, or Freeston Castle, on the site of which the elegant mansion of Malone House has been erected; at a small distance on the left of the road to Shaw's-bridge are seen the foundations of a third fort; in the grounds of Maloué, near Limoine, are the remains of a fourth; and in the Roman Catholic burial-ground at Friar's Bush are the remains of a fifth. Among the most curious relics of antiquity are the caves in various places, formed in the earth, or in the hard limestone rock. Of the former, three were discovered in 1792 at Wolf Hill, the largest of which is eight yards long and one yard wide, with four small chambers diverging from it; on the side of a small hill in the townland of Ballymargy is one of larger dimensions, and in a more perfect state, with two entrances; and near Hannahtown is one still larger, which since 1798 has been closed, having at that time been a place of concealment for arms. Three large caves which give name to the mountain of Cave Hill, are all formed in the perpendicular face of an immense range of basaltic rock: the lowest is 21 feet long, 18 wide, and from 7 to 10 feet in height; above this is another, 10 feet long, 7 wide, and 6 in height; and above that is the third, said to be divided into two unequal parts, each of which is more extensive than the largest of the other caves; but the ascent is so dangerous that few venture to visit it. The large ramparts of earth, called raths, or forts, are also numerous. Of these the most extensive is Mac Art's fort, on the summit of Cave Hill, protected on one side by a precipice, and on the others by a single ditch of great depth and a vallum of large dimensions; the inclosed area is nearly level, and from the height of the mountain, which is 1140 feet, commands a view of vast extent, variety, and beauty, including the Isle of Man, the shores and mountains of Scotland, and a large portion of the counties of Antrim, Down, Armagh, Derry, and Donegal. Near the base of Squires Hill are many smaller raths, and two of large dimensions occur almost at the summit of the Black mountain. Near the shore, at Fort William, is an encampment 70 feet square, surrounded by a deep fosse, and defended by a bastion at each angle, the whole said to have been thrown up by King William in 1690; not far from it is another intrenchment, of ruder construction. There are two cairns on the Black mountain, in one of which, in 1829, was found a large urn filled with calcined human bones, a spear-head, and two ornaments of brass; there is also a cairn on Cave Hill, and one on Squires Hill. Great numbers of stone and flint hatchets, and arrow-heads of flint, have been discovered; and brazen celts and querns, or hand mill-stones, are occasionally found. The mineral productions of the parish are, coal, iron, manganese, marble, limestone, freestone, gypsum, and fullers'-earth, of which the limestone is worked: the coal-seams are seen in the Collin and the Dunmurry water, and under the lands of Willmount, near which place also, and at New Forge, is the iron; the manganese, at the foot of the Black mountain, near which is a fine stratum of grey marble; and the gypsum, in the Collin and the Forth water.

Among the eminent natives of this place may be noticed, Dr. Black, the celebrated chymist; the Rev. T. Romney Robinson, author of an able mathematical work, and principal astronomer in the observatory at Armagh; J. Templeton, Esq., who left in manuscript The Botany and Natural History of Ireland; and J. Emerson Tennent, Esq., author of the History of Modern Greece, &c. Among the distinguished persons who have resided here may be mentioned the late Dr. R. Tennent, the philanthropist; Dr. Abernethy, author of the Attributes; Edward Bunting, a celebrated professor of music and collector of the ancient melodies of Ireland; Dr. J. L. Drummond, author of some scientific treatises and botanical works; Dr. Bruce, author of a life of Homer and other works; and Dr. W. H. Drummond, author of various poetical, religious, and political works. Belfast gives the titles of Earl and Baron to the ancient family of Chichester, Marquesses of Donegal.

BELGOLY, a village, in the parish of KILMONGUE, union of KINSALE, barony of KINNALEA, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N. E.) from Kinsale; containing 141 inhabitants. It is on the southern coast; consists of 26 houses, several of which are neatly built; and has extensive houting-mills, a potato-starch factory, and a vinegar distillery.

BELGRIFFIN, or BALGRIFFIN, a parish, in the union of NORTH DUBLIN, barony of COOLOCK, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (N. E.) from Dublin; containing, with the parish of St. Douglough's, 540 inhabitants. This place formerly belonged to the ancient family of the De Burgos, who held the manor in the 14th century, and by whom the castle was erected. It afterwards became the property of the O'Neills and De Batches, and the castle was for some time the residence of Richard, Duke of Tyrconnel, Lord-Deputy of Ireland under James II. The parish is on the turnpike-road from Dublin to Malahide, and comprises 1052½ statute acres: the lands are chiefly under tillage; the system of agriculture is improving, and the parish generally is noted as a corn district. Belgiffin Park is pleasantly situated; the mansion is built with the materials of the ancient castle, of which there are now no remains. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin: the rectory was formerly united to that of Drumsallen and to the half-rectories of Kilcullen and Glasnevin, together forming the corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin, until suppressed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; the vicarage is part of the union of St. Douglough's, in the patronage of the Crown. The lands in this parish belonging to the precentor comprised 29a. 2r. 3p., and the lands of the rectorial union altogether 680a. 3r. 21p., making the gross income of the precentorship, including the tithes, £484. 19. per annum: this calculation was made before the passing of the Tithe Rent-charge act. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Baldoyle and Howth. There are some remains of the old church.

BELLAGHY, a village, in the parish of BALLYSCULLION, union of MAGHERAFELT, barony of LOUGHINSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 9½ miles (S.) from Kilrea, and 100½ (N.) from Dublin; containing 739 inhabitants. This place became the head of a district granted in the reign of James I. to the Vintners' Company, of London, who, in 1619, founded the village, and erected a strong and spacious castle, the custody of which they entrusted to Baptist Jones, who had a well-armed garrison of 76 men for its defence. In the war of 1641 the castle was besieged and taken by a party of insurgents under the command of one of the MacDonnells, and in the following year burned to the ground. It occupied a gentle eminence on the north-west side of the village, but no portion of it is remaining; the very site has been cultivated as gardens, and the only traces are some of the arched cellars beneath the roots of some large trees. The village is situated on the western shore of Lough Beg, and on the roads leading respectively from Castle-Dawson to Portlengone and from Kilrea to Toome; it consists of one long street intersected at right angles by two shorter streets. The houses, in number 144, are generally small, but well built; and the environs are remarkably pleasant, and embellished with gentlemen's seats: there is a receiving-house for letters to and from Castle-Dawson and Portlengone. Fairs are held on the first Monday in every month, for the sale of cattle, sheep, and pigs, and are well attended. A court for the Vintners' manor is held once every month, for the recovery of debts under £2: its jurisdiction extends over the parishes of Ballyscullion, Kilrea, Tamlaght-O'Crilly, Termoneeny, Maghera, Desertmartin, Kileronaghan, Magherafelt, and Killelagh. Adjoining the village is the parish church of Ballyscullion, a handsome building; and at a short distance is a small Roman Catholic chapel. Here are also a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, and a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. The parochial school for boys and girls, a large building, was erected at the joint expense of the Marquess of Lothian, Earl of Clancarty, Lord Strarford, and the Hon. T. Pakenham, G.C.B., proprietors of the estate by purchase from the Vintners' Company, and who also endowed it with £5 per annum: a like sum is granted by the rector.—See BALLYSCULLION.

BELLAGHY, a village, in the parish of ACHONRY, union of BOYLE, barony of LENEX, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 10 miles (S. W.) from Ballymote, on the road to Swinford; containing 65 houses and 293 inhabitants. A market for provisions is held on Wednesday, and a fair every month: the market-house is situated in the centre of the village. Here is also a station of the constabulary police.—See ACHONRY.

BELLAIR, a hamlet, in the parish of LEMMANAGHAN, union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of GARRYCASTLE, KING's county, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (W.)

from Clara. The village, which is of modern origin, is situated on the road from Clara to Moat, and was founded by the family of Mullock: it has a neat and orderly appearance; the houses are built of stone, and slated. Petty-sessions are held here and at Doone every alternate Friday.—See LEMMANAGHAN.

BELLANACARGY, Cavan.—See BALLINACARGY.

BELLANAMALLARD.—See BALLYNAMALLARD.

BELLANAGH.—See BALLINA.

BELLANODE, county MONAGHAN.—See BALLINODE.

BELLATRAIN, MONAGHAN.—See BALLYTRAIN.

BELLAUGH, a village, in the parish of St. Peter, union and barony of ATHLONE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, ¾ of a mile (W.) from Athlone; containing 298 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Athlone to Ballinasloe, and occupies an area of about eleven acres; the number of houses, according to the census, is 57.

BELLAVARY, county of MAYO.—See BALLYVARY.

BELLECK, county of ARMAGH.—See BALLECK.

BELLECK, a parish, in the union of BALLYSHANNON, barony of LURG, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (E.) from Ballyshannon; containing 2875 inhabitants, of whom 251 are in the village. This place is situated on Lough Erne, and on the road from Enniskillen to Ballyshannon, and was erected into a parish in 1792, by disuniting 36 townlands from the parish of Templecarra; it comprises 12,848½ statute acres, of which 9706 are appertained under the Tithe act, and 2576 are water. The land is principally heathy mountain, but that which is under tillage is of very superior quality; the state of agriculture, though very backward, is gradually improving. There is a large tract of bog, and abundance of limestone. The village contains 46 houses, and has a receiving-house for letters to and from Ballyshannon and Enniskillen: it is a station of the constabulary police; fairs are held on Feb. 3rd, March 17th, May 17th, June 20th, and Oct. 10th, and petty-sessions every alternate Thursday. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £62. 10. The church, a neat plain edifice, was erected in 1790, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £267. 9. for its repair. The glebe-house is a handsome residence; the glebe comprises 660 statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Templecarra or Pettigo; the chapel is a spacious and well-built edifice, with a slated roof. There are some ruins of the old church; on the shore of Lough Keenaghan are those of an abbey; and there are remains of several Danish forts in the parish.

BELLEVASTOWN, a village, in the parish of DULEEK, union of DRUGHEDA, barony of UPPER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (E.) from Duleek; containing 13 houses and 77 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Duleek to Laytown, and on the Nanny water. Races are held in June on the hill of Bellevastown, and are well attended; the days vary, but on the last Thursday in the month the king's cup is run for. The view from this hill is very extensive, embracing the Carlingford and Morne mountains, and the bays of Dundalk and Carlingford.—See DULEEK.

BELLINA, or BELLIA, a village, in the parish and barony of MOYARTA, union of KILRUSH, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 8½ miles (W.) from Kilrush; containing 213 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Kilkee to Loophead.

BELLOUGH, a village, in the parish of CLONOUPLY, barony of LOWER KILNEMANAGH, union of CASHEL, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. E.) from Cashel, on the high road from Tipperary to Thurles; containing 33 houses and 217 inhabitants.

BELMULLET, a small sea-port, in the parish of KILCOMMON, union of BALLINA, barony of ERRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3¼ miles (W. by N.) from Ballina; containing 637 inhabitants. This place is beautifully and advantageously situated on an isthmus to which it gives name, and which separates the bay of Blacksod from that of Broadhaven. It is a rapidly improving town: the surrounding district, about 30 years ago, was scarcely accessible; but since that period, by the construction of several lines of road by Messrs. Nimmo, Knight, and Bald, the engineers, and more especially those from the county town of Castlebar and from Ballina, the whole barony has been thrown open, and a great improvement has taken place in the agriculture of the district and the commerce of the port. In 1822 the land in the barony produced only about 80 tons of oats and barley; in 1834 and 1835, the annual produce was 1800 tons. This great improvement has resulted from the reclaiming of the adjacent lands, and from Belmullet having become a very considerable mart, where the neighbouring farmers can readily find immediate purchasers for all their produce. The town owes its origin to the establishment of the head-quarters of the commander of the coast-guard here in 1822; it is uniformly built, and its general appearance, as seen from Blacksod bay, is pleasing and prepossessing. A new line of road has been constructed along the coast, from Ballycastle to Belmullet, and thence to Westport, a distance of 57 miles, forming a most interesting drive. The trade consists chiefly in the export of grain, especially of oats and barley; and several spacious warehouses have been built for the deposit of corn. A commodious quay was constructed in 1826, at an expense of £700, of which sum £300 were given by the late Fishery Board, and £300 by Mr. Carter. The harbour is capable of very great improvement, and by cutting through the narrow part of the isthmus, a canal might be made, at an estimated expense of £2000, which would enable vessels of 150 tons' burthen to pass from Broadhaven into Blacksod bay, and in all winds at full tide into the Atlantic Ocean, without being detained for months, as is now frequently the case. Fairs are held on the 15th of every month, except when it falls on Sunday, in which case the fair is held on the following Monday. Here is a chief constabulary police station; and the coast-guard district comprises the stations of Belmullet, Dugurth, Duhooma, Ballycovey, Blacksod, Ballyglass, and Renown Tower. Petty-sessions are held every Saturday; the court-house was built in 1833, at an expense of £300, by Mr. Ivers. There is also a dispensary. In the vicinity are several gentlemen's seats.

BELTUBET, a market and post town, partly in the parish of DRUMLANE, but chiefly in that of ANNAGH, union of CAVAN, barony of LOWER LOUGHTER, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 12 miles (N. N. W.) from Cavan, and 67 (N. W.) from Dublin; containing 2070 inhabitants. This place, which is pleasantly situated on the river Erne, about four miles from its junction with the lough of that name, and on the road from Cavan to Ballyconnell, owes its origin to the Lanesborough family, whose patronage has also contributed materially to its prosperity. In 1610, certain conditions were proposed by the lords of the council in England to Sir Stephen Butler, of Bealtirbirt, Knt., for establishing a market here, and erecting a corporation; and in 1613 it received its first charter, whereby the king, on petition of the inhabitants, and for the purpose of furthering the plantation of Ulster, incorporated the village and its precincts into a borough. By an indenture in 1618 Sir Stephen Butler, in fulfilment of the conditions of the lords of the council, granted or confirmed to the corporation certain parcels of land amounting altogether to 284 acres, also a weekly market and two annual fairs, and a weekly court of record, the whole to be held of him or his successors in the fee, in fee-farm for ever, at the rent of 30s. yearly. This indenture contains a covenant on the part of the corporation, that the inhabitants should be ready at all times to be mustered and trained to arms whenever required by Sir Stephen, his heirs, or assigns, or by the Muster-master General of Ulster, or any of the king's officers duly authorised; and that they should grind their corn at Sir Stephen's mill. By Pinnar's survey, made in 1619, it appears that the newly-erected houses were built of "cage work," and inhabited by English tradesmen, who had each a garden, four acres of land, and commonage for a certain number of cows and horses. In 1690, Belturbet, being garrisoned by a body of the forces of James II., was taken by surprise by the Enniskilleners, who fortified it for their own party. The town contains 359 houses, several of them neat, but the greater number indifferently built and merely thatched. The wide expanse of Lough Erne to the north, and the varied character of the surrounding scenery, impart to the environs an interesting and highly picturesque appearance. A handsome bridge of three arches has been erected over the Erne, for which the Board of Works consented to grant a loan of £1700. There is a cavalry barracks for 7 officers, 156 non-commissioned officers and men, and 101 horses. A very extensive distillery was erected in 1825 at an expense of £21,000, and enlarged and improved in 1830, at an additional cost of £6000: there are also some malting establishments. The river opens a communication through Lough Erne to within three miles of Ballyshannon; but in dry weather the navigation is interrupted by shoals, which might however be removed, to the great improvement of the trade of the town. The market is on Thursday, and is principally for butter, oatmeal, potatoes, and yarn, of which last there is a good supply: fairs are held on Ash-Wednesday, Sept. 4th, and the first Thursday in every other month. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Drogheda; and it is a station of the constabulary police.

The charter of James I., granted in 1613, after incorporating the inhabitants, empowered them to return two representatives to the Irish parliament, and to hold a court of record every Tuesday, before the provost, with jurisdiction to the extent of five marks, besides conferring other privileges. All these rights were confirmed by the indenture made between Sir Stephen Butler and the corporation, by which, also, the jurisdiction of the court of record in all actions, personal or mixed, was extended to £6.13.4., and it was ordered to be held before the bailiff and stewards of the corporation, every Saturday. The corporation, previously to its late dissolution, was styled "The Provost, Burgesses, Freemen, and Inhabitants of the Borough of Belturbet," which in some degree differs from the style prescribed by the charter of James I. and the indenture. The officers were a provost, twelve free burgesses, two serjeants-at-mace, a treasurer, town-clerk, herd, marshal-keeper or corporation gaoler, pound-keeper, foreman of the market jury, and weigh-master. The provost was by the charter to be elected by the provost and free burgesses from among the latter annually on the 24th of June, and to be sworn in upon Sept. 29th. The burgesses were chosen from among the inhabitants by the provost and free burgesses, and, by the usage of the corporation, had to be freemen prior to their election; there were latterly only nine or ten, all non-resident, and they were formerly entitled to certain privileges and emoluments subsequently lost. No recognised right to the freedom lately existed, nor does it appear that any freemen had been admitted by the provost and burgesses for many years, except for the purpose of qualifying persons who were immediately after elected burgesses. The town-clerk, and other officers of the corporation whose offices had not fallen into desuetude, were appointed by the provost. The municipal affairs were partly regulated by the inhabitants assembled by the provost at what were termed "Town Courts," which were held before the provost generally eight or ten times in the year, and in which by-laws were made for the government of the town. Complaints of trespass respecting commonage and upon the private lands within the district, were referred for investigation and adjustment to the market jury. This jury consisted of not less than twelve members, appointed from the inhabitants by the provost, and sworn in at the town court; its duties were not only to inspect the meat brought to market, but to superintend the property of the corporation generally, the jury forming, in fact, a court of arbitration, and exercising a jurisdiction which was highly beneficial to the inhabitants. The corporation continued to exercise its functions until the passing of the act, 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108, when it was dissolved, and the management and disposal of its funds were vested in twenty-one commissioners, appointed on the 19th of January, 1841, under the provisions of the act, 9th George IV., cap. 82, for lighting, cleansing, and watching the town.

The borough sent members to parliament until the Union, when the £15,000 awarded as compensation for the abolition of its franchise were paid to Armar, Earl of Belmore, who had a short time previously purchased the borough for that amount from the Earl of Lanesborough. It comprised the town and precincts, forming a district termed "the corporation," the boundaries of which are clearly defined. The provost was chief magistrate, and was by usage the first magistrate named upon the commission in the county, and next in rank to the lieutenant; he anciently sat with the judges at the county assizes, but had not for many years exercised this privilege. The court of record, in which he presided, has been in disuse for nearly 40 years. Petty-sessions are held by the county magistrates every Saturday in the market-house, of which the upper part is appropriated to that use, and the lower to the purpose of the market. Beneath this building was the corporation gaol, a damp and unhealthy prison, which was prohibited to be used as a place of confinement after the passing of the act of the 7th of George IV., c. 74. The commons, as held by the late corporation, comprised about 120 acres; the right of commonage enjoyed by the inhabitants was regulated by the possession of the whole or a portion of a homestead, to which also a proportionate quantity of bog was annexed. These homesteads included certain portions of the front of streets, defined and granted to individuals on the original foundation of the town, and subsequently divided among different tenants, and the right to commonage was by usage similarly apportioned. The lands allotted for the private occupation of the burgesses are said to have been granted to them and their heirs, instead of their successors, and, under the name of "burgess acres," are divided and separately inclosed as private properties. The only revenue which the corporation possessed at the time of its dissolution, was derivable from some nominal reservations on fee-farm grants made, within the last few years, of small portions of the commons, the fines on which, amounting to £175, were applied to the repairs of the market-house.

The parish church of Annagh, a neat edifice with a tower surmounted by a spire, is situated in the town; it was rebuilt by a loan of £923 from the Board of First Fruits in 1828, and of £800 in 1829. The parochial school for boys, here, is on the foundation of Erasmus Smith, and was built on an acre of ground granted by the corporation, who also gave a site for the erection of a school for girls on the same establishment; there are likewise an infants' school, and a dispensary. Six almshouses for poor widows were built on a site granted by the corporation in 1733; the inmates are supported by a legacy bequeathed by a Mr. Maunsell, of Dublin, and distributed by the rector. He also distributes the interest of £100, paid by the Earl of Lanesborough's agent, £3 per annum derived from a charity called Fello's List, and £6 per annum accruing from another charity; and there is a house in the town, bequeathed by Benjamin Johnson for the benefit of the poor, and let for £1.16. per annum. In the churchyard are vestiges of a strong fortification inclosing an extensive area, with bastions and salient angles of great strength; about two miles distant are some venerable ecclesiastical ruins; others are situated at Clinooy; and in the vicinity are the remains of an ancient castle.—See ANNAGH and DRUMLANE.

BENBUBB, or BINBURN, a village, in the parish of CLONFEACLE, union and barony of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 5½ miles (N.N.W.) from Armagh; containing 330 inhabitants. The first notice of this place under its present name occurs during the rebellion of the Earl of Tyrone. The Lord-Deputy Boroughs crossed the river Blackwater at Bean-Rhor, at the head of the English forces, with a view to subdue the earl, in June 1597; and, being seized with a sickness of which he died a few days after at Newry, was succeeded in the command of the army by the Earl of Kildare, between whom and Tyrone a severe engagement took place. The English were defeated, the Earl of Kildare mortally wounded, and his two foster-brothers slain; many of the English were killed in battle, and numbers perished in the river. Sir Henry Bagnall, with 4500 foot and 400 horse, now marched against Tyrone's army, with which he had a severe conflict: at first, many of the English cavalry were dreadfully mangled by falling into pits dug by the enemy and covered with branches of trees; but after surmounting these and other obstacles, Bagnall made a vigorous attack upon the right wing of the Irish army, commanded by the earl himself, and on the left under O'Donnell, of Tyrconnell. This attack was well nigh successful; a dreadful carnage ensued, the two armies being wholly engaged; but just when victory seemed to incline towards the English forces, Bagnall was shot by a musket-ball in the forehead and fell dead on the field. The English, thrown into confusion by the loss of their leader, were defeated; and in their retreat to Armagh, many were trodden down by the Irish cavalry. This triumph of Tyrone, however, was but of short duration; the Lord-Deputy Mountjoy defeated him in several battles, and drove him back to the camp at Bean-Bhor, where, on the 15th of July, 1601, another battle was fought, in which Tyrone was totally defeated and his army compelled to retreat in confusion to his chief fortress at Dunganon.

On the plantation of Ulster, Sir Robert Wingfield received from James I. a grant of 1000 acres of land at Benburb, by a deed dated December 3rd, in the 8th year of that monarch's reign; and previously to the year 1619 he had erected a castle on these lands, built the present church, and founded the village, which at that time contained 20 houses. This new establishment continued to flourish till the breaking out of the war in 1641, when the castle was surprised by order of Sir Phelim O'Neil, on the night of the 22nd of October, and the whole of the inmates put to death. On the 5th of June, 1646, this place became the scene of a battle between Sir Phelim O'Neil and General Monroe; the former, with a large body of men, took up a position between two hills, with a wood in his rear, and the river Blackwater, at that time difficult to pass, on his right. Monroe, with 6000 foot and 800 horse, marched from Armagh, and approached by the opposite bank of the river, where finding a ford, now called Battleford Bridge, he crossed to meet O'Neil. Both armies were drawn up in order of battle, but instead of coming to a general engagement, the day was spent in skirmishing, till the sun, which had been favourable to the British, was declining, when, just as Monroe was beginning to retreat, he was attacked by the Irish, who made a furious onset. An English regiment commanded by Lord Blaney fought with undaunted resolution till they were cut to pieces and their leader slain; the Scottish horse next gave way, and the infantry being thrown into disorder, a general rout ensued. More than 3000 of the British forces were slain, and their artillery and stores taken; while, on the part of O'Neil, not more than 70 were killed.

The castle was soon after dismantled, and has ever since remained in ruins; it was the largest in the county, and, though weakly built, occupies a remarkably strong position on the summit of a limestone rock rising perpendicularly from the river Blackwater to the height of 120 feet. In the village is a small ancient out-post, strongly built, and probably forming an entrance to the castle, which on every other side was defended by natural barriers. There were formerly very extensive bleach-grounds, and the mills and engines are still remaining; but the principal part of the business is now carried on at Tollydoe, where large quantities of linen are finished for the English markets; the weaving of linen is also carried on to some extent. The Ulster canal passes on the eastern side of the river and village: it is here carried through a hill of limestone, which has been excavated to the depth of 80 feet; and is conducted longitudinally over the mill-race by an aqueduct of considerable length. A court is held on the first Friday in every month, for the manor of Benburb, which extends over 47 townlands, and comprises 9210 acres; it is for the recovery of debts not exceeding £2. The parish church is situated close to the village, in which is also a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. The ruins of the castle are extensive and highly picturesque; near the walls has been found a signet ring bearing the arms and initials of Turlogh O'Neil. The O'Neils had a stronghold here of greater antiquity than the castle erected by Sir R. Wingfield.—See CLONFACLE.

BENDENSTOWN.—See GILBERTSTOWN.

BENEKERRY, otherwise BUSHERSTOWN, an ancient parish, in the union, barony, and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.N.E.) from Carlow; containing 135 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Carlow to Tullow, and is bounded on the south-west and east by the river Burren: more than four-fifths consist of meadow and pasture land, and the remainder is arable, with a few acres of wood. In the ecclesiastical divisions it is not regarded as a parish, but as forming part of that of Urrlin, the incumbent of which receives the tithes rent-charge, except of about ten acres, which pay tithes to the incumbent of Ballinacarrig or Staplestown.

BENMORE, or BALLYDUFF, a village, in that part of the parish of RATTOW which is in the barony of CLANMAURICE, union of LISTOWEL, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 12 miles (N.N.W.) from Tralee; containing 331 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Tralee to Ballyhunnian, by the Cashen ferry; and contains 65 houses, which are mostly thatched, and form one street. Fairs are held on the 1st of June and Sept., Nov. 10th, and Dec. 21st. It is a constabulary police station, and petty-sessions are held every alternate week. The Roman Catholic chapel, a slated building, is in the centre of the village. Ballyeagh, near it, was the scene of a desperate affray, in the summer of 1834, between the rival factions of the Coolens and Lawlors, when sixteen of the former were killed or drowned, while endeavouring to cross the Cashen ferry, in their retreat. Ballyhargh, an ancient seat of the Stoughton family, is in the neighbourhood.—See RATTOW.

BENNETTS-BRIDGE, a village, in the union of KILKENNY, partly in the parish of TREADINGSTOWN, barony of GOWRAN, and partly in that of DANESFORT, barony of SHILLELOGHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Gowran; containing 263 inhabitants. This place is situated on the river Nore, which is here crossed by a good stone bridge on the road from Kilkenny to Thomastown; and contains 60 houses. There are some flour-mills in the immediate vicinity. Fairs are held on Feb. 24th, Aug. 26th, Sept. 19th, and Dec. 21st; and the village is a station of the constabulary police. There is a Roman Catholic chapel of ease to Danesfort, with a national school adjoining it.—See KILLARNEY and DANESFORT.

BENOWEN, or BUNNOWN, a parish, in the union of ATHLONE, barony of KILKENNY WEST, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N. by E.) from Athlone; containing 1548 inhabitants. This parish forms the north-eastern bank of an arm of Lough Ree, called the Inner Lake, and, near the village of Glassen, touches for a few perches on the road from Athlone to Ballymahon. It was the retreat of Sir James Dillon when driven from Athlone, which he had taken in 1641 by one of the boldest military manœuvres on record. In his retreat from that place Sir James at first took up his quarters at Bally-Kieran, but afterwards retired to the castle of Killyure, in this parish, whence, in about three weeks, he recaptured Athlone, which, after a short occupation, he was again compelled to abandon. The parish comprises 6887 statute acres; about 160 acres are underwood and bog, and of the remainder the principal portion is arable and pasture. Agriculture is in a state of slow but progressive improvement; the chief waste lands are the rocky shores of the lake. Portlick Castle is beautifully situated on the border of Lough Ree, and is one of the very few ancient ferial castles at present in good repair and inhabited: Killenmore is also finely situated on the border of the lake; and on Hare Island, in the lake, is a beautiful cottage belonging to Viscount Castlemaine. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes rent-charge is £69. 5., payable to the lessee of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church, a neat plain structure, was erected in 1818, by aid of a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built in 1828, by aid of a gift of £415 and a loan of £46 from the same Board; the glebe consists of 18½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Nonghoral. The ruins of the ancient church, in which are some monuments to the Dillon family, are romantically situated on the verdant bank, and at the very extremity, of the Inner Lake; and a little higher up are the ruins of the castle of Benowen. A small portion, also, of Killinure Castle still remains, occupying a bold and picturesque eminence over the Inner Lake, and adjoining Killinure House; and on Hare Island are the ruins of a religious house, founded by the family of Dillon, some of whose descendants still live in the neighbourhood. There is a well dedicated to the Blessed Virgin.—See GLASSON.

BERAGH.—See BEREGH.

BERE, or BEAR ISLAND. This island forms part of the parish of KILACONENAGH, in the union of BANTRY, barony of BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER: it is situated on the north side of the bay of Bantry, 21 miles (W. by S.) from Bantry. It comprises 2849 statute acres, of which about one-fourth is under tillage, and the remainder consists of mountain, bog, and pasture land. The inhabitants are principally occupied in fishing and agriculture, but the system of husbandry is rude and unimproved. A pier has been built at Lawrence Cove, which is very useful, affording protection to 16 hookers of 12 tons, and 90 yawls of 3 or 4 tons each, all belonging to the island, and employing about 1000 persons exclusively in the fishery. The southern shore is bold and rocky, but on the north the land slopes gently to the water's edge: there is a small lake on the south side. The whole island is of the clay-slate formation, and excellent stone for flagging is obtained in some of the quarries: copper-ore has been found in several places, but no attempt has yet been made to open mines. The chief communication is by boats from Castletown, and there are also boats from the Bank and other places on the main land. After the arrival of the French fleet in the bay, in 1796, government erected five Martello towers, a signal tower, a large and commodious barrack for two officers and 150 men, a quay, some storehouses, and other public works, all of which are now in a neglected condition; the barrack, indeed, has been taken down, and the rest of the works are under the care of a single resident lieutenant. In the Roman Catholic divisions this island forms part of the union of Castletown, in the diocese of Kerry: the chapel is a low thatched building of mean appearance, occupying the site of an ancient church. Divine service is regularly performed in the school-house by the vicar. The sites of three churches are indicated by the burial-grounds, which are still used for interment; and there are the remains of a Danish fort or rath on the island. Between the island and the main land is Bere-haven, capacious and well sheltered, and affording good anchorage in water sufficiently deep for the largest ships in the navy; it has two entrances, one at the west and the other at the east end of the island, both rendered somewhat dangerous by rocks. Bere-haven gives the inferior title of Viscount to the Earl of Bantry.

BEREGH, or LOWRYSTOWN, a market-town, in the parish of CLOGHERNY, union and barony of OMAGH, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (S. E.) from Omagh; containing 617 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Omagh to Dungannon, and consists of one long wide street of 127 houses, some of which are well built. The Belmore family are proprietors of the town. The inhabitants are principally employed in trade and agriculture. The patent for the market was granted to the place under the name of Lowrystown; the market is on Wednesday, and fairs are held regularly on the first Monday in every month, for cattle, sheep, and pigs. Here is a receiving-house for letters from Dungannon and Omagh; and one of the chapels for the Roman Catholic parish of Clogherny is situated in the town.—See CLOGHERNY.

BERGER ISLAND, in the parish of KILDYSART, union of KILRUSH, barony of CLONDERLAW, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER. It lies in the river Fermoy, and comprises 7½ statute acres.

BESSY'S ISLAND, in the parish of DONAGHADEE, union of NEWTOWN-ARDES, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER. It lies off the Copeland Isles in the Irish Sea.

BETAGHSTOWN, or BETTYSTOWN, a village, in the parish of COLPE, union and barony of LOWER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles

(E. S. E.) from Drogheda. This place is situated on the eastern coast, and has considerably improved since the opening of the Dublin and Drogheda railway. An hotel has been established; and several new houses have been built as bathing-lodges, the village having become, owing to its shallow strand and extent of fine sandy beach, a place of some resort for sea-bathing. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and in the immediate vicinity are many handsome private residences.—See COLPE.

BEWLEY.—See OWNING.

BILLY, a parish, partly in the barony of CAREY, but chiefly in that of LOWER DUNLUCK, poor-law union of COLERAINE, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Bushmills and a portion of Dunseverick, 7277 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the west by the river Bush, and on the south-east by the sea; it is intersected for nearly three miles by the road from Ballymoney, through Bushmills to the Giants' Causeway, which is within its limits. Including eight townlands that now form part of the parish of Dunseverick, it comprises 17,329½ statute acres. The land is generally in a good state of cultivation; the system of agriculture is considerably advanced, and is still improving; there is very little waste land, except moss and bog, which together form nearly one-third of the surface. Whinstone abounds, and is quarried for building and for the roads; limestone is found in great quantity and occasionally burned for manure, and wood-coal is obtained near the Causeway. On the river, near its influx into the sea, are some weirs for taking salmon, of which great quantities are sent to Liverpool and London. A market on Tuesday, and five fairs, are held at Bushmills (which see); and on the day after Dercock fair, which is generally on Aug. 12th (except that day falls on the Saturday or Sunday, in which case it is held on the Monday following), a pleasure fair, called the Causeway fair, is held at the Rock Head, above the Giants' Causeway, and is numerously attended by persons for many miles round, for whose accommodation tents are pitched.

This parish was formerly the head of an ecclesiastical union, which comprised also the parishes of Armoyn, Ballyclug, Donegore, and Kilbride, together forming the corps of the archdeaconry of Connor; but by the act of the 5th of George IV., obtained by Dr. Mant, the union was dissolved, four of the parishes appropriated from the archdeaconry, and the rectorial tithes annexed to their respective vicarages. The rectory and vicarage of Billy alone now constitute the corps of the archdeaconry, with the cure of souls, the former archdeacons having had no cure of souls: the benefice is in the diocese of Connor, and patronage of the Bishop. The late Archdeacon Trail, then rector of this parish, in 1830, separated eight townlands from it, giving the tithes of three; and his brother, the Rev. Robert Trail, rector of Ballintoy, seven townlands from that parish, giving also the tithes of three; for the formation and endowment of the perpetual curacy of Dunseverick, the patronage of which is vested alternately in the respective Incumbents; the new church is a very neat building in a central situation. The tithe rent-charge of the parish of Billy, including the eight townlands, is £366. 18. 6. The church of Billy, a plain substantial building, was erected on the site of a former structure, by aid of a gift of £800 and a loan of £500, in 1815, from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built in 1810, by the Rev. T. Babington, vicar, aided by a gift of £350 and a loan of £450 from the same Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Coleraigne. There are meeting-houses for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, for Covenanters, and Wesleyan Methodists. At Eagry is a school under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, for which a good school-house has been erected, with a residence for the master, who has two acres of land; there is a school for girls, for which a house was built, in 1832, by William Trail, Esq.; and another school is held in the Methodist meeting-house at Castle-Cat, which was endowed with £20 by the late Dr. Adam Clarke. Archdeacon Trail, in 1831, bequeathed £50 for the use of the poor of the parish, which has been invested in government securities; and the interest is annually distributed. There are some remains of the ancient castle of Ballylough, a fortress of much importance; the lake on which it was situated has been drained, and is now under cultivation.

THE GIANTS' CAUSEWAY, probably the most extensive and curious assemblage of basaltic columns in the world, is situated between Port-na-Grange and Port Noffer, in N. Lat. 55° 20' and W. Lon. 6° 50'; and derives its name from a popular tradition that it was erected by giants, as the commencement of a causeway across the ocean to Scotland. This very interesting natural curiosity forms part of a large promontory, the extremity of which, called Bengore Head, about a mile distant, is the most northern point in Ireland. The only access to it by land is down a winding path, cut at the expense of the late Earl of Bristol, while Bishop of Derry, on the western side of a verdant headland named Aird Snout, to two detached hills called the Stookans, whence the first view of this stupendous work of nature is obtained. This view is one of the most magnificent imaginable, embracing an immense bay broken with capes and headlands, which rise abruptly to the height of 400 feet above the level of the sea, and consist of lofty colonnades of the most symmetrically-formed basaltic pillars, inserted in the cliffs like artificial supporters, standing in groups like gigantic honeycombs, or scattered in pleasing disorder like the ruins of a city of temples and palaces. From the Stookans the road leads to the base of the Causeway, which extends nearly in a northerly direction from the promontory into the sea. This splendid natural pier is somewhat triangular in form; the base beneath the cliff being 135, the eastern side 220, and the western 300, yards long; while the breadth in the centre is about 60. The view of the causeway from the footpath suggests the idea of an unfinished embankment, constituting an inclined plane, in some places descending by successive steps, in others presenting a nearly level pavement formed by the tops of the closely united columns, with some chasms exhibiting the admirable arrangement of this wonderful structure.

The causeway is divided into three unequal parts. The Little, or Western, causeway is 356 feet long, but only 16 high, and is separated from the central compartment by an enormous whin dyke, extending from the cliff to the sea. The Middle section, which is the shortest, contains a magnificent group of lofty pillars, called "the Honeycomb," and is also bonned on the east by a whin dyke. Beyond this is the Grand causeway, 706 feet long by 109 wide in the middle: in that part of this compartment which is called "the Loom" it has an elevation of 34 feet, from which it diminishes in height gradually as it approaches the sea, into which it enters for some distance beyond low-water mark. In the western and central compartments all the columns are perpendicular, but in the grand causeway some of them are vertical, inclining eastward as they approach the sea, and westward near the base of the cliff. The three divisions of the causeway comprise 37,426 distinct and perfect columns, besides many that are broken and scattered about in its vicinity. The columns consist of prisms of equal dimensions through their whole height, which ranges from 15 to 36 feet, with diameters of from 15 to 28 inches; they vary in their number of sides from three to nine, although the greater number are pentagons and hexagons. Each of the pillars is perfectly distinct, and almost invariably differs in size, number of sides, and points of articulation from the adjacent columns, to which, however, it is so close that not even water can pass between them. Nearly every column is composed of several pieces, the joints of which are articulated with the greatest exactness, and in a strictly horizontal direction. Generally the upper part of the section of a column is concave, and the lower convex, but this arrangement is sometimes reversed. The cavity or socket is perfectly circular, from two to four inches deep; and in a few instances its rim is divided, covers two or three articulations, and terminates in sharp points. In a few of the columns no joints are visible; in some, three, four, or more may be traced; and, in "the Loom," columns are found which are divisible into as many as 38 pieces. The basalt of which these columns are composed is of a very dark colour, approaching to black; its weight is three times as great as that of water; and of 100 of its constituent parts, 50 are silicious earth, 25 iron, 15 argillaceous earth, and 10 calcareous earth and magnesia.

About 300 yards east of the causeway is the Giant's Organ, about 120 feet long, and consisting of 60 columns, of which those in the centre are 40 feet high, but those on the sides are lower. At the eastern extremity of Port Noffer are four lofty and massive basaltic columns, rising to the height of 315 feet; they are hexagonal and jointed, and from their height and isolated position are called the Chimney Tops. Near these is the Theatre, consisting of three distinct colonnades, whose successive tiers are separated by horizontal strata of amorphous basalt, red and grey ochre, and fossil-coal, the alternations of which with the columnar basalt produce a very extraordinary and pleasing appearance. A little eastward of Port-na-Spagna is a perpendicular cliff, 326 feet high, composed of alternate layers of columnar and horizontal basalt, arranged with surprising regularity; but the most picturesque cliff of all is Pleashin, which rises from the sea in a gentle acclivity for more than 300 feet, and then ascends perpendicularly 70 feet more to its summit. This beautiful headland is 382 feet in total height, and strikingly exhibits the geological formation of the district, as it consists of numerous clearly distinguishable strata. These rise above each other in the following order; at the base is a bright red ochreous rock, on which are placed tabular basalt, grey ochreous rock, amorphous basalt, clear red basalt, irregular basalt with cracks, iron-ore, imperfectly formed basaltic pillars, argillaceous rock, fossil-coal, and the lower range of basaltic columns, which is 45 feet high. Imposed on this colonnade are, grey rock containing nodules of iron; slightly columnar basalt; grey ochreous rock; amorphous basalt; and then the upper range of basaltic pillars, which forms a magnificent colonnade 64 feet high, and has broken basalt for a superstratum, above which is vegetable mould covered with green sod. This splendid headland, unrivalled for beauty of arrangement and variety of colouring, is seen to most advantage from the sea, from which, also, some of the grandest views of the causeway and its adjacent scenery are obtained. Fossil-wood, as black and compact as coal, and fossil oysters and muscles, are found in the limestone rock that forms the substratum of the causeway and its neighbouring promontories; and large opals, chalcedony, agates, &c., are also collected here. Specimens of these fossils and minerals, and a wooden model of the causeway, are in the museum of Trinity College, Dublin.

BINGHAMSTOWN, or SALEEN, a village, in the parish of KILMORE-ERRIS, union of BALLINA, barony of ERRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (S. E.) from Belmullet; containing 436 inhabitants. This place is situated on the eastern shore of the peninsula called the Mullet, and consists of one long street of 82 houses indifferently built: it commands a good view of Saleen bay, in which a landing pier was erected by the late Fishery Board, where considerable quantities of corn and potatoes are shipped for Westport, whence various articles of merchandise are brought back. A fair is held on the first day of every month, throughout the year; there is a market-house. Petty-sessions are held in a court-house every Thursday; and here is a constabulary police station. The parish church, a neat plain edifice, is situated in the village, in which is also a Roman Catholic chapel.—See KILMORE-ERRIS.

BIRD ISLAND, in the parish of INNISHARGY, union of NEWTOWN-ARDES, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER. It lies in Lough Strangford.

BIRMINGHAM, NEW, a village or post-town, in the parish of KILCOOLEY, union of THURLES, barony of SLIEVEKARDACH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 11½ miles (E. N. E.) from Cashel, and 82 (S. W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 315 inhabitants. This place, which is situated at the termination of the mail-coach road branching from Littleton, contains 59 houses, and is indebted for its origin and name to the late Sir Vere Hunt, Bart., who, struck with its favourable situation contiguous to the coal-mines of the Killenale district, used every effort to raise it into manufacturing importance. For this purpose he obtained patents for one or two weekly markets and twelve fairs: these, however, are now discontinued; and the town is at present comparatively deserted. It has a sub-post office under Littleton, and is a constabulary police station; there is also a small prison, to which offenders are committed occasionally by the county magistrates. The parochial Roman Catholic chapel, a large and handsome structure in the later English style, and recently erected, is situated in the village.—See KILCOOLEY.

BIRR.—See PARSONSTOWN.

BISHOPS ISLAND, in the parish of KILFIERAUGH, union of KILRUSH, barony of MOYARTY, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER. It lies near Moor bay, on the western coast, and comprises three statute acres. From the height of its cliffs, which rise 143 feet above the sea, it is nearly inaccessible. Tradition states that a bishop was starved to death here at some early period, and the island is still called Ilann-an-uspig-usthig, or the "Island of the starved Bishop."

BLACKDITCHES.—See BOYSTOWN.

BLACK ISLAND, in the parish of BALLYCULTER, union of DOWNPATRICE, barony of LECALE, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER. It is situated in Lough Strangford.

BLACK ISLAND, in the parish of GREY ABBEY, union of NEWTOWN-ARDES, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER. Like the preceding, this island is situated in Strangford lough.

BLACKRATH, a parish, in the barony of OWRAN, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (N.E. by E.) from Kilkenny; containing 341 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the coach-road from Dublin to Cork, and on the river Nore; and comprises 1758½ statute acres. On the banks of the river are two considerable flour-mills; and within the limits of the parish are the marble works described in the account of the city of Kilkenny. Lyrath, the seat of Sir J. D. W. Cuffe, Bart., is pleasantly situated on an eminence commanding a fine view. Blackrath is a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, forming the corps of a prebend in the cathedral of St. Canice, Kilkenny, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £90.16. There is neither church nor glebe-house, but there is a glebe of eight acres attached to the prebend. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Gowran. Some remains of the old church yet exist.

BLACKROCK, a village, in the parish of St. FINBARR, union, barony, and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2½ miles (E. S. E.) from Cork; containing 303 inhabitants. This place is beautifully situated on a peninsula bounded on the north and east by the river Lee, and on the south by Lough Mahon and the Douglas Channel. The castle of Blackrock was originally built in 1604 by the Lord-Deputy Mountjoy, to protect the passage up the river from the harbour to the city, and was subsequently vested in the corporation, who held their courts of admiralty in it, and by whom, having been some years since destroyed by an accidental fire, it was rebuilt in 1629, from a design by Messrs. Pain. It is now assigned to the mayor of Cork as an occasional residence during his year of office. It is situated on a limestone rock projecting into the river, and consists of one bold circular tower of hewn limestone, containing a small banqueting-room, from which there is a fine view over the river. From this tower, springs a small turret rising to a considerable elevation, and displaying from the upper part two brilliant lights; and attached to it is a water gate, with some low embattled buildings in the rear, which harmonise well with the principal feature of the castle. Numerous advantages resulting from the proximity of the village to Cork, the beauty of its situation, the salubrity of its climate, and the excellent accommodations for bathing, have rendered this one of the most desirable places of residence in the south of Ireland. It has a receiving-house for letters to and from Cork; and the railroad from Cork to Passage will, if carried into effect, pass through the village. The scenery is of varied and pleasing character, exhibiting numerous elegant villas and cottages, with lawns, gardens, and plantations reaching down to the margin of the Lee, which is here a noble expanse of water more than a mile broad, constantly enlivened by steam-boats and other vessels. Among the principal seats are Dundanon Castle and Beaumont, the latter a noble mansion, consisting of a centre and two wings, with two conservatories, situated in tastefully arranged grounds. Many of the villas are let during the summer. The land in the vicinity is naturally very fertile, and is for the most part inclosed in lawns, gardens, and pleasure-grounds: the rest, deriving from its contiguity to Cork an abundant supply of rich manures, and having the advantage of inexhaustible quarries of limestone and plenty of sand, is in a high state of cultivation, and furnishes the Cork market with a large portion of its vegetables. The substratum is limestone of excellent quality, which is extensively quarried for various purposes. Between the fissures of the rocks, near the junction of the limestone with the clay-slate, are found numerous amethystine crystals, of which some are very large and clustery, and all are beautifully coloured; one specimen, in the Cork Royal Institution, weighs more than 40lb.

The church of Blackrock, dedicated to St. Michael, serves as a chapel of ease to the cathedral of St. Finbarr. It was built in 1827, at an expense of £2100, of which £900 were given by the Board of First Fruits, £100 by the corporation of Cork, and the remainder, with the exception of a few local subscriptions and some money raised by the sale of pews, was defrayed by the dean and chapter, who appoint and pay the curate. It is a handsome edifice of hewn limestone, in the later style of architecture, with a tower crowned with battlements and pinnacles, and surmounted by a spire 60 feet high: the spire, with part of the tower and the western portion of the nave, was destroyed by lightning on Jan. 29th, 1836, but has been restored by aid of a grant of £310 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Roman Catholic chapel, erected in 1821, is a large and handsome building, and is a chapel of ease to the parochial chapel of St. Finbarr, or the South chapel. It was begun at the private expense of the late Dean Collins, aided by a subscription of £300, and was completed and elegantly fitted up by means of a bequest of £1100 from T. Rochford, Esq., of Garretstown, part of which sum, in 1834, was expended in the erection of a house for the officiating priest, near the chapel.

An Ursuline convent was removed hither from Cork, in 1825: it had been founded in 1771, by Miss Honora Nagle, whose portrait is in the visiting-room; and is the original of all the institutions of this class in Ireland. The community consists of 35 professed nuns and 6 lay sisters, and is governed by a superior, her deputy, and a council of six. At this institution many of the daughters of the Roman Catholic gentry are instructed; and in a separate building a number of poor girls are gratuitously taught, and partially clothed. The convent has a demesne of 42 acres, and is an ornamental building, consisting of a centre and two wings, with a frontage of 350 feet. The chapel, which is in the east wing, is fitted up with simple elegance, and adorned by four Ionic pilasters supporting a pediment, on the apex of which is a cross, and at each of the other angles a vase. It contains a neat monument to the Rev. Dr. Lyons, who was many years chaplain to the convent. A school-house connected with St. Michael's chapel was erected at Ballintemple in 1636; a school for boys was built in 1834, at an expense of £160, of which two-thirds were contributed by the National Board, and the remainder by J. Murphy, Esq., of Ring-Mahon Castle; and there are some other schools. Here is also a dispensary, and near Ballintemple are two private lunatic asylums. Of these, Cittadella was established by the late Dr. Hallaran, in 1798, and has secluded grounds for the use of the patients; Lindville is pleasantly situated in a demesne of 14 acres. A temperance society was established in 1835. At the village of Ballintemple, situated on the peninsula, the Knights Templars in 1392 erected a large and handsome church, which, after the dissolution of that order, was granted, with its possessions, to Gill abbe. At what period it fell into decay is uncertain; the burial-ground is still used. There are fragments of some ancient towers at Dundanion and Ring-Mahon, but nothing of their history is known.

BLACKROCK, a village, in the parish of MONKSTOWN, partly in the barony of DUBLIN, but chiefly in the barony of RATHDOWN, union of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Dublin Castle; containing 2372 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the southern shore of Dublin bay, consists of one principal street, partly fronting the sea, extending along the road from Dublin to the head of the village, and continued along the two roads which meet there from Kingstown; also of several minor streets and avenues; containing altogether 357 houses, irregularly built, and some of them in pleasant and retired situations. The village itself possesses few pleasing features, but the country around is beautifully diversified, and the immediate vicinity is embellished with numerous villas having grounds disposed with much taste. Maritimo, the marine villa of Lord Cloncurry, and Blackrock House, the residence of the Rev. Sir Harcourt Lees, Bart., are beautifully situated; the Dublin and Kingstown railway passes through the grounds of both these seats. Carysfort House, the villa of the late Right Hon. W. Saurin, commands a view of the sea, and of the mountains in the neighbourhood; Newtown House is also finely situated, and from the rear is a noble view of the bay of Dublin. The other principal seats are, Montpelier House, Mount Temple, and Frescati Lodge. Frescati House, formerly the seat of the Fitzgerald family, a spacious mansion erected by the mother of Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, called "Silken Thomas," is now divided into four separate dwellings, and occupied by respectable families. The facilities for sea-bathing render this place of great resort during the summer months; several respectable boarding-houses have been opened for the accommodation of visitors; and an excellent hotel, called Seapoint House, has been fitted up for the reception of families. Baths have been constructed by the Kingstown Railway Company, on the side of the railway embankment, which passes along the sea-shore close to the village; and to these, access is obtained by a handsome foot bridge from the high ground. An elegant bridge has also been built over the railway, close under Seapoint House, affording the inmates a facility of access to a boat pier on the opposite side. In the centre of the village is a large block of granite, on which are the remains of an ancient cross; to this spot, as the southern extremity of the city of Dublin, the lord mayor, with the civic authorities, proceeds when perambulating the boundaries of his jurisdiction. A receiving-house for letters has three deliveries daily from the metropolis; and in addition to the constant railway communication with the city, numerous cars are stationed here, plying in all directions. There is an Episcopal chapel in Carysfort avenue; it was formerly a dissenting place of worship, but was purchased a few years since, and endowed with £1000 from a fund bequeathed by Lord Powerscourt: the chaplain is appointed by trustees. In the Roman Catholic divisions this place forms part of the union of Boosterstown; the chapel, situated in the village, was built in 1822, by subscription, at an expense of £750. A nunnery of Carmelite sisters was established in 1822, consisting of a superior, 20 professed nuns, and three lay sisters; the ladies of this convent support a school for the gratuitous instruction of girls, who are also clothed annually at Christmas. A savings' bank has been established.—See MONKSTOWN.

BLACKROCK, a village, in the parish of HAGGARDSTOWN, union of DUNDALK, barony of UPPER DUNDALK, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (E.) from Dundalk; containing 507 inhabitants. This place is situated on the bay of Dundalk, and contains 119 houses, which are neatly built. The beach is smooth and soft, and peculiarly adapted to sea-bathing; and, if due accommodation were provided for visitors, the village might become a watering-place of general attraction. It is at present much frequented, during the summer season, by the farmers of the inland counties, both for the purposes of bathing and of drinking the sea-water.—See HAGGARDSTOWN.

BLACKROCK, an island, in the parish of INNISBOFFIN, union of WESTPORT, barony of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It lies off the island of Inishgort, on the western coast, and comprises $3\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres.

BLACKWATER, a village, in the parish of KILCROHANE, union of KENMARE, barony of DUNKERRON, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (W.) from Kenmare, on the road from that place to Sneem; the population is returned with the parish. This small village is romantically seated on the west bank of a river of the same name, which issues from Lough Brinn, situated among the mountains, and, after separating the parishes of Kilcrohane and Templenoe, flows into the estuary of Kenmare river. The banks of the Blackwater are richly clothed with wood on each side, and are so steep and lofty that the bridge across is upwards of sixty feet above the water. The river immediately beneath and above the bridge is confined in a narrow channel, and rushes over rocks in numerous cascades; while at some distance below, it expands to a considerable breadth, and forms a deep basin, in which vessels may lie in safety. The bridge of two narrow and lofty arches, the salmon-leap beneath, and the wooded banks on each side, constitute a highly picturesque and interesting scene. This place is a favourite resort for salmon fly-fishing, permission for which is always granted by the proprietor on a proper application ; but there is no accommodation for the angler nearer than Kenmare, where, however, there is a very good and commodious hotel. At the mouth of the Blackwater is a salmon-fishery, where more than 100 fine fish are sometimes taken at a haul. Fairs are held in the village in July and December ; and petty-sessions for the Blackwater district are held monthly, at Clover Field, in the adjoining parish of Templeone.—See KILCROHANE.

BLACKWATER, a village, partly in the parish of BALLYVALDEN, and partly in that of KILKELLY or KILLILA, union of WEXFORD, barony of BALLAGHREEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 7 miles (N. E. by N.) from Wexford ; containing 83 houses and 380 inhabitants. It is situated on the old coast-road from Wexford to Dublin, about a mile from the shore of St. George's Channel ; there is also a direct road hence to Enniscorthy, about eight miles distant. Fairs are held on March 25th, May 13th, June 1st, Aug. 10th, and Nov. 10th. It is a station both of the constabulary police and the coast-guard ; and the Roman Catholic chapel of the district is situated in the village.

BLACKWATERTOWN, a village or post-town, in that part of the parish of CLONFEACLE which is in the barony of ARMAGH, union and county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Armagh, and 70 (N. N. W.) from Dublin ; containing 77 houses and 369 inhabitants. This place is situated on the old road from Armagh to Dungannon, and on the river Blackwater, from which it takes its name ; it is connected by a stone bridge of three arches with the old village of Clonfeacle, now containing 123 inhabitants. During the rebellion of the Earl of Tyrone, in the reign of Elizabeth, an English garrison was placed here to check the incursions of that chieftain, who, under a plea of some injuries done to his party by the English, in 1595, attacked and expelled the garrison, and obtained possession of the fortress, which he afterwards destroyed and abandoned on the approach of Sir John Norris. In 1596 the earl covenanted to rebuild it, and to supply an English garrison, to be then stationed in it, with all necessaries, as one of the conditions upon which peace was agreed on by the queen. In the following year the English forces, under Lord-Deputy Borough, assaulted the place, and easily took possession ; but the insurgents soon reappeared, and commenced an attack ; and though the further progress of the war was prevented by the death of the general, yet a strong English garrison was stationed here as a frontier post. Tyrone was once more compelled to agree to repair the fort and bridge, and to supply the garrison ; but he shortly after attacked the former with the greatest vigour ; and as the works were weak and imperfect, the assailants were repulsed only by the determined valour of the garrison. The earl afterwards attempted to reduce it by famine ; and the besieged were driven to the last extremities, when Sir Henry Bagnall, with the English army of about 5000 infantry and cavalry, and some loyal Irish clans, marched to their relief. This force, however, suffered a total defeat between Armagh and the Blackwater, and the fortress was immediately surrendered to the enemy, though it was soon after recovered.

From its situation on the Blackwater, the town carries on a considerable trade in the export of corn and potatoes, great quantities of which are shipped to Belfast and Newry, and in the importation of coal and timber. Sloops of 50 tons' burthen can deliver their cargoes at the quay, and the Ulster canal passes close to the town. There is an extensive bleach-green at Tullydoey, and some large spirit and corn stores furnish an abundant supply for the neighbourhood. A sub-post office is in connexion with Moy ; fairs are held on the second Wednesday in every month throughout the year ; and a constabulary police force is stationed here. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists ; also a dispensary. On the western side of the river is the ancient cemetery of Clonfeacle, the church of which being in ruins, another was erected at Benburb and is now the parish church. Opposite to the town are vestiges of a fort : by some it is called the Blackwater fort, in the attempt to take which Sir Henry Bagnall lost his life ; and by others supposed to have been a strong fortress of the Earl of Tyrone, and one of those for which he stipulated when he obtained a patent of favour from Queen Elizabeth.—See CLONFEACLE.

BLANCHARDSTOWN, a village, in the parish and barony of CASTLEKNOCK, NORTH DUBLIN union, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N. W.) from Dublin, on the road to NAVAN ; containing 34 houses and 182 inhabitants. It is within the limits of the Dublin post-office delivery ; and a constabulary police station has been established, in the barrack of which, petty-sessions for the district are held the second Monday in every month. A station of the Dublin and Mullingar railway will be fixed in the village. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel is situated here ; also the Cabra nunnery, in which a school for girls is aided by the nuns.—See CASTLEKNOCK.

BLANCHFIELDSTOWN, or BLANCHVILLESKILL, a parish, in the union of KILKENNY, barony of GOWRAN, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (W. by S.) from Gowran ; containing 152 inhabitants. This small parish is situated near the coach-road from Dublin to Cork, by way of Kilkenny, and comprises 854½ statute acres : the land is principally under tillage, and there is plenty of limestone. Blanchfieldstown is a good residence, situated in a very neat demesne containing some fine timber. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and forms part of the union of Kilfane and corps of the archdeaconry ; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge is £52. 2. 6., of which £34. 15. are payable to the vicars-choral, and the remainder to the archdeacon. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Gowran. There are some remains of the old church, at Blanchvilleskill.

BLARIS.—See LISBURN.

BLARNEY, a village, in the parish of GARRYCLOYNE, barony of EAST MUSKERRY, union and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Cork ; containing 253 inhabitants. It stands on a river of the same name, over which is a handsome bridge of three arches, on the road from Cork to Kanturk ; and consists of 45 houses, which are small but well built and slated. The noted CASTLE of Blarney was built in 1446, by Cormac McCarthy, surnamed Laidir, who was descended in a direct line from the hereditary kings of Desmond or South Munster, and was distinguished as well by his extraordinary strength and feats of chivalry as by elegance and grace both body and mind. It is situated on an isolated rock of limestone rising boldly over the junction of the rivers Blarney and Comane, and is the third castle occupying the site: the first was rather a hunting post of Dermot McCarthy, King of South Munster, and was built of timber; the second was built in the year 1300, and the existing edifice was raised on its foundations, which are still visible. In the reign of Elizabeth it was the strongest fortress in Munster, and at different periods it withstood regular sieges, but was treacherously taken by Lord Broghill in 1646, and the army of King William subsequently demolished all the fortifications, leaving only the tower remaining. Donogh McCarthy, who commanded the forces of Munster, was summoned to parliament in the reign of Elizabeth, by the title of Baron of Blarney; and Charles II., in 1658, conferred the title of Earl of Clancarty on the head of this family, the last of whom was dispossessed after the siege of Limerick; the estate, comprising all Muskerry, being forfeited to the crown for the earl's adherence to the cause of James II. On the sale of the forfeited lands in 1692, the Hollow Sword Blade Company purchased all the land around this place, and more than 3000 acres in the parish were allotted to a member of the company, and are now held by his descendant, Charles Putland, Esq., of Dublin. Justin McCarthy, however, of Carrignavar, the only lineal descendant of the McCarthy family, still holds a part of the ancient inheritance.

The castle was purchased in 1701 by Sir James Jefferys, governor of Cork, who soon after erected a large and handsome house in front of it, which was the family residence for many years, but is now a picturesque ruin. The top of the castle commands a very fine view over a rich undulating tract intersected by the rivers Blarney, Comane, and Scorthonac, and bounded on the north-west by the lofty chain of the Boggra mountains. On the east is the Comane bog, many years since an impenetrable wilderness, and the last receptacle for wolves in this part of the country: that river, which takes its name from its serpentine course, flows through the bog, and joins the river Blarney, as already observed, under the walls of the castle. Their united waters receive a considerable accession from the Scorthonac, a rapid stream that rises in the Boggra mountains. The interest which both natives and strangers take in the castle, arises more from a tradition connected with a stone in its north-eastern angle, about 20 feet from the top, than from any other circumstance: this stone, which bears an inscription in Latin recording the erection of the fortress, is called the "Blarney stone," and has given rise to the well-known phrase of "Blarney," in reference to a notion that, if any one kisses it, he will ever after have a cajoling tongue and the art of flattery or of telling lies with unblushing effrontery. Few, however, venture upon this ceremony, from the danger in being lowered down to the stone by a rope from an insecure battlement 132 feet high. The "groves of Blarney" are of considerable extent and very interesting; and beneath the castle are some spacious natural caves, one of which was converted into a dungeon by some early proprietor: it is entered by a very strong door, near which is a solitary window scarcely admitting a ray of light; and there are several massive iron rings and bolts yet remaining. Stalactites and stalagmites of beautiful formation, and very compact, are found in these caves.

The village, though now of little importance, was once the most thriving in the county, and between the years 1765 and 1782, when the linen manufacture was carried on, had not less than 13 mills in operation, all erected by St. John Jefferys, Esq., at an expense of about £20,000. The cotton trade was afterwards introduced, and flourished for a time, but has decayed; and the only establishments now in operation are, a spinning-mill, in which a number of persons are employed in spinning and dyeing woollen-yarn for the extensive carpet manufactory in Cork; and a paper-mill. Fairs are held on Sept. 18th and Nov. 11th; here is a station of the constabulary police; and petty-sessions are held on alternate Tuesdays. The proprietor of the village has it in contemplation to rebuild it on an improved plan. Just above it stands the parish church, which was repaired and enlarged in 1835, and is a very neat edifice. A national school, capable of accommodating 500 children, was built in 1836, at an expense of £300, of which the commissioners gave £90, the parishioners £11, and the Rev. M. Horgan, P.P., the remainder; there is also a dispensary.—See GARRITYCLOINE.

BLASQUET ISLANDS, also called BLASQUES or FERRITER'S ISLANDS, lying off the shore of the parish of DONQUIN, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CORRIGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (W. & W.) from Dingle: the population is returned with Donquin. These islands were granted by the Earl of Desmond to the family of Ferriter, but were forfeited to the crown by their joining in the rebellion of that nobleman, and in 1586 were granted, with other possessions, to George Stone and Cornelius Champion; they were afterwards purchased by Sir Richard Boyle, ancestor of the present proprietor, the Earl of Cork. In September, 1588, part of the Spanish Armada, consisting of the admiral's ship the St. John, a large ship of 1000 tons called Our Lady of the Rosary, and some smaller vessels, came into the Sound in distress. Our Lady of the Rosary struck on a rock, and was wrecked: of 500 persons on board, among whom were the Prince of Asculé and 100 gentlemen, only the pilot's son was saved; and a violent storm soon after dispersed the rest of the ships. The islands are the most westerly on the coast of Ireland, being situated in Lat. 52° 6' 40" (N.), and Lon. 10° 33' (W.), as taken from the southern point of the Great Blasquet; they are twelve in number, including those which are mere rocks. The largest is called the Great Blasquet, or Innimore, and is nearly two miles from the main land; it is about three miles in length, and is elevated mountain ground, with some arable land towards the north-east extremity. Ten families reside upon it at present, and there are the ruins of a very ancient church, with a burial-ground. The second in size, and the southernmost, is Innimackilane, which lies about seven miles W. by S. from Dunmore, and is low and bleak, but yields a very rich herbage; it is the abode of two families, and contains the ruins of an ancient chapel with a burial-ground, and a small stone-roofed cell or hermitage, with the remains of several others. The third is Innimobroe, or Quern Island, so called from its resemblance to the old mill-stones called "querns." The fourth and most northern, called Innistuskard, is about a mile in length: one family resides on it, and there is a stone cell similar to that above noticed. Near the Great Island are three smaller, one of which is called Innisbeg or the Little Island, and consists of about 16 acres of rich grazing land; the other two are of the same character, but not so large. Most of the isles are stocked with sheep and black-cattle, and abound with rabbits and sea-fowl, of which the last-named breed in vast numbers on the stupendous pyramidal rock forming the eighth isle, four miles W. N. W. from the Great Island: near this rock is another of a similar form but inferior height. Here are also numbers of hawks and eagles, the former of which were once held in great esteem for sporting; and a small bird called by the Irish gourder, and said to exceed the ortolan in deliciousness of flavour, appears to be peculiar to these islands. Smith, in his History of Cork, published in 1749, says that, for the space of 45 years before he visited the Great Island, "neither man, woman, nor child had died on it."

BLEANMORE, an island, in the parish and barony of BURRISHOOLE, union of WESTPORT, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It lies in Clew bay, and comprises 34 statute acres.

BLANNERVILLE, a small sea-port town or village, in the parish of ANNAGH, union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (W.) from Tralee; containing 225 inhabitants. It is situated on the bay of Tralee, and consists chiefly of one street, extending along the road to Dingle from a bridge over a small river which empties itself into the bay, and containing about 40 houses, most of which are neatly built, and roofed with slate. On the opposite side of the bay is an oyster-bed, which, with the fishery in the bay, affords employment to a portion of the inhabitants. An extensive trade in corn is carried on with the port of Liverpool. Fairs are held on May 9th, Sept. 15th, Oct. 25th, and Dec. 19th; and there is a receiving-house for letters between this place and Tralee. The Tralee ship-canal, now in progress, will pass under the north end of the bridge, and extend to the channel at a place called the Black Rock: a portion of the slob on the east side of the bridge has been embanked by Mr. Blennerhasset. The parish church, a neat modern structure with a square tower, is situated in the town, as are also the Protestant and Roman Catholic school-houses; and at Currageague is a school under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity.—See ANNAGH.

BLESSINGTON, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of LOWER TALBOTSTOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 6½ miles (S. E.) from Naas, and 14 (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 2169 inhabitants, of whom 466 are in the town. This place is situated on the river Liffey, and on the high road from Dublin, by Balinglass, to Wexford, Carlow, and Waterford. The town occupies a rising ground on the north-western confines of the county, and was built by Archbishop Boyle in the reign of Charles II.: it consists of one street, and contains 73 houses, which are mostly of respectable appearance, and a good inn or hotel. Considerable improvement has taken place since the construction in 1829 of the new turnpike-road from Dublin to Carlow, by way of Balinglass, by which the Waterford mail and the Kilkenny day-mail, and several coaches and cars to the counties of Wexford and Carlow, have been brought through it. The celebrated waterfall, called Poul-a-Phuca, about three miles distant on the road to Balinglass, and which is described under the head of Ballymore-Eustace, is generally visited from this place. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on May 12th, July 5th, and Nov. 12th. Here is a station of the constabulary police; and the chief officer of the peace-preservation force resides in the town. The inhabitants were incorporated by CHARTER of the 21st of Charles II. (1669), granted to Michael Boyle, Archbishop of Dublin and Chancellor of Ireland, and certain forfeited lands assigned to him were at the same time erected into a manor, to be called the manor of Blessington. This charter empowered the archbishop to hold, through the seneschal of the manor, a court leet with view of frankpledge twice in the year; a court baron every three weeks, or less frequently, for claims not exceeding 40s.; and a court of record where and when he should think proper, with jurisdiction not exceeding £10. It also prescribed the style, constitution, and mode of electing the officers of the corporation. The corporation was styled "The Sovereign, Bailiffs, and Burgesses of the Borough and Town of Blessington;" it consisted of a sovereign, two bailiffs, and twelve burgesses, with power to a majority to admit freemen and choose inferior officers, and the archbishop was authorised to appoint a recorder and town-clerk. The borough returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when the £15,000 awarded as compensation for the loss of the franchise was paid to Arthur, Marquess of Downshire; the right of election was vested in the corporation at large, which from that period has been extinct. Petty-sessions are held on alternate Saturdays; and the Marquess of Downshire, as proprietor of the town, has power to hold a manorial court for the recovery of small debts.

The PARISH, which, previously to the erection of the town and church in 1683, was called BURGAGE, comprises 15,780½ statute acres. The land is chiefly under tillage and pasturage, and there are some large tracts of mountain waste, on which are turf-bogs; the state of agriculture has considerably improved. The subsoil is principally limestone-gravel; and the mountains abound with granite, which is quarried, and sent to Dublin for public buildings. The first marquess of Downshire had a handsome mansion, and a demesne of 410 statute acres, with a deer-park of 340 acres, all surrounded by a wall, and situated on the right of the road from Dublin. The mansion was originally built by Primate Boyle, the last ecclesiastical chancellor of Ireland, who held his court of chancery here, and erected houses for the six clerks, two of which yet remain; the interior was burnt by the insurgents in 1799, and has not been restored. The demesne is richly embellished with fine timber. About two miles from the town, on the road to Balinglass, is Russborough, the elegant seat of the Earl of Miltown: the mansion, erected after a design by Mr. Cassels, architect of the Bank of Ireland, is in the Grecian style, and consists of a centre and two wings, connected by semicircular colonnades of alternated Ionic and Corinthian pillars, and presenting a noble façade of hewn stone 700 feet in extent. The interior is fitted up in a style of sumptuous magnificence: the floors of the principal apartments are of polished mahogany, and there is an extensive and valuable collection of paintings, chiefly of the Italian school, arranged in seven apartments appropriated to its reception. The demesne comprises 405 statute acres, tastefully laid out and planted.

The LIVING is a vicarage with Burgage, in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, to which the vicarages of Boystown and Kilbride were united by act of council in 1833, forming the vicarial union of Blessington, in the patronage of the Archbishop; the rectory is united to those of St. Andrew's and Ardree, and part of Lusk, together constituting the corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of St. Patrick, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge of the parish, including Burgage, is £163. 17. 6., of which £90 are payable to the precentor, and the remainder to the vicar; the gross rent-charge of the vicarial union is £158. 4. 6. The lands of Great Burgage, comprising 670a. 3r. 10p. statute measure, let on lease at a rental of £64. 12., form part of the endowment of the precentorship. The church, a neat edifice with a lofty square tower, was erected, at the expense of Primate Boyle, who also gave a ring of bells. It is neatly fitted up, and an organ was erected by an ancestor of the present Marquess of Downshire, who allows the organist a salary of £40 per annum, to which £10 were formerly added by the parish, and are now added by the Ecclesiastical Board: a monument to the memory of the founder records his benefactions to the town, and the inscription concludes with the motto, Abi, et fac tu similiter. During the disturbances of 1798 the church was used as a barrack. Viscount Blessington, a descendant of Primate Boyle, in 1736, endowed the living of "Blessington, otherwise Burgage," with 130 statute acres of land in the adjoining parish of Tipperkevin, subject to the payment of £5 per annum by the incumbent to the school: there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is partly included in the union or district of Blessington, partly in that of Blackditches, and partly in that of Ballymore-Eustace: the first union comprises also the parishes of Rathmore, Kilbride, and Killeck, and contains three chapels, situated at Cross and Eadestown in Rathmore, and at Kilbride. A neat building, the upper part of which is used as a girls' school, and the lower as a court for holding the petty-sessions, was erected, with a house for the master and mistress, at an expense of £800 by the late marquess of Downshire, whose successor in the title allows a salary of £80 to the master and £10 to the mistress, the latter of whom also receives the £5 payable by the incumbent. A dispensary is supported in the customary manner. There are some ruins of the old church of Burgage; in the churchyard are the remains of a castle, and on the outside is a very fine cross, hewn out of one large block of granite, and about 14 feet high. On the townland of Crosscool-Harbour, near Lifey Cottage, are a burial-place and a holy well, the latter of which is much resorted to in June for its reputed efficacy in healing various diseases. On the townland of Three-Castles are some remains of one of the ancient fortresses from which it derived its name. Blessington gave the title of Earl to the family of Gardiner, now extinct; and Ransborough gives the inferior titles of Viscount and Baron to the Earls of Miltown.

BO, an island, in the parish of TULLAGHBIGLEY, union of DUNFANAGHY, barony of KILMACRENNAN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER. It lies in Gweedore bay, on the north-east coast, and comprises 4½ statute acres.

BODENSTOWN, or BOWDENSTOWN, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of NORTH NAAS, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (S. W.) from Clane; containing, with part of the village of Sallias, 459 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the river Lifey, over which is a very curious stone bridge of five arches, all differently shaped, and comprises 2831½ statute acres. About three-fourths of the land are pasture appropriated to the fattening of stock for the Dublin and Liverpool markets, and the remainder is under tillage, producing good crops: there is no waste land or bog, yet the supply of fuel is abundant. The Grand Canal, which passes close to the parish, facilitates the conveyance of corn and potatoes to the metropolis, whence manure is obtained in abundance. The living, lately suspended, was a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, with the perpetual curacy of Sherlockstown, episcopally united, forming the union of Bodenstown, in the patronage of the Bishop. The rectory is inappropriate in the Earl of Mayo. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £67. 10., of which £45 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; the rent-charge of the entire benefice, once payable to the incumbent, is £48. 15. There is no church, though a grant was made for the erection of one by the late Board of First Fruits; the Protestant parishioners attend the church of Clane. Nor is there any glebe-house: the glebe comprises eight acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kill. The celebrated Theobald Wolfe Tone was a native of this parish, and lies in the same grave with his father in the churchyard.

BOGGANFIN, a village, in the parish of ST. PETER, union and barony of ATHLONE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2½ miles (S. S. E.) from Athlone; containing 347 inhabitants. It is on the river Shannon, and comprises 63 houses.

BOHERAROAN, a village, in the parish of TOMFINLKE, union of ENNIS, barony of LOWER BUNRATTY, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER; containing 245 inhabitants. It consists of 42 houses.

BOHERBEE, or BOHERBOY, a village, in the parish of KILMEEN, union of KANTURK, barony of DUNHALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (W.) from Kanturk; containing 335 inhabitants. This place is on the line of road recently constructed by government, from Roskeen-Bridge, through King-William's-town to Castle-island. From its advantageous situation on this road, and near the junction of the roads from Kanturk and Newmarket to Millstreet, the village promises to become of some little importance. A police barrack has been erected by Mr. W. Allen, for the accommodation of the constabulary force stationed here; and the Roman Catholic parochial chapel, a large slated building recently erected, is situated in the village.

—See KILMEEN.

BOHERLAHAN. —See ARDMAYLE.

BOHERMEEN, a village, partly in the parish of MARTRY, but chiefly in that of ARDRACRAN, union of KILLS, barony of LOWER NAVAN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (W.) from Navan; containing 531 inhabitants. It is seated on the road from Navan to Kells.

BOHILLANE, or BOHOLANE, a parish, in the union of MIDDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Cloyne; containing 572 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Ballycotton to Castlemartyr, and comprises 1097 statute acres. The land in general is tolerably good, and the greater part is under an improved system of tillage: in some places the soil is light, and rests on a substratum of clay-slate; in others, stiff and compact, occasionally abounding with springs; and in some, loose and shivery, absorbing great quantities of moisture. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £143. 12. 9. There is now no church; the Protestant inhabitants resort for divine service either to Itermorough or Cloyne. The ruins of the church form a picturesque object: near them is a glebe of 12 acres, but there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Ballymacoda in Kilmacdonough.

BOHOE, a parish, partly in the barony of MAGHERABOY, but chiefly in that of CLANAWLEY, union of BALLYSHANNON, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Enniskillen; containing 2824 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Enniskillen to Sligo, and comprises 15,058 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which 6151 $\frac{1}{2}$ are in the barony of Magheraboy, and 8907 $\frac{1}{2}$ in that of Clanawley. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £87. 15. 11. The church, a plain edifice, was erected by aid of a gift of £200 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1777, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £157. 10. for its repair; it accommodates 150 persons. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 94 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Devenish or Derrygonelly, and also part of that of Innismacaint; the chapel, an indifferent building, belongs to the union of Devenish. The mountain of Belmore, partly in this parish, has an elevation of 1319, and that of Glenkeel an elevation of 1223, feet above the level of the sea.

BOHOLA, or BUCHOLLA, a parish, in the union of SWINFORD, barony of GALLEN, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Foxford; containing 4301 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Gustien, and on the road from Swinford to Castlebar; and comprises 867 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, principally under tillage; the mountain of Slieve Conn, which is within its limits, is cultivated to the very summit; there is some bog. Bohola is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, and is part of the union of Templemore; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of the late Roger Palmer, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £281. 3., of which one-half is payable to the impropriators, and the other to the vicar. The church is in ruins. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains a chapel.

BOLINALEA, a village, in the parish of RATHNEW, union of RATHDRUM, barony of NEWCASTLE, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER; adjoining the post-town of Ashford, and containing 52 houses and 336 inhabitants. It is situated on the old road from Newton-Mount-Keenedy, by Cranore, to Rathdrum; and is a place of great resort during the summer season, from its contiguity to some of the most varied and luxuriant scenery through which the river Vartey flows. The fairs of Ashford are held at this village.—See RATHNEW.

BOLY, GALBOOLY, or GALVOLY, a parish, in the union of THURLES, barony of ELIOGARTY, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Thurles; containing 410 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on a branch of the river Suir, comprises 1268 statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and is part of the union of Borrisleigh and corps of the treasurership in the cathedral of Cashel; the rectory is impropriate in John Bagwell, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £82. 10., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the treasurer.

BONAFOLLE.—See MOVILLE.

BONLAHEY, or BUNLAHEY, a village, in that part of the parish of GRANARD which is in the barony of GRANARD, union of GRANARD, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Graoird, on the road to Ballinamuck; containing 56 dwellings and 238 inhabitants. Fairs are held on the 16th of May, July 26th, Oct. 15th, and Dec. 13th.—See GRANARD.

BONMAHON, a town, in the parish of BALLYVAKEEN, union of DUNGARVAN, barony of UPPERTHIRD, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S.) from Kilmacthomas; containing 1771 inhabitants. This place is situated on the coast of St. George's Channel, and derives its name from the river Mahon, which rises in the Cummeragh mountains, and here falls into the sea. It is much frequented as a watering-place during the summer, and contains 226 houses, of which several are neat private residences, and some, convenient lodging-houses for the accommodation of visitors; in the immediate vicinity are numerous houses built for persons employed in the mines. The beach is well adapted for bathing, and the village might be made a place of fashionable resort; but the land being principally the property of the College of Physicians, who cannot grant leases for more than 31 years, very little improvement has been made. The surrounding scenery is pleasing, and a wooden bridge over the Mahon adds much to its picturesque character. A church, with a school-house adjoining, has been erected on the eastern side of the river, in the parish of Kilbarrymeadan; the school is supported by Lady Osborne. A receiving-house for letters is in connexion with Kilmacthomas. The valuable mines of this place and in the neighbourhood produce copper and lead, with a portion of silver; they have been worked from an early period, and veins have been opened in several parts and wrought to a considerable extent. In 1745 a company rented these mines from Lord Ranclough for a term of 31 years, under an agreement to give to his lordship one-eighth part of all the ore obtained; and the works were carried on with spirit for eight or ten years. They were subsequently worked by Mr. Wyse, who employed 300 men; and, in 1811, the Earl of Ormonde renewed the enterprise with every prospect of success, but, after a very large expenditure, was induced to desist: they are at present under the management of the Irish Mining Company. The annual produce is from 4000 to 5000 tons, valued at £9 per ton: the veins are found in some parts of the rock within a few feet of the surface, and none have been worked to a greater depth than 25 yards. Copper-ore is observed in many places along the beach. The principal mines are now on the property of the Marquess of Ormonde, on the lands belonging to the see of Waterford, and on those of Lady Osborne and J. Power O'Shee, Esq.—See BALLYLANEEN.

BONNECONLAN.—See KILGARVEY.

BONOWEN.—See BOWEN.

BOOLYGLASS, a village, in the parish of AUGHAVILLER, union and barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Knocktopher; containing 216 inhabitants. It is seated on the road from Knocktopher to Piltown.

BOOTERSTOWN, a parish, in the union of SOUTH DUBLIN, partly in the barony of DUBLIN, but chiefly in that of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (S. E.) from Dublin; containing 3318 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Dublin to Kingstown and Bray, and on the southern coast of Dublin bay, the shores of which here assume a most interesting and beautifully picturesque appearance. On the opposite side are the finely wooded lands of Clontarf, the mountainous ridge of Howth connected with the main land by a low sandy isthmus, and the islands of Ireland's-Eye and Lambay. On this side the land swells into the romantic hill of Mount Anville, with slopes richly wooded, and embellished with handsome seats; while to the east are the projecting high grounds of the Blackrock, covered to the water's edge with trees. The parish comprises 541½ statute acres; the substratum is chiefly limestone and limestone-gravel. Of the numerous seats and villas, many are delightfully situated in highly adorned demesnes, commanding beautiful views of the bay of Dublin and of the mountains. The village, with Williamstown and Blackrock, nearly forms a continuous extent of town, and will, it is expected, in process of time extend to, and form part of, Kingstown; within the parish are the avenues of Merrion, Cross, Sydney, and Williamstown, in each of which are rows of neat houses, with detached villas. The place is much frequented during the summer season on account of its facilities for sea-bathing and its fine strand of smooth sand; lodging-houses have been prepared for the accommodation of visitors; and a cross embankment communicating with the Kingstown railway, which is carried on an embankment along the strand of the hay in front of the town, at a short distance from high-water mark, has been constructed for their convenience. A receiving-house for letters has three deliveries daily from the metropolis, and a constant and rapid communication with the city is maintained by the railway, and by cars.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Dublin, erected out of the parish of Donnybrook by act of council in 1821, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Dublin; the rectory forms part of the corps of the archdeaconry. The tithe rent-charge is £48. 15., the whole of which is payable to the archdeacon, who allows the perpetual curate £16 per annum; the curacy was endowed by the late Earl of Pembroke with £1000, since invested in ground-rents now producing £73. 16. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower having crocketed pinnacles at the angles, and surmounted by a lofty spire; the walls are strengthened with buttresses terminating in pinnacles, and crowned by an embattled parapet. It was erected in 1824, on a piece of ground given by the late Earl of Pembroke in Cross Avenue, and cost £5000, of which sum £2700 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits; there are neat monuments to James Digges Latonche and Richard Verschoyle, Esqrs. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms the head of a district including also parts of the parishes of Donnybrook, Kill, Monkstown, Rathfarnham, Stillorgan, and Taney. The chapel here is a spacious and handsome edifice, erected at the sole expense of the late Earl Fitzwilliam; there are also chapels at Blackrock and Dundrum. A neat parochial school-house, with apartments for a master and mistress, was built in 1826, near the church, at an expense of £600, defrayed by subscription; and an infants' school was built adjoining the former in 1833, in which is kept a parochial lending library. In connexion with the Roman Catholic chapel is a girls' school. Here is a dispensary; and a Dorcas society is supported by subscription and by collections at charity sermons.

BORDWELL, a parish, partly in the barony of CLANDONAGH, but chiefly in that of CLARMALLAGH, union of ABBEYLEIX, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N. E.) from Rathdowney; containing 957 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Abbeyleix to Templemore, and comprises 2804½ statute acres. The system of agriculture is improving; there is a small quantity of bog; and limestone is quarried in the parish. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £103. 2. 6. Divine service is performed in a school-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Aghavoe; the chapel is a large building, at Fox Rock. At Grantstown and Kildredy are the ruins of old castles, and at the latter, of an old church; there are also several ruins, of which the principal, at Coolfin, is encompassed by a moat, with an octagonal building in the centre, out of which grows a large alder-tree.

BORRIS, or BORRIS-INRONE, a village, in the parish of CLONAGOOSE, union of CARLOW, barony of IDRONE EAST, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. E.) from Gorebridge; containing 950 inhabitants. This place stands near the river Barrow, on the road from Carlow to Ross: it has a patent for a market on Friday, which is not held, and a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Gorebridge. Borris House, the noble seat of the late T. Kavanagh, Esq., is situated in an extensive and richly wooded demesne, and commands fine views. This mansion, which externally exhibits the appearance of an English baronial residence of the 16th century, while every advantage of convenience and splendour is secured within, has been for ages the chief residence of the posterity of Donald Kavanagh, natural son of Mac Mnrrouagh, last king of Leinster. In 1642, being garrisoned by the parliamentarians, it was besieged by the Irish, and with difficulty the garrison was relieved and reinforced by Sir C. Coote. In the disturbances of 1798 it sustained two attacks; first on May 24th, when the insurgents were repulsed by Captain Kavanagh's yeomanry corps, with the loss of 50 killed and wounded; and afterwards on June 19th, from a detachment sent against it from Vinegar Hill, on which occasion it was defended with great bravery by a party of the Donegal militia, who compelled the assailants, after burning the out-offices and destroying some houses in Borris, to retire with considerable loss. At Kilcomney, in the vicinity, an action was also fought, in which the insurgents were routed with the loss of their stores by the king's forces under Sir C. Asgill. Petty-sessions are held here every third Thursday, and road-sessions occasionally: the court-house was erected by Mr. Kavanagh. This is a chief constabulary police station; and a handsome and convenient barrack for the accommodation of about 30 men has been lately built. Fairs for cattle, sheep, and pigs, are held on Jan. 1st, Feb. 5th, May 1st, July 2nd, Aug. 15th, Oct. 4th, and Nov. 14th, and four more fairs have been recently obtained; that in July is a considerable fair for wool. Attached to Borris House is a very handsome private chapel, erected by the late Mr. Kavanagh; it is open to the inhabitants, and licensed for baptisms and marriages. In the Roman Catholic divisions this place is the head of a district comprising parts of the parishes of Clonagoose, Ullard (county of Kilkenny), St. Mullins, and Ballyellin, and the whole of that of Kiltannel: the parochial chapel is a good edifice, built at an expense of £3000. A dispensary is maintained in the customary manner; and there is an institution called the Borris Benevolent Society. At Borris House is preserved the "Fígeen," a curious ornament of silver and tin, found on the demesne; and an ancient horn called the "charter horn," and a casket called the Liath-Mercisith, esteemed among the most valuable curiosities in the museum of Trinity College, Dublin, are relics which formerly belonged to the Kavanaghs.—See CLONAGOOSK.

BORRIS, QUEEN'S COUNTY.—See MARYBOROUGH.

BORRIS-IN-OSSORY.—See BURROS-IN-OSSORY.

BORRISLEIGH, or TWO-MILE BORRIS, a parish, in the union of THURLES, barony of ELOGARTY, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 33 miles (S. E.) from Thurles; containing, with the town of Littleton, 3372 inhabitants, of whom 193 are in the village. This parish is situated at the junction of the roads leading respectively from Johnstown to Cashel, and from Killealea and Thurles to New Birmingham; it comprises 11,940 statute acres. Within its limits is a small portion of the Bog of Allen, and the river Liscaveen forms a boundary between it and the parish of Ballymoreen. The village, which contains 30 houses, is remarkable for the ruins of a church and castle, and the remains of a Danish fort, all within a few yards of each other. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, united from a period prior to any known record to the vicarages of Boly (or Galvoly) and Drom, and to the chapelry of Leogh, together constituting the union of Borrisleigh and the corps of the treasurership in the cathedral of Cashel, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £450, and of the whole benefice of the treasurer £553. 11. The church is a handsome edifice partly in the later English style, built in 1786, and enlarged in 1822 by aid of a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits; another loan, of £923, was granted for its repair in 1828. The glebe-house was erected in 1799, at a cost exceeding £800: the glebe of Borrisleigh consists of 30 acres, subject to a rent; in the parish of Drom is also a glebe of 42a. 1r. 19p., statute measure, leased at £30. 9., with a renewal fine of £6. 10. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Moykarkey.—See LITTLETON.

BORRISMORE, a parish, in the union of KILKENNY, barony of GALMOY, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Freshford; containing 267 inhabitants. This place anciently formed part of the possessions of the abbey of Jerpoint: it contains 2037 statute acres, and the tithe rent-charge is £62. 7., appropriate to the benefice of Burnchurch, in the diocese of Ossory.

BORRIS-O'-KANE.—See BURRIS-O'-KANE.

BOTHON, county of CORK.—See BUTTEVANT.

BOURNEY, or BOURCHIN, a parish, in the union of ROSCREA, barony of IKERRIN, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Roscrea; containing 4620 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the coach-road from Dublin to Limerick, and comprises 12,981 statute acres. The rivers Nore and Suir have their rise here in the side of the mountain of Benduff, their respective sources not being more than half a mile distant from each other: the Nore pursues nearly a direct course through this parish and Corbally into Burros-in-Ossory; the Suir forms the southern boundary of the parish. Here is a station of the constabulary police. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, to which the rectory and vicarage of Burrisnefarney were united by act of council, forming the union of Bourney, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Ormonde. The tithe rent-charge of Bourney is £412. 10., of which £262. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and £150 to the vicar; and the gross rent-charge of the union payable to the incumbent is £288. 9. There is a church in each parish; that of Bourney is a plain building, for the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £346. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £350 and a loan of £450, in 1814, from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises about six acres in two detached portions in Bourney. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parishes of Burrisnefarney and Corbally, and contains four chapels, all neat buildings, the principal of which is situated at Clonakenny, in this parish. There is a place of worship for the Society of Friends at Knockbilly Meagher. At Boulbane, Bawnmadrum, and Clonakenny are considerable remains of ancient castles; the two first are situated on an eminence very near each other.

BOVEVAGH, a parish, in the poor-law union of NEWTOWN-LIMAVADY, barony of KENAUGHT, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Dungiven; containing 5174 inhabitants. At this place, anciently called Boith-Medhbha, a monastery was founded in 557 by St. Columb, of which Aidan, nephew of St. Patrick, became the first abbot. This establishment was situated on the western bank of the river Roe, and continued to flourish for some years, but was plundered and destroyed by the Danes, and was never afterwards rebuilt. The parish is intersected by two roads, one on each side of the river, leading from Dungiven to Newtown-Limavady; and comprises 18,596 statute acres.

The land is generally fertile, but the soil is very variable, passing through all the gradations from light sand to stiff clay and marl: on the banks of the river it is gravelly, and remarkably productive. The system of agriculture is greatly improved; there is scarcely any mountain or waste land, and the bogs are mostly worked out and reclaimed. The geological features of the parish are highly interesting: the strata are laid open to view in the river and the different streams; the most valuable of those hitherto worked are the strata of freestone, which is found in several parts, and of which the principal quarry is at Ballyhargan. From this quarry was procured the stone used in building the palace of Ballyscullion, the magnificent portico of which was removed to St. George's church, at Belfast; the stone found here is easily worked, but hardens by exposure to the air, and is of very good colour. Indications of manganese are also observable, and the beautiful pebbles called Dungenen crystals are frequently met with. The weaving of liuen-cloth is carried on in many of the farmhouses and cottages.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £435. The church is a handsome edifice in the later English style, with a lofty square tower crowned by pinnacles; it was erected in 1823, by aid of a gift of £300 from the Board of First Fruits, and is situated on the west bank of the Roe, about a quarter of a mile from the site of the old church, which had fallen to decay some years previously. The glebe-house, a large and well-built residence, is on the east bank of the river; the glebe comprises 79 acres of fertile land. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Banagher, and contains two chapels; one at Derrylane, where service is performed every alternate Sunday; and the other at Ballymoney. There is a place of worship at Camnish for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. Near the old church is an artificial cave, 82 yards in length, with several galleries branching from it in different directions. About a mile north-east of the church is an upright stone, near which, according to tradition, a battle was fought, but which may probably be part of a cromlech, as there are other stones and vestiges of a Druidical circle near the spot.

BOW, or BOA, ISLAND, partly in the parish of TEMPLECARNE, and partly in that of DRUMKEERAN, poor-law union of LONTERSTOWN, barony of LURG, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (S.) from Pettigo. This island, situated in the upper portion of the Lower Lough Erne, comprises 1342 statute acres, of which nearly 787 are in Drumkeeran, and the remainder in the parish of Templecarne. The land is good, and the island is divided into a number of small farms varying from two to forty acres. There is a fine quarry of freestone. In the townland of Cald-ragh is a burial-ground.

BOYANAGH, a parish, in the poor-law union of CASTLEREA, partly in the barony of TYQUIN, but chiefly in that of BALLYMOE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6½ miles (E. by N.) from Dunmore; containing 5288 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Dunmore to Castleren, and comprises 15,831½ statute acres, a large extent of which is waste land and bog. Here are two oatmeal-mills: limestone is abundant. Boyanagh is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and is within the ecclesiastical union of Kilkerrin; the rectory forms part of the union, and corps of the deanery, of Tuam: the tithe rent-charge is £138. 15., of which £90 are payable to the dean, and the remainder to the incumbent. The church is in ruins, but the ground is still used for burials. In the Roman Catholic division the parish is the head of a union or district, sometimes called Glanamada, comprising the parishes of Boyanagh and Templetogether: there is a chapel in each, of which that of Boyanagh is situated at Kelnalag.

BOYLE, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 19¼ miles (S. S. E.) from Sligo, and 64½ miles (W. N. W.) from Dublin; containing 12,591 inhabitants, of whom 3235 are in the town. This place had its origin in the foundation of a religious establishment, in 1148, at Grelacdinach; which establishment, after several removals, was finally settled here in 1161, by Maurice O'Dubhag, the third in succession to Peter Mordha, its first abbot, who had been promoted to the see of Clonfert, and was drowned in the Shannon in 1171. The abbey, which was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, was founded for brethren of the Cistercian order of St. Bernard, and as a dependency of the great abbey of Mellifont, in the county of Louth. In 1196 Conor Mac Dermot, King of Moylurg (which included the greater part, if not the whole, of the barony of Boyle), died here in the habit of the order, and was interred within the precincts of the abbey. The English forces, commanded by the Lord-Justice Maurice Fitzgerald, Hugh de Lacy, and Richard de Burgo, in 1235 encamped within the walls of the monastery, seized upon every thing belonging to it, and stripped the monks of their habits, to punish them for their endeavours to assist the King of Connaught. It was also pillaged by Rory Conor, in 1315, but continued to flourish till the Dissolution, and in 1569 was given by Queen Elizabeth to Patrick Cusacke, of Gerrardstown, in the county of Meath, by whom, or by a lay proprietor who succeeded him, it was forfeited. In 1589 it was granted to William Usher, on a lease of 21 years, at a rent of £14. 16. 4. per annum; in 1595 it was besieged by the Earl of Tyrone with an army of 2300 Scottish Highlanders and Irish. In the 2nd, 4th, and 9th years of the reign of James I., inquiries were made to ascertain its possessions; and in 1603 it was given to Sir John King, ancestor of the present Earl of Kingston and Viscount Lorton; which grant was, about 15 years afterwards, confirmed by another, conferring also the privilege of holding courts leet and baron.

The town, which is the largest in the northern part of the county, and one of the principal within its limits, is situated on the river Boyle, which flows from Lough Gara into Lough Key, and on the mail-coach road to Sligo. It consists of 536 houses, and is divided by the river, towards which the ground slopes precipitously on both sides. The oldest part extends up the acclivity on the north side, while a more modern portion stretches in a direction parallel with the north-west bank of the river, above the bridge: the most recent and improved part is on the south side of the bridge, ascending the hill, and forming a crescent on its summit. The old bridge, an inconvenient structure, which connected these parts of the town, and on which was a statue of William III., has been taken down and replaced by a handsome structure of three arches, 100 feet long and 42 feet wide. The span of the principal arch is 30 feet, and the lightness and beauty of the design add greatly to the appearance of the town; the whole was erected at an expense of £500, one-half of which was paid by the county, and the other by Lord Lorton. Another bridge, of a single arch 50 feet in span, was thrown across the river in 1817; and below it, is a third, of five small arches. The ancient mansion of the Kingston family has been converted into infantry barracks for 12 officers and 360 non-commissioned officers and privates, with stabling for five horses, and an hospital for 30 invalids. The principal street is on the line of approach from the new bridge to the barracks; the houses are built generally of limestone, but sandstone is used in some of the public buildings. On the erection of a new sessions-house, the old building was given up to Lord Lorton, and on the site of it a handsome lecture-room has been built, partly by a bequest from the late Rev. J. Gouldsbury, and partly by his lordship; in the back part of the building are the savings' bank, the charitable loan fund, the infants' school, and the dispensary.

This town is the commercial centre of an extensive agricultural district, and carries on a considerable trade with Drumsna and Sligo, chiefly in provisions, clothing, and household utensils. A market and some fairs were granted to John Bingley and John King in 1604, prior to which date scarcely any notice occurs of the town. The staple articles are corn and butter: of the former very little is sold in the town, the greater part or nearly the whole being sent to Sligo; the butter-market is on Monday, when great quantities are sold in firkins for exportation. Yarn is also sold in large quantities to the purchasers who attend from the north for that purpose on the principal market-day, which is Saturday; the sale of frieze and flannel has of late very much diminished. The market for provisions is held in an inclosure on the north-west side of the bridge, formed at the expense of Lord Lorton about the year 1826; and is well supplied, not only with fish from the rivers and lakes, but also with sea-fish in abundance. Fairs are held on March 6th, April 3rd, May 9th and 30th, July 9th and 25th, Aug. 16th, Oct. 1st, and Nov. 25th. The only line of communication is the coach-road from Dublin to Sligo, and all the trade of the town is conducted by land carriage. A branch of the National Bank has been established. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Athlone; and it is a chief station of the constabulary police, for whose accommodation a barrack, with a handsome residence for the chief officer, has been erected near the abbey, at the expense of Lord Lorton.

The borough was incorporated by charter of the 11th of James I. (1613), and a new charter was granted in the 4th of James II., but as it was never acted on, the former became the governing charter. The corporation, previously to its late dissolution, was styled "the Borough-Master, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Boyle," and consisted of a borough-master, twelve other free burgesses, and an indefinite number of commonalty; of which, however, the last-named body was not latterly recognised in practice. The borough-master was chosen annually from and by the free burgesses, but his duties were very limited, and he exercised little power; the free burgesses were also chosen, as vacancies occurred, by the members of their own body, and held office for life, but were removable for misconduct. The charter empowered the corporation to appoint two sergeants-at-mace, but latterly there was only a town-serjeant: they had also the power of creating a guild of merchants, of which, however, no trace of late years existed; and of making by-laws. By the act 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108, the corporation was dissolved, and whatever property it possessed became vested in the guardians of the poor of the union of Boyle. The borough limits included the town, and a small district immediately surrounding. It returned two members to the Irish parliament, who were elected by the borough-master and free burgesses; and on its disfranchisement at the time of the Union, the £15,000 granted in compensation for the loss of that privilege were paid to Lord Lorton, as executor of his father, the Earl of Kingston, to whom the borough belonged. The charter granted a court of record to be held every Tuesday, with civil jurisdiction to the amount of five marks, and the borough-master was judge; but the business done being inconsiderable, it was not usually held oftener than about once in a month. According to practice, the jurisdiction was exercised in cases of which the cause of action either arose within the borough, or where it arose without and there were goods of the defendant within the borough: the process was by attachment, on oath made by the plaintiff. Quarter-sessions are held here every nine months, for the Boyle division of the county, which comprises also the towns of Castlereagh and Strokestown, where they are likewise held every nine months; and petty-sessions are held by the county magistrates every Monday. A senechal's court is held in the town, having no jurisdiction within the borough, but over several baronies within the county, extending to the distance of many miles round the town. The new sessions-house, towards the erection of which Lord Lorton contributed £500, is situated on the slope of the hill on the south side of the river, fronting the main street, and is built of sandstone. Connected with it is the district bridewell, containing a keeper's house and eight cells, upon the improved plan of construction: the entire expense, amounting to £2400, was advanced by government, to be repaid by the county in instalments.

The PARISH, which is also called Assyllin, comprises 20,736 statute acres. The lands are chiefly under tillage, and the system of agriculture is improved; there is little woodland, except on the demesnes of the resident gentry; about 1010 acres are bog and waste. Limestone and freestone are found in abundance, and there are also some quarries of a species of marble; it is said that coal exists on the Curlew mountains, and that there were formerly iron-works on the river. Rockingham House, the superb residence of Viscount Lorton, is beautifully situated about two miles from the town, and on the south-east side of Lough Key. The building is of Grecian-Ionic architecture, with a noble portico of six columns, on each side of which the façade is decorated with as many of the same order; on the north is a colonnade of six Ionic columns, and on the east is an entrance through an orangery. The grounds are tastefully laid out, and there are four grand lodges leading into the demesne, which comprises about 2000 statute acres, richly planted. Mount Erris, the seat of Captain Duckworth, commands some fine views of Lough Key and the adjacent mountains. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, to which the vicarages of Aughanagh and Kilnamanagh were episcopally united in 1842; the three parishes constitute the union of Boyle, in the patronage of the Bishop. The rectory of Boyle is inappropriate in Viscount Lorton. The tithe rent-charge is £234. 8., of which £124. 12. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the vicarial rent-charge for the whole benefice is £179. 8. 2. There is at present but one church in the union, situated at Boyle, near the old park; it was erected by aid of a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1818: the glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £100 from the same Board, in 1805. Another church is in course of erection at Aughanagh. There are two glebes; one in this parish, comprising 20½ acres; and one in Kilnamanagh, of 14 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district comprising the parishes of Boyle and Kilhrine; there are two Roman Catholic chapels in the town, and also places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists and Baptists. A charitable loan society was established in 1824, under the patronage of Lord and Lady Lorton, by which about £90 are weekly distributed to the poor in small loans, to be repaid by instalments, with a trifling interest; a dispensary is supported in the customary manner, and another is maintained by Lord Lorton, for the poor on the Rockingham estate and in its vicinity. The workhouse of the union, on a site of six acres held at a rent of £30, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £6886, and is constructed to receive 700 paupers.

The ivy-clad remains of the ancient abbey are situated near the river, and not far distant from the new bridge; they consist of vestiges of the conventual buildings, dispersed in the grounds of Captain Robertson's seat, and of the principal part of the church, of which the nave, choir, and transepts, with the lofty and massive central tower, are in good preservation. The nave, 131 feet long and 25 feet wide, is separated from the aisles by a noble range of massive circular arches, supported partly by circular and clustered columns, with richly ornamented bases and capitals of various designs: between the arches are enriched corbels, from which sprang the arches of the groined roof; the wall of the south aisle is wanting, and the pillars stand exposed. Some of the clerestory windows are partly remaining, though concealed by the thick ivy that crowns the irregular summit of the range. The central tower is supported on four massive columns, 48 feet high, whose bases, formerly concealed by accumulated earth, have been cleared by Captain Robertson, and are beautifully ornamented with various sculptured designs; of the arches, three are circular and the fourth pointed. The east window of the choir is of the triple lancet form: and the prevailing style of this once magnificent church is the later Norman passing into the early English: within the walls is a tomb of the King family. To the north of the town is the low ridge of the Curlew mountains, over which are scattered numerous white cottages; and on which Sir Conyers Clifford, governor of Connaught in the reign of Elizabeth, was intercepted by O'Rourke, one of the petty chieftains of the district, his detachment routed, and himself slain. At Ardcarne, three miles to the east of the town, commence the plains of Boyle, extending ten miles in length and four in breadth, and consisting of elevated limestone, with an undulating surface of rich pasture lands noted for fattening oxen and sheep. About a mile from the town, up the north bank of the river, on a knoll terminating abruptly, are the remains of the old church of Ashlyn or Iselyn, which, from the extent of the ruined walls, appears to have been a very spacious building; around it is a large cemetery, which is still used as a place of sepulture by the inhabitants of the town. Below this spot the river rushes over the rocks with great impetuosity. At a small distance was a ford, formerly called Athdalaragh and now Ardagh, where was anciently an abbey of Canons Regular, which became the seat of a bishopric, over which St. Congallan presided in the time of St. Patrick: the abbey existed till 1201. On the right side of the road to Lough Gara is one of the largest cromlechs in Ireland; the table-stone, which has a considerable inclination, is 15 feet long and 11 feet wide, and was formerly supported on five upright pillars, one of which has been removed.

BOYSTOWN, or BALTIPOYS, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of LOWER TALBOTSTOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.) from Blessington; containing 3644 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the Liffey and King's rivers, and bounded by the mountain of Thonelagee, 2307 feet above the sea. It comprises, with the chapels of Granabeg and Kilbeg, 25,134½ statute acres, of which nearly two-thirds are mountain, and the remainder chiefly pasture land, with a small portion under tillage. The system of agriculture is improving; there is an extensive tract of bog, called Ballynahown, near Blackditch. At Baltipoys is a good quarry of slate, formerly worked to advantage, but at present discontinued; and some quarries of granite, at Ballyknocken, are still in operation. The surrounding scenery is hold and mountainous, and there are several gentlemen's seats, among which are Tulfarris, partly burnt by the insurgents in 1798; Baltipoys, a handsome mansion commanding some fine views; Humphreystown, the demesne of which is tastefully laid out and planted; Wilmonnt, embracing an extensive view of the surrounding country; and Stormount, from which also is a fine view, including the mansion and demesne of Rensborough. There are likewise two shooting lodges, one at Kilbeg, and one at Marfeld, the latter the property of Mr. La Touche. Boystown is a vicarage, in the diocese of Duhlin, and is part of the union of St. Mary Blessington, or Burgence; the rectory is appropriate to the corps of the treasurer in the cathedral of St. Patrick, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge is £136. 2. 6., of which £82. 10. are payable to the treasurer, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions, Boystown is included in the district of Blackditches, which comprises the whole of this parish and a part of Blessington; there are chapels at Blackditches and at the small village of Lacken, both in this parish. There is an ancient cemetery at Baltipoys, and another at Templepoda.

BOYTONRATH, or LAGINSTOWN, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER; containing 255 inhabitants. It comprises only 999 statute acres; and is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, entirely approprate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral church of St. Patrick, Cashel, who pay a stipend of £2.15. per annum to the clergyman of an adjoining parish for the performance of occasional duties. The tithe rent-charge is £26. 5.

BRABAN.—See PREBAN.

BRACKAVILLE, a district parish, in the old parishes of KILLYMAN, DONOGHENRY, TULLANISKEN, and CLONE, poor-law union and barony of DUNANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N. E.) from Dungannon. This parish, which includes the post-town of Coal-Island, is situated on the river Torren, and comprises 3130½ statute acres, nearly all arable land; the surface is very undulating, and the soil in general productive. There is a good coal-mine, and a limestone quarry is wrought at Roan by Messrs. Stevenson. The district was formed on the 28th February, 1841, under the act 7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 43: the patronage of the living is exercised by the incumbents of the four parishes in succession, the next turn being with the incumbent of Donogherry. The incumbent's stipend is £95, of which £75 are payable by the parishes out of which the district was formed, and the remainder from Primate Bonlter's fund. The church, commenced in 1835, and accommodating 280 persons, is a plain edifice measuring 49 feet by 22, independently of a north and south transept, each 20 feet by 14, which were afterwards added to the original building: the total cost was £381. In Coal-Island is a place of worship for Wesleyans, and not far distant a Roman Catholic chapel. A flourishing loan fund, having a capital of £1800, has conferred much benefit on the district, and creates, besides, a profit-fund of £50 a year for charitable purposes.

BRACKHILL, a village, in the parish of KILCOLMAN, union of KILLARNEY, barony of TAUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (N. E.) from Milltown; containing 215 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Milltown to Castlemaine, of which latter it may be considered a suburb, being connected with it by Castlemaine bridge.

BRADOCK, an island, in the parish of KILLINCHY, union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of DUFFRIN, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER. It lies in Lough Strangford.

BRANACH ISLES, county GALWAY.—See ARRAN.

BRANDON.—See CLOUGHANE.

BRANNICKSTOWN, a parish, in the union and barony of NAAS, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER; adjoining the post-town of Kilcullen, and containing 111 inhabitants. This parish comprises 888½ statute acres, 72 of which are plantation in gentlemen's demesnes, 19 artificial water, about 10 waste, 19 bog, and the remainder arable and pasture land in nearly equal portions. The bog is well adapted for grazing in the summer and autumn. Brannickstown forms part of the impropriate or perpetual curacy of Kilcullen, in the diocese of Dublin.

BRANTRY, an ecclesiastical district, chiefly in the parish of AUGHALOO, unions of DUNANNON and ARMACH, barony of DUNANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER. This district was formed in 1844; the living is a curacy, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the alternate patronage of the incumbents of Carrteel and Clonfeacle, who pay the minister, the former £60, and the latter £10, a year. The church was built by the Dowager Lady Caledon, and a glebe-house by the Earl of Caledon, who has also assigned five acres of land for a glebe.

BRAY, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of RATHDOWN, half-barony of RATHDOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 14 miles (N.) from Wicklow by the sea road, and 10 (S. E. by S.) from Dublin; containing 3326 inhabitants, of whom 2203 are in the town, exclusively of Little Bray. This place derives its name, originally Bré or Bree, signifying a "hill" or "headland," from the precipitous promontory of clay-slate and quartz called Bray Head, which rises immediately on the south of the town to an elevation of 807 feet above the level of the sea, and from the singular indentation of its summit forms a well-known landmark to mariners. The manor or lordship of Bray, with all the territories of the O'Tooles, was bestowed, in 1173, by Richard de Clare, Earl of Pembroke, Lord-Deputy, upon Walter de Riddlesford, one of the earliest of the Norman adventurers, to be held of the crown by three knights' service, to be performed at Dublin. This grant, together with the seigniorial of Castledermot and some extensive privileges, was confirmed to him by John, Lord of Ireland, who subsequently granted an annual fair to be held at Bray, with free warren and other privileges. Among the earliest notices of this place is the record of a gift of a hurgage, with a portion of arable land, to the abbey of St. Thomas, near Dublin, by the same Walter de Riddlesford, whose estates, on failure of male issue, were at his death divided between two coheirs; and in 1215 the abbot of St. Thomas obtained a grant of all the lands held by Walter de Riddlesford in fee, in the town of Bray, at a yearly rent of three, and a fine of 60, marks. The town was frequently assailed by the mountain sept of the O'Byrnes and O'Tooles, to whose territories it was contiguous, and who, on the 16th of April, 1316, destroyed the castle; but they were on the same day attacked and defeated by Edmond Le Boteler. A fierce conflict took place near the town, in 1402, between these septs and the citizens of Dublin headed by John Drake, their provost; on which occasion, according to Ware and Camden, 4000, but according to Hervey de Marlbrige, 400, of the former were slain. At the Dissolution of religious houses, the possessions of the abbey of St. Thomas were granted to Sir Thomas Brabazon, whose descendant, the Earl of Meath, is the present proprietor in fee of the greater part of the town.

The town is situated on the Dargle or Bray river, which here forms a boundary between the counties of Dublin and Wicklow, and after passing under an old bridge of five arches, connecting the portions of the town which lie on different sides of it, falls into the sea a little below this place. That part of the town which is on the Wicklow side of the river consists partly of one long street of irregularly built houses, at the head of which are two smaller streets; one of them branching off on the left, from which the lower road to Wicklow is continued over the hill of Windgates; and the other on the right, along the road to the glen of the Downs; the whole containing 421 houses. That part which is in the county of Dublin is called Little Bray; it is within the parish of Old Connaught, and contains 160 houses and cottages, and 966 inhabitants. The houses in both are in general neatly built, and the town has a cheerful and interesting appearance; it is neither paved nor lighted, but the road is kept in good order. The surrounding scenery is exceedingly romantic, and combines with its short distance from Dublin to render this place a favourite resort during the summer season for sea-bathing. A number of thatched cottages of great neatness, and containing, exclusively of offices, from three to eight rooms each, have been appropriated to the accommodation of visitors, to whom they are let furnished, at rents varying from £40 to £50 and more, for the season. An hotel and posting-house is fitted up with every regard to the accommodation of families of the highest respectability; hot and cold sea-water baths may be had at all hours without delay, and the house has long been a favourite resort of parties on excursions of pleasure, and of wedding parties to spend the day in festivity and in the enjoyment of the beauties of the surrounding scenery. A spacious gravel-walk, half a mile in length and perfectly straight, has been made from the rear of the hotel through the private grounds to the sea, forming a beautiful promenade, and commanding fine views. On the Dublin side of the river a race-course has been formed, and races are held annually.

The TRADE, exclusively of what is requisite for the supply of the town, consists principally in the importation of coal, timber, slates, and limestone, in which two vessels of 70 tons each, one of 50 tons, and one of 25 tons, belonging to the place, are regularly employed. There is a very extensive brewery, with a malting-store, capable of producing 500 barrels weekly; and near the brewery is a large flour-mill. The small haven is incommensurate, having a bar at the entrance, and only eight feet of water at spring, and five feet at neap, tides: from a change in the channel of the river, an outer beach has been formed, which breaks in some degree the violence of the sea. A plan for the improvement of the haven was suggested by the late Mr. Nimmo, who proposed to construct a pier about 30 perches in length, at the mouth of the river; but it has not been carried into effect. The river abounds with excellent trout, which are taken in great quantities, and sent to Dublin and different parts of the country, and even to London. The market is on Tuesday and Saturday, and is abundantly supplied with provisions of every kind and of the best quality. Fairs for friezes are held on Jan. 12th, May 4th, Aug. 5th, and Nov. 12th, and are attended by all the Dublin dealers; fairs for cattle are held on the 1st of March, May and July, Aug. 15th, Sept. 20th, and Dec. 14th. A constabulary police force is stationed here; and there was formerly one also in Little Bray, the old castle in the latter having been fitted up as a barrack. A coast-guard station has likewise been fixed here, forming one of the five that constitute the district of Kingstown; to which use a martello tower near the mouth of the river, where four guns are mounted, has been appropriated. There is also a martello tower on the strand near Bray Head, occupied by a private of the artillery. Petty-sessions for the division are held in a neat court-house lately erected, every alternate Saturday; and the Earl of Meath, as lord of the manor of Kindlestown, holds a court here by his seneschal every month. By an inquiry taken in the reign of Charles I., it appears that the town had been in times past incorporated, and endowed with many privileges.

The PARISH comprises 2985½ statute acres; it abounds with interesting and strikingly diversified scenery, and is embellished with numerous seats and pleasing villas. Kilruddery, the splendid mansion of the Earl of Meath, situated about one mile south of the town, was erected in 1820, on the site of the old family house, from a design by Sir Richard Morrison. It is an elegant structure, in the later English style of architecture; the entrance is under an octagonal tower crowned with a cupola, in the centre of the north front, and opens into a spacious hall, in which are tastefully displayed several suits of armour and various warlike implements brought from foreign countries. The saloon, drawing and dining rooms, and other apartments, are tastefully embellished, and furnished in a style of costly magnificence. The demesne, which comprises more than 900 acres, is richly wooded, and is bounded on one side by the Little Sugar Loaf mountain, and on the other by the rugged heights of Bray Head. In the pleasure-grounds is a circular sheet of water, surrounded with a fine hedge of beech, 20 feet high, through which are several entrances; and not far from this is the theatre, a quadrangular area inclosed on three sides by tiers of seats, and in which plays were formerly acted. Bray Head, also a modern residence, the seat of the Putland family, is finely situated near the foot of the promontory of that name, in a well-planted demesne of about 650 acres. The mansion is a chaste structure of the Tuscan order, with an embattled roof, from which are obtained extensive views of mountain scenery and of the sea: from the drawing-room antechamber there was formerly a noble conservatory of polygonal form, erected at an expense of £5000, and containing a fine collection of the most choice and rare exotics. The pleasure-grounds and gardens are laid out with the greatest taste, and kept in the finest order, presenting one of the principal attractions in this truly picturesque and much frequented part of the country. Some of the numerous handsome villas are also situated in grounds tastefully laid out, and command very fine views.

The LIVING consists of a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin: the rectory is in the patronage of the Crown; and the vicarage, which has been from time immemorial united to the vicarage of Old Connaught, is in the patronage of the Archbishop. The tithe rent-charge of this parish is £172. 10., and of Bray, Old Connaught, and Rathmichael (which last was separated from the union in 1836), £322. 10. The church, a plain building with a low tower, situated on the verge of an eminence overhanging the river, was erected in 1609, and enlarged, by aid of a loan of £1020 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1818. There is no glebe-house: the glebe comprises six statute acres of excellent land. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Powerscourt, Kilmacnogue, and part of Delgany, and containing three chapels, situated respectively at Bray, Kilmacnogue, and Castletown; the chapel at Bray is a spacious and handsome edifice, erected in 1833, and embellished with an altar-piece presented by General Sir G. Cockburn. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. A building, originally intended for a barrack, has been converted into an hospital for cholera and fever patients, with a dispensary. In Little Bray is a neat range of building, erected by subscription, part of which is used as parish schoolrooms, and part as a savings' bank for the parishes of Bray, Delgany, and Powerscourt. A provident society was established in the town in 1832; a loan society has been instituted; and a manufactory of flax and wool is supported entirely by the Putland family: the materials, when woven into linens and lincses, are distributed gratuitously among the poor of the neighbourhood. One-third of the produce of an estate in the county of Longford, bequeathed to the parishes of Bray, Delgany, and Powerscourt, by F. Adair, Esq., and amounting to about £60 per annum to each, is received by the poor.

Besides the REMAINS of the castle at Little Bray, there are the ruins of two others in the parish, one of them, in the grounds of Old Court, consisting of a tower, with some fragments of the walls. Near these is a rude pyramidal block of granite, bearing some faint traces of ancient sculpture, which, from a print taken before it was so much mutilated, appears to have represented the sacrifice of a ram; on the top is a cavity apparently designed for the reception of a cross. The remains of the other castle, at Fassaree, which was demolished by Cromwell, are not in any way remarkable; coins of William have been found near them, on the road to Old Connaught, where is an ancient cross with a rudely sculptured representation of the Crucifixion. Under Bray Head are the ruins of a chapel, 40 feet long and 18 feet wide; it is built in a north and south direction, with a circular-headed window at each end, and the doorway on the east side. Upon the glebe land is an ancient burial-ground. On levelling a bank of sand near the sea, in 1835, to make an approach to the demesne of Bray Head, several human skeletons of large dimensions were discovered, lying regularly east and west, with a stone at the head and another at the foot of each; but they crumbled into dust on exposure to the air. Some Roman coins of the Emperor Adrian were found at the same time, and are now in Mr. Putland's possession. There are medicinal springs in the grounds of Kilrudey and Old Court.

BREAFFY, or BREAUGHWE, a parish, in the union of CASTLEBAR, barony of CARRA, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (S. E.) from Castlebar; containing 2452 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Castlebar to Clare, and is bounded by a very considerable river called the Minola, which by its frequent inundations does more injury to the surrounding districts than any other in the county or province. From its contiguity to Castlebar, Breaffy was the scene of much skirmishing, foraging, and plundering, while the French troops under General Humbert had possession of that town, in 1798. The parish comprises 5265½ statute acres: the land in cultivation is partly under tillage and partly in pasture, in nearly equal portions: there is a very considerable extent of bog, which might be reclaimed by draining. On the estate of Fisher Hill is a fine quarry of stone fit for buildings of the first order. Races are held, generally in August, on a course within the parish. Breaffy is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and is part of the union of Castlebar: the tithe rent-charge is £43. 7. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is one of the three parishes that constitute the district of Aghlish, or Castlebar; it contains a chapel. There are some remains of a very ancient monastery.

BREDA.—See KNOCKBRIDE.

BREGOGUE, a parish, in the poor-law union of MALLOW, barony of ORRERY and KILMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (N. N. W.) from Buttevant; containing 441 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the road from Buttevant to Lis-carrol, comprises 1333 statute acres of land, of good quality, and mostly under tillage, producing ample crops: there is an abundant supply of limestone for manure and for other uses. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and is part of the union of Buttevant and Cahirduggan, formerly called the union of Bregogue; the rectory is inappropriate in C. S. Oliver, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £112. 10., payable in equal portions to the impropiator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Bregogue forms part of the district of Buttevant. There are some remains of an old castle, now incorporated into a dwelling-house; also of the ancient church, in the burial-ground.

BRICKENDOWN, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 2½ miles (E.) from Cashel; containing 383 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the road from Cashel to Fethard, and contains a small village called Mocklershill; it comprises 1254 statute acres. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £48. 9. 3. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe.

BRIDECHURCH, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of CLANE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (N. W. by N.) from Naas; containing 335 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the east by the river Liffey, over which the Grand Canal is carried by the Leinster aqueduct, a handsome structure of five arches, with a parapet ornamented with balustrades of stone, erected in 1783. It comprises 2217 statute acres of good land, of which a considerable portion is woodland, and the remainder arable and pasture. Being chiefly in the occupation of gentlemen, the lands are in an excellent state of cultivation: there is neither waste nor bog; and the Grand Canal, passing through, affords every facility for the supply of fuel, and for the conveyance of goods. Bridechurch is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, and is part of the union of Caragh: the tithe rent-charge is £69. 1. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Caragh and Downings. There are some ruins of the ancient church.

BRIDSWELL, a village, in the parish of CAMMA, union and barony of ATHLONE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5½ miles (W. N. W.) from Athlone. This place derives its name from a copious spring of very pure water, close to which is an ancient building formerly a chapel, from which a doorway leads to the well, now converted into a bath. Over the doorway are an inscription and a coat-of-arms, shewing that this alteration was made by Sir Randal Mac Donnell, the first earl of Antrim, in 1625. The village is built around a level green, on which one of the most celebrated patron festivals is kept. A constabulary police force has been stationed here; and there is also a dispensary.—See CAMMA.

BRIDGETOWN, a parish, in the union and barony of FERMOV, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER,

1 mile (S.) from Castletown-Roche; containing 993 inhabitants. This place is situated on the river Blackwater, and on the road from Mallow to Fermoy: it derived its name from a bridge that formerly existed here, which is said to have been destroyed by Cromwell. A priory for canons of the congregation of St. Victor was founded in the reign of John, by Alexander Fitz-Hugh Roche, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin: it was liberally endowed by the founder, and supplied with monks from the priory of Newtown, in the county of Meath, and from the abbey of St. Thomas, near Dublin. Edward I. confirmed the original endowment, which was greatly augmented by the Roche family; and in 1375, when Edward III. issued his writ to the bishops and commons, to elect persons to assist him and his council in the government of the kingdom, and in the prosecution of the war in which he was then engaged, Thomas, the prior of this house, was one of those deputed for that purpose. The extensive remains of the abbey are pleasantly situated at the confluence of the rivers Awbeg and Blackwater, which here flow through a rocky glen; they consist principally of parts of the church, and the refectory and cloisters may still be traced. On the south side of a chapel near the site of the altar, and under an arch of irregular construction, is a monument, supposed to be that of the founder, from an inverted armorial shield charged with one fish; the present arms of the Roche family are three fishes. In a small chapel adjoining is a tomb inscribed "Theobald Roche," with the date 1634; and in both chapels are several ancient and curiously sculptured gravestones. The parish comprises 3240 statute acres: about one-third is coarse mountain pasture, forming part of the range called the Nagle mountains, on the south side of the river; the land under tillage is good, and produces abundant crops. Prior to the year 1835, the parish was in the ecclesiastical union of Castletown-Roche, from which it was then separated and made a distinct benefice: it is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £135. A small church has been lately erected by the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions Bridgetown still forms part of the union or district of Castletown-Roche.

BRIDGETOWN, a village, in the parish of MULRANKIN, union of WEXFORD, barony of BARGY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 7 miles (S. S. W.) from Wexford; containing 47 houses and 246 inhabitants. It is situated on a small river of the same name, which runs into the lough formed by the Burrow of Ballyteigue. There are a sub-post office in connexion with Wexford, a constabulary police station, and a dispensary. The glebe-house of the ecclesiastical union is situated within a short distance of the village. —See MULRANKIN.

BRIGHT, a parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of LECALÉ, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Downpatrick; containing 1886 inhabitants. This parish, also called Braton, from a peculiar bonnet or cap which the ancient people of this part of Lecale used to wear, is situated on the road from Downpatrick to Killybeg, and comprises 554½ statute acres. The land, with a trifling exception, is all in an excellent state of cultivation; there is neither waste nor bog. Oakley, a handsome residence, is situated in a fertile demesne of 168 acres, tastefully disposed, and embellished with some of the finest timber in the county. The parish was formerly one of the six that constituted the union, and the corps of the deauncy, of Down, from which it was separated by act of council in 1834, when it was constituted a distinct benefice. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £439. 3. 7., part of which is allocated for the Economy Fund of the cathedral of Down. The church, a small edifice in the Grecian style, restored in 1745, is situated on the summit of an eminence, and is an excellent landmark for mariners: it contains an elegant monument to the memory of Lord Lecale; also one erected by his lordship to the memory of his wife and son, the latter killed in an action with the French at sea. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions Bright is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Rathmullen, and containing three chapels, situated respectively at Qnomamstown in Bright, and at Killybeg and Rossglass in Rathmullen. Near the church are the ruins of Bright Castle; and about a mile and a quarter to the west are those of Castle Screen, built within the area of a Danish rath; near which are the remains of the ancient abbey of Erynagh, founded by Magnell Mackenlefe, King of Ulster, Sept. 8th, 1126 or 1127. This abbey was garrisoned against De Courcy in 1177, who, for that reason, levelled it with the ground and transferred its possessions to the abbey of Inch, which he subsequently founded in the Isle of Inis Courcy, on the ruins of a pagan temple. A circle of upright stones, and other Druidical remains, till lately, existed near the spot, and were held in superstitious veneration; they have, however, been removed as impeding the progress of farming operations; and a Danish rath at this place has been also removed for the like reason.

BRIGOWN, a parish, in the union of FERMOY, barony of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, county of COAK, and province of MUNSTER, on the road from Fermoy to Cahir; containing, with the market and post town of Mitchelstown, 10,614 inhabitants. It comprises 15,212 statute acres; 104 acres are woodland, 2726 mountain and bog, 83 road and waste, and the remainder good land, principally under tillage. The soil is mostly a heavy loam; and the system of agriculture is in a state of progressive improvement. Limestone abounds in the parish: on the lands of Kilsheena are some fine quarries, which are worked for various purposes; some of the stone is susceptible of a high polish, and several handsome mantel-pieces have been made of it for Mitchelstown Castle, the spacious and superb castellated mansion of the Earl of Kingston, which adjoins Mitchelstown, and is described under that head. The residence of Ballinivill, also the property of the earl, is pleasantly situated near the river Gradogue, commanding a fine view of the castle and demesne. A line of road between Mitchelstown and Lismore was opened in 1835, at the expense of the county.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, constituting the corps of the prebend of Brigown in the cathedral of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £750. The church was originally built in 1801, at the sole expense of the late Countess of Kingston: it fell down in the year following.

and was rebuilt by her ladyship in 1803; it again fell down in 1804, and was rebuilt in the following year. It was enlarged in 1830, by aid of a loan of £1300 from the Board of First Fruits, and a gift of £500 from the Earl of Kingston towards the erection of the tower and spire, which are much admired for their beautiful proportions and elegant design. The glebe-house, a handsome and commodious residence, near the town, was completed by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1000, in 1807, from the same Board, in addition to an outlay of £1300 by the then incumbent, chargeable on his successor. The original glebe comprised 9 Irish acres, to which 12 were added under a lease for ever from the late Countess of Kingston, at a rent of £4. 4. per acre. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which is sometimes called Mitchelstown, and comprises the parishes of Brigown and Marshalstown, and the hamlet of Ballinamona in the parish of Kilsbenny. The chapel, a spacious cruciform structure, is situated in the town; the first stone was laid by the Earl of Kingston, who contributed £500 towards the expense of its erection. The late Robert Crone, Esq., bequeathed £15 per annum to be distributed by the rector among the poor of the parish. On the lands of Kilsbanna is a chalybeate spring, but not used for medicinal purposes. The College chapel at Mitchelstown is the burial-place of the Kingston family. The ruins of the old parish church are situated in the Mitchelstown demesne; and there are vestiges of a more ancient one near the glebe, said to have been founded by St. Finnahan. Here was also an ancient round tower, which is supposed to have fallen about the year 1730.

BRINNY, a parish, in the union of Bandon, partly in the Eastern Division of the barony of East Carbery, and partly in the barony of Kinnalea, but chiefly in that of Kinnalea, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 3 miles (N.E.) from Bandon; containing 1853 inhabitants. In the civil war of 1641, a running fight took place between a part of the garrison of Bandon and a body of insurgents, which terminated at Brinny bridge in the defeat of the latter, of whom 50 were killed. The parish is situated on the north road from Cork to Bandon, and comprises 4898 statute acres. About two-thirds of the land are under tillage, and the remainder in pasture; the soil is good, and the system of agriculture greatly improved; there is neither waste nor bog. Good building-stone, of which there are several quarries, and flags of excellent quality, abound in the parish. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and there are several handsome gentlemen's seats. Near the bridge are some extensive flour-mills. The Cork and Bandon railway runs for a mile through the parish. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £303. 15., of which £3. 15. are payable to the Dean of Cork, and £300 to the rector. The church was wholly rebuilt by aid of a loan of £300 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1813; it is a neat edifice with a tower. The glebe contains eight acres; and there is an excellent glebe-house, built by the present rector, in 1844, at a cost of £1100, of which sum he will be entitled to receive £691 from his successor, being two years' income, the value of the glebe included. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is one of the five parishes constituting the district of Innishannon.

BRITWAY, a parish, partly in the barony of Kinnataloon, but chiefly in that of Barrymore, poor-law union of Fermoy, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 5½ miles (E. S. E.) from Rathcormac; containing 1212 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the river Bride, and comprises 4010 statute acres. There are 646 acres of mountain, capable of great improvement, and 380 acres of marshy land and exhausted bog, the whole of which is reclaimable. The land in cultivation consists of a light shallow soil, and the larger part of it is under tillage. Britway is a rectory in the diocese of Cloyne, and is part of the union of Ahern; the tithe rent-charge is £211. 1. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is within the district of Castlelyons.

BROADFORD, a village or post-town, in the parish of Kilsilly, union of Limerick, barony of Tulla, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 8 miles (N.) from Limerick, and 94 miles (S. W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 61 houses and 316 inhabitants. It is picturesquely situated on the road from Killaloe to Ennis, at the foot of a range of hills extending to Lough Derg on the Shannon; and has a post-office dependent on that of Limerick: a constabulary police force is stationed here, and fairs are held on the 21st of June and the 21st of November. The parish church, a neat building with a square tower, is situated in the town; and a large and handsome Roman Catholic chapel has been erected on an eminence overlooking it. Here is also a public dispensary. This place is much visited by anglers and sportsmen: the neighborhood affords excellent grouse-shooting, and about a mile to the west is Doon lake, remarkable for the size of its pike, and abounding also with bream. In the vicinity are several gentlemen's seats and shooting-lodges. There are some excellent quarries near the village, producing slate of superior quality.—See Kilsilly.

BROADFORD, a village, in the parish of Killalihan, poor-law union of Newcastle, barony of Glenquin, county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 7 miles (S. S. E.) from Newcastle; containing 239 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Newcastle to Charleville; and has a Roman Catholic chapel.

BROADISLAND.—See Templecorran.

BROADWAY, a village, in the parish of St. Ibbrius, union of Wexford, barony of Forth, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 8 miles (S. S. E.) from Wexford; containing 120 inhabitants. It is situated at the northern extremity of Lady's Island lake, on the high road from Wexford to Carney; and has a sub-office in connexion with the post-office of Wexford. Fairs are held on the Thursday after Trinity-Sunday and on Oct. 18th. Here is a public dispensary; and at Doyle's Cross, near the village, is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.—See Ibbrius, St.

BROOKBOROUGH, a post-town or village, in the parish of Aughava, union of Lissanakea, barony of Magherastephana, county of Fermanagh, and province of Ulster, 13 miles (E.) from Enniskillen, and 75½ miles (N. W.) from Dublin; containing 86 houses and 491 inhabitants. This town is situated on the road from Lissanakea to Five-mile-town, and is a chief constabulary police station. Fairs are held on the third Tuesday in every month, for the sale of cattle, sheep, and pigs, and of butter, cloth, and yarn; preminims are given every fair-day to the largest purchasers and sellers, by a committee who have the management of the fairs. A manorial court is held occasionally, at which small debts are recoverable; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Tuesday. Divine service, according to the form of the Established Church, is performed in a parochial school-house every Sunday evening; and there is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Here is also a dispensary.

BROOKLODGE, a village, in the parish of BALLYDELOHER, union of CORK, barony of BARRYMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N. E.) from Cork; containing 572 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Cork to Tallow.

BROOMFIELD, a district parish, partly in the barony of CROMORNE, and partly in that of FARNEY, county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER. This district has been lately formed of a portion of the parish of Donaghmoyn, and of twenty-four contiguous townlands of the parish of Clontarf. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Clogher, and patronage of the Bishop; the incumbent is paid by the rector of Clontarf and vicar of Donaghmoyn. The church, recently erected, is in the Norman style, and was built at a cost of £869, the whole raised by subscription, the family of the Marquess of Bath contributing nearly half.

BROSNA, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (N. by E.) from Castleisland; containing 2871 inhabitants. It is situated on the small river Clydagh, and on the confines of the counties of Limerick and Cork; and comprises 11,960 statute acres; a large portion of the land consists of coarse mountain pasture and bog, the greater part of which might be reclaimed. A line of road, about eight miles in length, has been opened at the expense of Colonel Drummond and C. Fairfield, Esq., extending from the bridge over the Clydagh (an arch of 60 feet span) on the new road from Listowel to Newmarket, and passing through this and the adjoining parish of Ballincuslane to the village of Ardagh, on the old mountain road from Castleisland to Millstreet. It is in contemplation to extend this road to Scartaglin, to form a junction with the new government road from Castleisland to King-Williamstown; by which the surrounding country would be greatly improved. This place was occasionally the head-quarters of the Whiteboys, during the disturbances of 1822; but since the opening of the road from Listowel to Newmarket, the neighbourhood has enjoyed perfect tranquillity. Six fairs have been lately established, and are held on Jan. 15th, March 12th, May 10th, July 15th, Sept. 14th, and Nov. 14th, all toll free. In that part of the parish which borders on the counties of Limerick and Cork is a constabulary police station. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfer and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £131. 5. This living was one of those directed by the Church Temporalities' act to be suppressed, and the income to be vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, on the death of the then incumbent, no service having been performed in the parish for three years previously to 1833. In 1841, however, some persons having become members of the Church of Ireland, petitioned for a resident clergyman; and a curate was appointed: a handsome schoolhouse was erected in 1842, and licensed for public worship; and in 1843 a neat and commodious parsonage-house was built. In this latter year the incumbent died; the suppression was thereupon annulled, and the Rev. Edward Norman, who had been performing the duties, was appointed to the living by the Bishop of Limerick. The glebe comprises 2½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of the district of Brosna or Knocknagashel, which comprises also parts of the adjoining parishes of Castleisland and Ballincuslane: the chapel of Brosna is a commodious thatched building, and during the summer months a school is held in it, under the superintendence of the parish priest; there is also a chapel at Knocknagashel, in the parish of Castleisland. Some slight vestiges of the ancient parish church may still be traced in the burial-ground.

BROUGHSHANE, a market and post town, in the parish of RACAVAN, union of BALLYMENA, barony of LOWER ANTRIM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 28½ miles (N. N. W.) from Belfast, and 109 miles (N.) from Dublin; containing 940 inhabitants. This town is pleasantly situated on the river Braid, at the termination of the coach-road from Ballymena, from which place it is three miles distant; and consists of one long street, containing 163 houses indifferently built. In the immediate neighbourhood are several gentlemen's seats; and at no great distance is Tullymore Lodge, finely situated on a stream tributary to the Braid. The market is on Tuesday, and is principally for butter and pork: fairs are held on June 17th and Sept. 3rd. There is a sub-post-office in connexion with Ballymena; a constabulary police force has been stationed here; and the manorial court of Buckna is held here every month, for the recovery of debts amounting to £20. The church of the ecclesiastical union of Skerry or the Braid, a neat edifice with a spire, is situated in the town; in which are also a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and a dispensary. At Dumfries, in the vicinity, is a large mount of very imposing aspect.—See RACAVAN.

BROWN-MOUNTAIN, an extra-parochial district, in the union of CARRICK, barony of KILLS, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER; containing 25 inhabitants. This place is crown land, and has never paid tithes; it is united with the impropriation of Tullahought, and the spiritual duties are performed by the incumbent of Kilmoganny.

BROWNSTOWN, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of SKREEN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Navan; containing 421 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Navan, through Ashbourne, to Dublin; and comprises 1198½ statute acres, all arable and pasture land with the exception of about 32 acres of waste and bog: the land is fertile and principally under tillage, and the system of agriculture is improving. There is a good limestone quarry: a valuable stratum of potters'-clay has been discovered; and there are strong indications of the existence of copper-ore, but no attempt to work it has hitherto been made. Brownstown is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, entirely inappropriate in Sir W. Meredith Somerville, Bart.: the tithe rent-charge is £54. 15. There is no church or chapel, only an ancient burial-ground: the clerical duties of the parish are performed by the incumbent of the adjoining parishes forming the union of Kentstown. In the Roman Catholic divisions Brownstown is within the district of Blacklion.

BRUFF, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSHMA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 11½ miles (S. E.) from Limerick, and 105½ (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 2900 inhabitants, of whom 1398 are in the town. This appears to have been a place of importance at a very early period; a castle was built in the town, and another at no great distance from it, by the De Lacy family, in the reign of Henry III. That family subsequently became tributary to the Fitzgeralds, and held the castle under the princes of Desmond, in all whose misfortunes they largely participated, especially during the reign of Elizabeth. On the 4th of April, 1600, a severe engagement occurred here between Pierce De Lacy, governor of the castle, and some troops from the garrison of Kilmallock, under the command of Capt. Slingsby: the former was defeated with the loss of 300 men; and on the 18th of the same month the lord-president obtained possession of the castle, in which he placed a garrison of 140 men. In 1641 this place was the scene of a sanguinary battle between the English forces and the insurgents; the latter were victorious, and committed acts of great cruelty. In 1769, the Whiteboys assembled here in considerable numbers, and were guilty of numerous outrages: in 1786 they again visited the town, and on the 15th of July in that year, they burnt several houses, and destroyed much valuable property. In 1793 a large body of the Defenders made a desperate effort to seize the town, but were repulsed by the 34th regiment of foot, many being slain on both sides. In 1832 the Rockites assembled in great numbers, and made an attempt to burn the church and some private houses, but were frustrated by the active and judicious exertions of the neighbouring gentry, aided by a large body of the military. The town, which, with the surrounding district, was formerly the property of the Hartstouge family, and now constitutes part of the estate of the Earl of Limerick, is situated on the river Dawn, or Morning Star, and on the road from Limerick to Cork: it consists of one principal street, and several smaller streets and lanes; contains 242 houses; and has an excellent hotel. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on May 24th, July 23rd, Oct. 18th, and Nov. 28th. A stipendiary magistrate usually resides at this place, which is a chief constabulary police station; and quarter-sessions are held here in April and October, and petty-sessions every alternate Wednesday. The court-house is a large commodious building, and there is also a small but well-regulated hridewell.

The parish comprises 1331 statute acres: the land is of the best quality, producing abundant crops, though the system of agriculture is by no means good; the greater portion is meadow and pasture, all resting upon limestone, which is extensively quarried for building, repairing the roads, and for agricultural uses. There are several handsome seats in and near the parish; the principal is that of Viscount Guilmare. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in the Earl of Kenmare. The tithe rent-charge is £135, of which £90 are payable to the improprator, and £45 to the vicar. The church, a large edifice in the early English style, with a tower surmounted by a lofty octagonal spire of stone, was originally built as a chapel of ease by the Hartstouge family, to some members of which it contains an ancient monument: the chalice bears a curious inscription in Latin. The glebe-house, a neat little residence about half a mile from the town, is situated on an excellent glebe of 8½ acres, for which the vicar pays a rent of £25. 6. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Tullybrack, Grange, Meanas, Manister, and part of Uregare, Glenogra, and Dromin; and containing three chapels, situated respectively at Bruff, Grange, and Meanas. The first is a handsome building, in the early English style, erected in 1833; the interior is well arranged, and the altar, of Scagliola marble, is embellished with a very beautiful painting of the Three Marys, by J. Haverty, Esq., a native artist. The building was commenced by the late Roman Catholic incumbent, the Very Rev. Dr. Ryan, and completed by the Roman Catholic dean of Limerick, the present parish priest. The Adelaide school, a commodious building of the Elizabethan order, was erected in 1843 by the vicar, with the aid of friends of scriptural education in England and Ireland, on an eligible site presented by the late Lord Carbery. A few fragments of the ancient castle are still remaining; and not far distant are the foundations of an ancient friary. To the north-west of the town are some traces of Templeboden, or Templeen, said to have been erected by the Knights Templars in 1284; the foundations of buildings are frequently discovered.

BRUHENNY.—See CHURCHTOWN, barony of ORRERY, county of CORK.

BRUIS, a parish, in the poor-law union of TIPPERARY, barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Tipperary; containing 1415 inhabitants. This parish comprises 3699 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Emly, and till lately formed part of the union and corps of the prebend of Lattin in the cathedral of Emly: the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is still included in the union or district of Lattin.

BRUEE, or BRUGHIGH, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, partly in the barony of COSHMA, but chiefly in that of UPPER CONNELLO, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (N. W.) from Charleville, on the direct line of road to Limerick; containing 3804 inhabitants, of whom 703 are in the village. This place was distinguished at a very early period for a half-yearly meeting of the Irish bards, which, according to O'Halloran, was continued till the year 1746. The parish comprises 8895 statute acres, of which the greater portion is pasture and meadow land connected with extensive dairy farms, and the remainder under tillage: the land is remarkably good, and the system of agriculture is improving. The river Maigue winds through a beautiful valley, where the rich meadows on its banks slope gently to its margin: the meadows in the southern part of the parish are subject to frequent inundations from the overflowing of this river. The eastern portion of the parish consists entirely of limestone, which is extensively quarried for agricultural purposes and for the roads; the grit is generally worked for building. The scenery is pleasingly varied, and in the parish are several handsome houses. The village, containing 137 houses, is a constabulary police station, and is much improving; here are a boulting-mill, a grist-mill (used chiefly for oatmeal), and a manufactory for combing, carding, and spinning wool, and for napping and tucking the cloth, which is of great advantage to the population for many miles round. Fairs are held on May 9th, June 25th, Sept. 14th, and Nov. 25th, for cattle, sheep, pigs, and pedlery. A road has been formed from Croom to Charleville through the western part of the parish, and has become the principal road between Limerick and Cork.

Bruree is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick; the rectory forms part of the union and corps of the deanery of Limerick, and the vicarage is in the patronage of the Dean. The tithes rent-charge is £450 l., of which two-thirds are payable to the dean, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a neat edifice in the early English style, with a square tower and octagonal spire of hewn stone; it was built near the site of the old church, by aid of a gift of £800 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1812. The glebe-house, which belongs to the vicarage, was built by a gift of £400 and a loan of £380 from the same Board, in 1813. Attached to the rectory is a glebe of 7 a. 1 r. 8 p.; the glebe belonging to the vicarage comprises 15 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, called sometimes Rockhill, which comprises the parishes of Bruree and Coleman's-well, and contains three chapels, situated respectively in the villages of Bruree and Rockhill, and at Coleman's-well. In the village of Bruree are likewise a dispensary, and a good building erected during the prevalence of the cholera, in 1832, and now used as a fever hospital. Here are the ruins of a strong fortress erected by the De Lacy's, who formerly possessed the surrounding country: it consisted of three strong castles inclosed by a wall and ramparts more than 120 yards in circumference; two of the castles are remaining. Adjoining the church is a large and strong castle in a tolerably perfect state, erected by the Knights Templars in the 12th century. There are also some remains of the small church of Cooleen, or Temple-Colman, now called Howardstown, built by the Templars in 1287, and on the suppression of that order annexed to this parish.

BRUSNA, or BROSNÁ, a village, in the parish of KILMURRY-ELY, union of ROSCREA, barony of CLONLISK, KING's county, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (E.) from Shinrone; containing 142 inhabitants. It is situated on the river of the same name, and is a station of the constabulary police. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel.—See KILMURRY-ELY.

BRYANSFORD, a village, in the parish of KILCOO, union of KILKEEL, barony of UPPER IVAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 2½ miles (S.) from Castlewells. This village, which is situated on the road from Newry to Newcastle, is neatly built, chiefly in the Elizabethan style; the gardens in front of the houses give it a comfortable and rural appearance, and the surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified. Tollymore Park, the seat of the Earl of Roden, is a beautiful residence situated in extensive grounds embellished with some of the finest larch-trees in the country. It is approached by three noble entrances, called respectively the Barbican, the Central, and the Hilltown; the Central entrance, from the village, is through a very lofty archway, and in the lodge is kept a book for entering the names of visitors. The grounds are always open to the public. There is a good inn and posting-house, with every accommodation for families. The parish church of Kilcoo, a spacious edifice with a lofty embattled tower, is situated in the village; and at a short distance to the north of it is a Roman Catholic chapel, belonging to the union of Bryansford or lower Kilcoo; it is a neat edifice in the later English style, erected in 1831 at an expense of £900, on a site given by the Earl of Roden. A school for boys, built in 1826, is supported by the same nobleman; and adjoining it is a circulating library, also maintained by the earl, and gratuitously open to all the people of the village: there is a female school, built in 1822 and supported wholly by the Countess of Roden.—See KILCOO.

BUCHOLLA.—See BOHOLA.

BULGADINE, an ancient parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (N.) from Kilmallock. In the ecclesiastical divisions this is not known as a separate parish, being regarded as forming part of the parishes of Uregare, Kilbreedy-Major, and Athnassey: it comprises 3395 statute acres. The occupiers of land in this neighbourhood are subjected to a penalty of £10 per acre, if more than two acres out of every twenty are tilled; the meadows and pastures are consequently very extensive, and are considered as the most fertile in the county. Near the village, which is very small, consisting only of a few detached houses, is the ancient mansion of the family of Evans, now the property of Lord Carbery, and which, though at present in a state of miserable dilapidation, was formerly one of the most magnificent residences in the province. In the Roman Catholic divisions this place is partly in the district of Kilmallock, and partly in that of Athnassey or Ballinvana; it contains a chapel for this part of the union.

BULLANE, or BULLAUN, a parish, in the union and barony of LOUGHREA, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (N.) from Loughrea; containing 445 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Loughrea to Castle-Blakeney, and comprises 1728½ statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, partly appropriate to the prebend of Annacalla, partly to the sacristy of the cathedral of Clonfert, and partly included in the union of Kilcolgan: Kilcolgan parish is in the diocese of Kilmacduagh. The tithes rent-charge is £34. 10, of which half is payable to the prebendary of Annacalla, £9 to the sacristan, and the remainder to the incumbent of Kilcolgan. In the Roman Catholic divisions, Bullane is part of the district of New Inn, and contains a chapel.

BULLOCK, a village, in the parish of MONKSTOWN, union of SOUTH DUBLIN, barony of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 6½ miles (S.E.) from Dublin; containing 872 inhabitants. This is a fishing-village, situated close to the southern shore of Dublin bay: it contains an old building supposed to have been erected by the Danes, and the form of which is octagonal. In the vicinity is Perrin Castle, a handsome building in the castellated style, commanding some fine mountain and sea views. The Ballast Board of Dublin have a small quarry here for shipping granite, with which this neighbourhood abounds: on blasting the rocks, a large quantity of silver coins was found a few years since. The fishery, at the commencement of the present century, employed several yawls in taking whiting, pollock, and herrings; at present there are about ten yawls belonging to the village.—See MONKSTOWN.

BUMLIN, or STROKESTOWN, a parish, in the poor-law union, barony, and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the market and post town of Strokestown, 5257 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the new coach-road from Dublin to the west of Ireland, and comprises 6582½ statute acres. Part of Slievebawn mountain is within its limits; the summit commands a most extensive view towards the east. The land is chiefly under tillage; limestone abounds, and there are considerable tracts of bog. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, to which the vicarages of Kiltustran and Liesonnyff were episcopally united in 1811: the three parishes form the union of Bumlin, in the patronage of the Bishop. The rectory is partly appropriate to the prebendary of Kilgoghlin in the cathedral of Elphin, but chiefly inappropriate in C. and R. Armstrong, Esqrs. The tithe rent-charge of Bumlin is £213. 18., of which £75. 2. 6. are payable to the impropritors, £15. 15. to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar; the gross vicarial rent-charge of the benefice is £400. 6. The total annual income of the prebendary, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £310. 14. The church, situated at Strokestown, is a handsome edifice with a spire, built in 1814 by aid of a loan of £2700 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £337 and a loan of £150 from the same Board; the glebe comprises ten acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Kiltustran, and containing three chapels, situated at Strokestown, Scramogue, and Kiltustran, the two former in the parish of Bumlin. The late B. Mahon, Esq., bequeathed £800 late currency for the benefit of the poor of the three parishes forming the Protestant union.—See STROKESTOWN.

BUNCLOADY.—See NEWTOWN-BARRY.

BUNCRANA, a market and post town, in the parish of LOWER FAHAN, union and barony of ENNISHOWEN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 11 miles (N.N.W.) from Londonderry, and 19½ miles (N.W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 961 inhabitants. Though of some importance in the reign of Elizabeth, this place subsequently fell into great decay, but was restored, and laid out in its present form, by Sir John Vaughan, in 1717. The town is beautifully situated on the eastern shore of Lough Swilly, at the foot of the mountains of Ennishowen, and, from the romantic and picturesque beauty and the salubrity of its position, has of late years become a bathing-place of considerable resort. It consists of three principal and several smaller streets, remarkably clean, and contains 192 houses, the greater number of which are large, and well built of stone; the environs are adorned with some handsome houses, villas, and bathing-lodges. Buncrana Castle, close to the town, was the residence of the O'Donnells and O'Doghertys; but after the flight of O'Neil, O'Donnell, and other northern chieftains, in 1607, the territory escheated to the crown. In the following year, Sir Cahir O'Dogherty, having rebelled against the English authority and carried on a sanguinary war for nearly six months, was defeated and taken prisoner by Sir Arthur Chichester, and was closely confined in this castle, which was shortly after granted to Sir Arthur. One of the towers, with the staircase of stone and the dungeon beneath, remains tolerably entire. A new castle, now the property and residence of Daniel Todd, Esq., was built by Sir John Vaughan in 1717; it is approached by a very handsome bridge over the river, and in front are extensive gardens and terraces, all in excellent order. Lough Swilly here expands into an arm of the sea, bounded by mountains and rocks of majestic character, and forming a capacious haven of easy access, suitable for vessels of any burthen. On the south side of the entrance are the Swilly rocks, about half a mile from the shore; on the west side, at Fannet Point, is a lighthouse, with a fixed light of nine lamps, shewing a deep-red colour seaward and a bright light towards the lough. Two rivers empty themselves into the lough, one on each side of the town, after falling over several ledges of rock in their channels: in the northern, or, as it is commonly called, the Castle river, is an extensive and valuable salmon-fishery; on the southern river are flax, oatmeal, and flour mills. From its central situation, the town has been chosen as the head-quarters of the artillery forces attached to the batteries on the Foyle and Swilly. At Naids' Point is a battery, which is one of six erected on the threatened invasion of the French, with accommodation for one officer and 37 men, but now under the care of a master-gunner and ten men; at Ballynary is a coast-guard station.

Considerable portions of the adjacent mountain district are being brought into cultivation: copper and lead ores are found, and slate of excellent quality abounds in these mountains, but has never been worked. The linen manufacture was introduced in 1745 by Colonel Vaughan, and flourished for some time; and, in 1784, various branches of the cotton trade were introduced, particularly the weaving of velvets, fustians, corduroys, and plain cloth, to which the printing of cotton was added; but, although carried on with much spirit, the manufacture declined after his death. A manufactory for sail-cloth and ducking was afterwards established, and continued to flourish till the year 1830, when the premises were destroyed by fire. There are now works for the manufacture of yarn; also a large flour-mill and fulling-mill nearly adjoining. Several vessels are engaged in fishing for soles, plaice, and turbot, which are taken off these shores in large quantities and of a superior kind, to be carried over land to Derry, and sent from that port by steam to Liverpool. Oysters of good flavour are also taken in the lough. The markets are on Tuesday and Saturday, and in the winter season there is a large market on the last Friday in every month; fairs are held on May 9th, July 27th, Sept. 8th, and Nov. 15th. General quarter-sessions are held once, and road-sessions six times, in the year; and petty-sessions are held every alternate week. The court-house, a handsome building in the centre of the town, was erected at an expense of £1300 by the late Wm. Todd, Esq., and presented to the county on this being made a town for holding quarter-sessions. A court for the manor of Buncrana is held on the first Monday in every month, for the recovery of debts under 40s. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Londonderry; and it is a station of the constabulary police. The parochial church, situated in the town, is a neat edifice: it was built in 1804; considerably enlarged and improved in 1816; and, being still too small, again enlarged, for which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £370. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and for Primitive Methodists. A large building for a school was erected by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, by whom and the incumbent the school is supported; and a dispensary is maintained in the customary manner.—See FAHAN, LOWER.

BUNDORAN, a village, in the parish of INNISMACE-SAINT, union of BALLYSHANNON, barony of TYRHUGH, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Ballyshannon; containing 299 inhabitants. This village, which consists of one street on the road to Sligo, is situated on Ballyshannon harbor upon the western coast, and on the confines of the county of Sligo: the coast is bold and rocky. It is a favorite place of resort for sea-bathing during the summer; several small but respectable houses have been built for the accommodation of visitors; and extensive hot and cold sea-water baths have been fitted up. There is a receiving-house for letters under Ballyshannon and Sligo.

BUNDORRAGHA, a village, in the parish of KILGEEVER, union of WESTPORT, barony of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 13 miles (S. W.) from Westport; containing 115 inhabitants. It is seated at the mouth of the river of the same name, in Killery harbor.

BUNGOWLA, a hamlet, in the parish and island of ARRANMORE, barony of ARRAN, union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated at the western extremity of the island of Arranmore, in the entrance of the bay of Galway. Off the shore of this part of the island are the Branach Isles, six in number, three of which are rocks.

BUNMAHON.—See BONMAHON.

BUNNAWN, or BONANE, an ancient parish, in the union of KENMARE, barony of GLANERUUGH, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S.) from Kenmare. This place, which is situated on the confines of the county of Cork, is not in the ecclesiastical divisions known as a separate parish, but is considered as forming part of the parish of Kilcaskin, in the adjoining barony of Bere, county of Cork, and diocese of Ross. It is the property of the Marquess of Lansdowne, and consists chiefly of rocky mountain and bog: it is intersected by two old roads, both impassable for carriages; one running direct, by a wild rocky pass called the "Priest's Leap," to Bantry bay; and the other conducting to Glengariff. A new road from Kenmare to Glengariff was lately completed under the Board of Public Works, which passes through the parish, over the range of mountains separating the counties of Cork and Kerry, and in some places is carried to an elevation of 1000 feet above the level of the sea, affording great facilities for the improvement of this wild and mountainous district. At Dromfeaghny is an ancient burial-ground, in which are the ruins of an old church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilcaskin, in the diocese of Kerry; the chapel is at Deelis.

BUNNOWN.—See BENOWEN.

BUNRATTY, a post-town and parish, in the union of ENNIS, barony of BUNRATTY LOWER, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Limerick, and 100 miles (W. S. W.) from Dublin; containing 1320 inhabitants. This place is situated on the mail-coach road from Limerick to Ennis, and on the northern shore of the river Shannon. A castle was erected in 1777, by the De Clares, and was subsequently the residence of the earls of Thomond; it was besieged in 1305, but not taken; and the small town adjacent to it was burned in 1314. The castle was either enlarged or rebuilt by Sir Thomas de Clare, in 1597, and is still the largest in the county. Till within the last few years it was the residence of T. de Clare Studdert, Esq., who has erected a handsome modern mansion in the demesne, and the old castle is now used as a constabulary police barrack. It is a lofty and massive quadrangular structure, with a tower at each angle; the upper parts of the towers at each end of the quadrangle are connected by an arch. It still retains its old baronial hall unaltered, and, till deserted by the family, displayed a spacious banquetting-room; the outworks and appendages were also of great extent, as is evident from the vestiges that may still be traced. A handsome bridge of one arch was lately built over the river Ogarunee, by Mr. Studdert, who also constructed near it a commodious quay; boats of large size can come up. Considerable quantities of sea manure are landed here for the supply of the neighbourhood, and turf is brought from Kilrush. In the Shannon near this place are several islands, one of which, named Quay Island, is inhabited by one family: the anchorage off this island, called Bunratty Roads, is considered to be the best in the Shannon, and here the West India vessels discharge their cargoes for Limerick. Off Clonmoney is another isle, designated Saints' Island, containing about 50 statute acres of the richest land, and inhabited by two families. Fairs are held on Feb. 3rd, the second Tuesday before Easter, June 3rd, July 19th, and Oct. 20th, for cattle, pigs, and sheep. A seneschal's court for the manor of Bunratty is occasionally held, in which debts not exceeding £10 late currency may be recovered.

The parish comprises 2754½ statute acres, mostly in pasture; those parts bordering on the Shannon afford very rich grazing land. The new castle is pleasantly situated within the ancient demesne, and commands fine views of the Shannon and of an extensive tract of country: the mansion is spacious and of modern design, and the demesne is embellished with timber of stately growth. Immediately adjoining the village is a mansion called Bunratty, in the rear of which are the ruins of an old church, whose walls are in good preservation. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory forms part of the union of Tomfinlogh or Traddery, and the vicarage, part of the union of Kilfinaghty. The tithe rent-charge is £112. 10., of which £75 are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. The church of the vicarial union is at Six-mile-bridge. The glebe-house is situated on a glebe of 11 acres in this parish, subject to a rent of £21. 10. per annum late currency. In the Roman Catholic divisions, Bunratty forms part of the district of Newmarket, held by the administrator of the Roman Catholic bishop of Killaloe; the chapel is a commodious modern building.

BUNREE, a village, in the parish of KILMOREMOY, union of BALLINA, barony of TYRERAGH, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. N. E.) from Ballina; containing 197 inhabitants. It is seated on the river Moy.

BUOLICK, or BAOLICK, a parish, in the union of THURLES, barony of SLIEVARDAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from New Birmingham; containing 2660 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the confines of the county of Kilkenny, and on the road from Johnstown to Kille-naule; it is skirted on the west by the Bog of Allen, and comprises 7116 statute acres. A considerable quantity of coal is obtained here. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Bishop: it is at present held by the treasurer of the cathedral of St. Patrick, Cashel, but forms no part of the endowment of that dignity; the tithe rent-charge is £315. There is neither church, glebe, nor glebe-house; some remains, however, of the old church yet exist, covered with ivy: the inhabitants resort to Borrisleigh church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called Gurnahoe, comprising also the parishes of Killooley and Fenner, and containing two chapels, situated at Gurnahoe in Buolick, and at New Birmingham in Killooley: the former is a spacious building, in digging the foundations for which many human bones were discovered, supposed to be those of the men slain in a battle said to have been fought at Ballysloe by the kings of Leinster and Munster. There are considerable remains of an old castle, which appears to have been of great strength; it was the residence of the family of Butler, Viscounts Ikerrin, and is now the property of Mr. La Tonche, who has a considerable estate in the parish. Here are also two large Danish forts.

BURGAGE, an ancient parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of LOWER TALBOTSTOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (S. W.) from Blessington; containing 506 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Blessington to Balinglass, and comprises 1876 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres, statute measure. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin: the rectory is appropriate to the prebendship of the cathedral of St. Patrick's, Dublin; the vicarage forms part of the union of Blessington.

BURGESS, or BURGESS-BEG, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of OWNEY and ARRA, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Nenagh; containing 2782 inhabitants. It is situated on the coach-road from Dublin to Limerick, and comprises 4980 statute acres. About 97 acres are mountain and bog; the remainder is good arable land. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and forms part of the union of Castletown-Arra: the tithe rent-charge is £197. In the Roman Catholic divisions Burgess is included in the district of Youghal-Arra, and contains a modern chapel on the townland of Ballywilliam. Some remains of the church yet exist, with a monument on which is inscribed "Donato O'Brien de Gortmore."

BURIAL ISLAND, in the parish of St. Andrew's, union of NEWTOWN-ARDES, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER. It lies in the Irish Sea, and is remarkable as being the most easterly point of land in Ireland.

BURNCHURCH, or KILTANEEN, a parish, in the union of CALLAN, barony of SHILLELOGHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Kilkenny; containing 977 inhabitants. This parish is on the road from Kilkenny to Carrick-on-Suir, and comprises 3363 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres: it is principally under an improved system of tillage; there is plenty of limestone, used chiefly for burning into lime. Farmley, the seat of the Flood family, is situated in a well-planted demesne; and was the residence of the Right Hon. Henry Flood, one of the most distinguished members of the Irish house of commons, who died here in 1791, and was interred in the parish church. Burnchurch has a patent for fairs, but none are held. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, to which the vicarages of Danesfort, Kilsara, Abbey-Jerpoint, West Jerpoint, Ballylinch, and Grangeleggan or Grangeclavan, and the denominations of Dunbell, Grange-Kilree, Woollen-Grange, Blackrath-Grange, Garran, Mocktown or Rathbin, Ardera, Lismatigue, and Plebestown have been immemorably united, forming the union of Burnchurch, which is in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Bishop. This union, however, is about to be divided, and new livings created. The rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £340. 9., payable in moieties to the vicars-choral and the vicar. The church is a neat edifice with a steeple, built by aid of a loan of £600, in 1810, from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1500, in 1815, from the same Board; the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the four several districts of Danesfort, Freshford, Moncoin, and Ballyhale. Near the church is a fine old castle in a good state of preservation.

BURNCOURT, a village, in the parish of SHANRAHAN, union of CLOGHEEN, barony of IFFA and OFFA WEST, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. W.) from Cahir; containing 195 inhabitants. It is situated near the road from Cahir to Cork.

BURREN, or BURRIN.—See MERTICLOUGH.

BURRISCARRA, a parish, in the union of BALLINROBE, barony of CARRA, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Hollymount; containing 1681 inhabitants. This place was distinguished at a very early period for its monastery of Carmelites or White friars, which Pope John XXIII. gave to Eremites of the Augustinian order in 1412; it existed till the general dissolution, and there are still some small remains of the ancient buildings, which appear to have been extensive and of elegant character. The parish is situated upon Lough Carra, and within a mile and a half of the road from Castlebar to Dublin: it comprises 5760 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres; the land is of a light sandy quality; there is but a small quantity of bog. Moore Hall, a handsome seat, is beautifully situated on the Lough, in an extensive demesne richly planted.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, episcopally united for more than 75 years to the rectories and vicarages of Ballyhane and Ballyovey, together forming the union of Burriscarra, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of Burriscarra parish is £48. 15., and of the whole benefice £276. 11. The church of the union is in Ballyhane; there is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Ballintober: the chapel, a good cruciform building erected in 1835 at an expense of £2000, and decorated with a painting of the Crucifixion, is situated at Carnacon. There are some remains of a nunnery; and a very fine mineral spring.

BURRISHOOLE, a parish, in the union of WESTPORT, barony of BURRISHOOLE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the market and post town of Newport-Mayo, 11,942 inhabitants. This place, from a bull of Pope Innocent VIII. dated February 9th, 1486, appears to have been distinguished as the seat of a monastery for friars of the Dominican order, founded by Richard de Bourke, Lord Mac William Oughter, head of the Turlough family, and which was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. The monastery was eventually granted to Nicholas Weston, who assigned it to Theobald, Viscount Costello-Galen; there are still some remains. The parish is situated on the north-east shore of Clew Bay, and on the high road from Castlebar to Achill Island; it comprises 55,239½ statute acres. The lands are partly under tillage; and many of the islands in Clew Bay, within the parish, afford good pasturage for sheep. There is a large tract of mountain and bog, about two-thirds of which are reclaimable: the mountains are very elevated; Nephinbeg is 2065 feet, Glenamong 2067, and Bengorm 1912 feet, above the level of the sea. Salt-works were formerly carried on. The principal inhabited islands are, Myinishmore, Inishua-crusna, Inish-congha, Inishurken, Inishtabride, and Inishturk. There are two large lakes in the parish, called Lough Feagh and Lough Furnace, the former containing 1036, and the latter 426 acres; and on the narrow neck of land between these, are the ruins of an old smelting furnace: there is another at the abbey. The rivers of Glenamong and Burrisshoole, on which latter is an excellent salmon-fishery, have their source in these lakes. The principal seats are, Newport House, that of Sir R. Annesley O'Donnell, Bart.; Newfield; Seamount; and Tymore. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £262. 10. The church is a neat structure, remarkable for the propriety of its internal arrangement; it has a beautiful stone font. The rectory-house was built by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £360, in 1819, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 51a. 3r. 26p. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains two chapels, one at Newport-Mayo and the other at Newfield, both good slated buildings. A patron is held on St. Dominic's day, the 4th of August.—See NEWPORT-MAYO.

BURRISNEFARNEY, a parish, in the unions of ROSCREA and NENAGH, partly in the barony of IKERRIN, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, but chiefly in the barony of CLONLISK, KING's county, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (W.) from Moneygall; containing 1073 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the high road from Dublin to Limerick, which runs on the north-west; and is bounded on the south-east by the Devil's-Bit range of mountains, near which is the source of the little river Allitrim, which separates the parish from that of Aghnameadale on the west, and abounds with fine trout. It comprises 4540 statute acres. The land is good, and, being chiefly in the hands of gentlemen, is much improved and in grass; there is very little bog, not sufficient indeed to supply the inhabitants with fuel. Burrisnefarney is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, united by act of council to the vicarage of Bourney or Bouchin: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £138. 9. The church is a neat modern building with a metal roof, situated contiguous to the Loughton demesne, and erected under the patronage of T. R. Pepper, Esq., to whose memory it contains a handsome marble tablet. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish forms part of the union or district of Bourney. The parochial school, on the demesne, was founded by, and is partly supported by a donation of £20 per annum from, Mrs. Pepper, sister of Lord Bloomfield and widow of T. R. Pepper, Esq.; about 50 girls are taught in it. The Rev. Kennedy O'Kennedy, late rector, bequeathed £500 to the poor of this parish and Bourney, to be disposed of for their benefit at the discretion of the rector and churchwardens; but no part of it has yet been received. There are some remains of an old castle on the Loughton demesne.

BURRIS-O'-KANE, or BURROS-O'-KEANE, a post-town and parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of LOWER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 12½ miles (W. by N.) from Roscrea, and 71½ miles (W. S. W.) from Dublin; containing 3175 inhabitants, of whom 1625 are in the town. This town is situated on the road from Nenagh to Portumna and Banagher, and consists of about 300 houses. Fairs are held on the 26th of April, June, and September, and on Dec. 15th. Petty-sessions are held every Saturday; and here is a chief station of the constabulary police. There is also a bridewell, comprising two small cells, a day-room, and a cell for females; but it is on a confined plan and in a bad situation. The parish consists of 5128 statute acres; the land is principally under an improving system of tillage, but there is still a considerable extent of bog, in detached portions. In the townland of Tambricane is a quarry of limestone of superior quality, which is mostly used for tombstones and building. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £138. 17. The church is a plain structure, built by aid of a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1812, and for the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £631. 17. The glebe-house was built at the same time, by a gift of £400 and a loan of £300 from the Board; the glebe comprises 11½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which comprises also the parish of Eglishe, and contains a chapel in each parish; that of Burris-O'-Kane is a commodious and handsome building. A fever hospital and a dispensary are maintained in the usual manner. There are considerable remains of a square tower-castle, called Tnmbricane, which appears to have been of great strength.

BURRIS-O'-LEAGH, a post-town, in the parish of GLANKEEN, union of THURLES, barony of KILNEMANAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 36½ miles (N. N. W.) from Clonmel, and 72½ miles (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 1438 inhabitants. This is a place of considerable antiquity; it is situated on the road from Thurles to Nenagh, and comprises 233 houses. There is a brewery; and at Fantane is another; but both on a small scale. Fairs are held on June 9th, Aug. 6th, and Nov. 27th, which last is a large fair for pigs. Petty-sessions are held once a fortnight: the post-office is in connexion with Templemore; and here is a chief constabulary police station. The parish church and a Roman Catholic chapel are also in the town, and there is a dispensary.—See GLANKEEN.

BURROS-ON-OSSORY, a post-town, in the parish of AGHABOE, union of ROSCREA, barony of UPPER OSSORY, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 13 miles (S. W. by W.) from Maryborough, and 53 miles (S. W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 821 inhabitants. This place was formerly of some importance: being bounded on the north by the river Nore, and encompassed on every other side by boggy land, it formed the great pass to Munster; and for its defence the Fitzpatricks, proprietors of the district, at an early period built a castle. In 1600, Queen Elizabeth granted the place to Florence Fitzpatrick and his son, which grant was confirmed by James I. in 1611. The castle having passed into other hands, was in 1641 besieged by Florence; but the garrison, though suffering from want of provisions, kept possession of it till they were relieved by Sir C. Coote. In 1642, also, Bryan, the sixth baron, accompanied the insurgents to besiege this castle; which was subsequently granted to the Duke of Ormonde, and, with the townland of Burros, comprising 600 acres, is now part of the estate of the Duke of Buckingham. The town is situated on the coach road from Dublin to Limerick, and consists of one long street containing 142 houses. Fairs are held on Jan. 25th, March 21st, May 31st, June 24th, Aug. 15th, Oct. 11th, Nov. 21st, and Dec. 20th. A constabulary police force is stationed in the town; and the quarter-sessions for the county are held here in April and October, and petty-sessions on alternate Mondays. The court-house is a neat building, with a bridewell attached: divine service is performed in it. In the town are also a Roman Catholic chapel belonging to the district of Aghaboe, a dispensary, and a public school. Close to Burros are the ruins of the old castle, a picturesque object mantled with ivy; and near it, on the estate of Sir Charles Coote, Bart., are some remains of the castle of Ballaghmore, likewise built by the Fitzpatricks, and which, in 1647, was attacked by Captain Hedges and the garrison of Burros, to whom it surrendered, and was partly dismantled. On Kyle hill, about two miles from the town, is a rude stone chair called by the peasantry the "Fairy Chair," which was probably in former times a seat of judgment of the Brehons.—See AGHABOE.

BURRY, a parish, in the union of Kells, barony of UPPER Kells, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (S. W.) from Kells; containing 796 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Mullingar to Kells and Drogheda, and comprises 3694½ statute acres. The land, which is of great fertility, is almost equally divided between tillage and pasture, and the system of agriculture is in a highly improved state. There is still, however, a considerable tract of bog, which partly supplies the town of Kells with turf; and within the limits of the parish are some quarries of limestone and greenstone. Balrath, a handsome residence, is pleasantly situated in an extensive and well-wooded park, stocked with deer, and in which are some remains of the old church, with a burial-ground attached. Burry is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and is part of the union of Kells and corps of the archdeaconry of Meath: the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10. The glebe comprises 2r. 19p., valued at £1. 10. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish forms part of the union or district of Kells.

BURT, a parish, in the union of LONDONDERRY, barony of ENNISHOWEN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (N. W.) from Londonderry; containing 3857 inhabitants. This parish, which anciently formed part of the parish of Templemore, is situated on Lough Swilly, and comprises 10,67½ statute acres. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Dean, to whom the tithe rent-charge is payable: the curate's stipend is £100 per annum late currency, of which £75 are paid by the dean, and the remainder is advanced from the augmentation funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church, a neat small edifice, was built about a century since. There is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Iskahan, Burt, and Inch; and contains a chapel. Here is also a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. On the shore of Lough Swilly are the ruins of the castle of Burt, or Birt, erected by Sir Cahir O'Dogherty in the 15th century, consisting of a single tower, situated on a commanding eminence.

BUSH ISLAND, in the parish of KILLINCHY, union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of DUFFERIN, county of Down, and province of ULSTER. It lies in Lough Strangford.

BUSHMILLS, a market and post town, partly in the parish of DUNLUCE, barony of LOWER DUNLUCE, but chiefly in that part of the parish of BILLY which is in the barony of CAREY, union of COLERAINE, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 6½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Coleraine, and 12½ (N.) from Dublin; containing 181 houses and 788 inhabitants. This place is pleasantly situated near the mouth of the river Bush, from which it derives its name: it is neatly built, and is the general place of resort for parties visiting the Giant's Causeway, about two miles distant, for whose accommodation there is a large and handsome hotel, erected by Sir F. W. Macnaghten, Bart., who, in 1827, established a weekly market here. A distillery is carried on, and is much celebrated for the quality of its whisky, of which a large quantity is made, and principally sent to England, Scotland, the West Indies, and America. There is a manufactory of spades, shovels, scythes, and sickles, upon the river Bush; extensive paper-mills have been erected for the supply of the home and Scottish markets; and near them are mills for flour and for dressing flax. The market is on Tuesday, and is well supplied with grain, linen-yarn, pork, and provisions of all kinds; fairs are held on Jan. 28th, March 28th, June 28th, July 21st, Oct. 21st, and Dec. 19th. Here is a constabulary police station; and the petty-sessions for the district are held in the town every third week. The court-house, a handsome building erected by the late Sir F. W. Macnaghten, contains also apartments for the police, and some cells for the confinement of prisoners. The parish church of Dunluce is situated in the town; and there are a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and one for Methodists. A school has been established by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, for the instruction of the children of parishioners, the master of which has a good house and two acres of land; there are also several schools in other parts of the parish. In the immediate neighbourhood is Bushmills House, the seat of the late Sir F. W. Macnaghten, who made numerous improvements on his estate: the mansion has been rebuilt in a very splendid style, and with the grounds forms an interesting ornament to the place. In the bed of the river, near the bridge, are some small but beautiful basaltic columns fantastically curved.

BUTLERS-BRIDGE, a village, in the parish of CASTLETERRA, union of CAVAN, barony of UPPER LOUGHTEE, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Cavan; containing 44 houses and 217 inhabitants. It is pleasantly situated on the road from Cavan to Enniskillen. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel of ease to those of Castleterra and Ballyhaise; and a receiving-house for letters is in connexion with Cavan and Belturbet.

BUTLERSTOWN, a village, in the parish of LISLEE, union of BANDON, barony of IBANE and BARRYROE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (S. W.) from Bandon; containing 153 inhabitants. It is near the southern coast, and consists of 30 houses. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel.

BUTLERSTOWN.—See KILRONAN, WATERFORD.

BUTTEVANT, a post-town and parish, and formerly an incorporated market-town, in the union of MALLOW, barony of ORRERY and KILMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 23 miles (N. by W.) from Cork, and 12½ (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 5042 inhabitants, of whom 1524 are in the town. This parish, which is situated on the river Awbeg and on the road from Mallow to Charleville, was anciently called Bothon, and is said to have derived its present name from the exclamation Boutex en avant, "Push forward," used by David de Barry, its proprietor, to animate his men in a contest with the McCarthys: the words were subsequently adopted as the family motto of the Earls of Barrymore, who derived their title of Viscount from this place. The town appears to have attained considerable importance at an early period after the first invasion, from the notices of it which occur in ancient records still existing. On the 26th of September, 1234, a grant was made by Henry III. to David de Barry, of a market on Sunday, and a fair on the vigil and day of St. Luke the Evangelist and for six following days. In the 11th of Edward II. (1317), a grant of release of £105 required of the commonalty of the town of "Botavant" by the exchequer, to be applied in inclosing it with walls, was made at the request of John Fitz-David de Barry, to whom the town belonged, and who was required to see that the money was duly employed in the same. In the 49th of Edward III., another grant, dated Aug. 6th, 1375, was made to the "Provost and Commonalty of Botavaunt," ratifying a former grant of part of the "waste" of the town, with the north gate and customs there. A priory and a nunnery were founded here at an early period; the priory was restored in 1290, by David Oge Barry, Lord Buttevant, for Conventual Franciscans, and dedicated to St. Thomas the Martyr; the nunnery was under the invocation of St. Owen, or St. John the Baptist, but there are no particulars of its foundation or order. During the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, the town suffered considerable devastation; and in 1568 the castle was taken by the Lord-Deputy Sydney. In 1641 the Irish army of the south assembled here under the command of Lord Mountgarret, and proceeded to Mallow: early in the year 1643, Lord Inchiquin assembled his forces here, consisting of 4000 foot and 400 horse. The manor of Buttevant continued in the possession of the Barrymore family, and was sold by Richard, the last earl, to John Anderson, Esq., of Fermoy; it was purchased, in 1831, by Lord Doneraile.

The town is situated on the western bank of the river Awbeg, over which are two bridges, one on the old, and the other on the modern, road from Cork to Limerick; it consists principally of one main street extending along the mail-coach road, and contains 232 houses. Immediately adjoining, on the north-west, are the barracks, an extensive range of buildings, occupying a spacious inclosed area of nearly 23 statute acres, divided into two quadrangles by a central range, in which is an archway surmounted by a cupola and affording communication between them. Near Buttevant Castle is a substantial flour-mill, erected by Sir James Anderson, and furnished with machinery of superior construction; it is capable of manufacturing 20,000 barrels annually. The market has been long discontinued; but fairs are held on March 27th, July 20th, Oct. 14th, and Nov. 20th, chiefly for cattle. The market-house is situated on the west side of an open square at the southern extremity of the town; the upper part is used as the court-house. A constabulary police force is stationed here; a senechal's court for the manor of Buttevant is occasionally held, in which debts not exceeding 40s. late currency are recoverable; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Wednesday. The parish comprises 11,583 statute acres: the land is of very good quality, and principally under tillage; there is neither woodland nor waste, and but a small quantity of bog. Limestone abounds; and near the town is a quarry of superior quality, of a light grey colour and very fine grain, from which the stone for building the new Roman Catholic chapel was taken. Buttevant Castle was originally called King John's Castle, and formed one of the angles of the ancient fortifications of the town; it was, however, considerably enlarged and modernised by the late Mr. Anderson, and has lost much of its antique appearance. It is situated on a rocky eminence on the margin of the river, of which it commands a fine view: within the demesne is the church, the spire of which, combining with other features of the scenery, adds much to the beauty of the landscape. The river Awbeg, celebrated by Spenser under the appellation of the "Gentle Mulla," abounds with fine white trout.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Cloyne, episcopally united, at a period prior to any existing record, to the vicarages of Bregogue and Kilbroney, and to the perpetual curacy of Cabridruggan, together forming the union of Bottevant and Cahirduggan, formerly called the union of Bregogue, in the patronage of the Bishop. The rectory of Bottevant is inappropriate in C. Silver Oliver, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge is £694. 17. 6. The curate is also chaplain of the barracks; and the rent-charge of the whole benefice, payable to him, is £104. 8. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a finely-proportioned spire: it is situated near the river, and was built in 1826, near the site of an ancient church, of which there are still some remains, and on the site of another of more recent date; the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £1600 for its erection. A mural monument has been erected to the Rev. T. Walker, late minister of the parish. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms the head of a district, which comprises also the parishes of Ballybeg, Bregogue, and Kilbroney, and contains the chapels of Bottevant and Lisgriffin, both in this parish. The chapel at Bottevant, commenced in 1831, is now completed; the estimated expense was £3000, of which £600 were granted on loan by the Board of Public Works, and the remainder was raised by subscription through the unwearied exertions of the Rev. C. Buckley, P.P. Lord Doneraile contributed £30, and also presented the site. It is a very handsome structure of hewn limestone, in the later English style, consisting of a nave and transept, between which, on each side, rises a square embattled tower crowned by richly crocketed pinnacles. The walls are strengthened with buttresses at the angles and between the windows of the nave, terminating in pinnacles above an embattled parapet carried round the building; and the gables of the transept are surmounted by Maltese crosses, beneath which, on each side, is a cinquefoiled niche, resting on a projecting corbel. The nave is lighted by a range of three windows of two lights ornamented in cinquefoil, with a quatrefoiled circle in the crown of the arch; and the transept is lighted at each end by a noble window of five lights, 26 feet high, and elaborately enriched with tracery. The tower on the east side was a detached watch-tower belonging to the abbey, erected by one of the earls of Desmond for the protection of the brethren in times of violence, and incorporated with the present structure. The fever hospital of Bottevant, which contains also a dispensary, is a substantial stone building near the river, capable of receiving 30 patients.

THE RUINS of the abbey are finely situated on the steep bank of the Awbeg, and consist chiefly of the walls of the nave, chancel, and some portions of the domestic buildings. The upper part of the central tower, supported on arches of light and graceful elevation, fell down in 1814; the tomb of the founder, David de Barry, is supposed to be in the centre of the chancel, but is marked only by some broken stones which appear to have formed an inclosure. On the south side of the nave are the remains of a finely proportioned chapel, in which, and also in the nave and chancel, are numerous tombs and inscriptions to the memory of the Barrys, Fitzgeralds, Lombards, and others. Not far from the abbey are some vestiges of an edifice supposed to have been the nunnery. Nearly in the centre of the town are the remains of Lombards' Castle, a quadrangular building flanked at each angle by a square tower: one tower is almost in a perfect state, and, with a portion of the castle, has been converted into a dwelling-house. At Lisgriffin are the ruins of an ancient castle of the family of Barry. Some remains of the old town walls may yet be traced; and in a burial-ground at Templemary are the ruins of a church or chapel. The title of Viscount Bottevant, conferred on the Barry family in 1406, has been dormant since the death of the last Earl of Barrymore.

CABINTEELY, a post-town or village, partly in the parish of TULLY, but chiefly in that of KILLINEY, poor-law union of SOUTH DUBLIN, half-barony of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Dublin; containing 333 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the road from Dublin to Bray, is a constabulary police station, and comprises a number of small irregularly built houses, and a Roman Catholic chapel for the union or district of Kingstown. In the vicinity are several handsome seats, the principal of which is Cahintee House, forming three sides of a square, and commanding extensive views of the bays of Dublin and Killiney, with the beautiful adjacent country; the demesne is adorned with thriving plantations, and presents many natural beauties. Beyond the town, and on the road to Bray, near Longblinstown, is the site of an encampment, held there in 1797 and for several years after the disturbances in 1798. At Glen-Druid is a very perfect cromlech, consisting of six upright stones supporting one of 14 feet by 12, which is supposed to weigh about 25 tons.

CABLE ISLAND.—See CAPELL ISLAND.

CADAMSTOWN, or CADMANSTOWN, a parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, barony of CARBERY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Kilcock; containing 1180 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Kilcock to Kinnegad, and comprises 5032 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, and is part of the union of Castle-County; the whole of the tithe rent-charge, £88. 16. 8., is inappropriate in the Marquess of Downshire. In the Roman Catholic divisions Cadamstown is the head of a district, called Ballyna or Johnstown, comprising also the parishes of Mylerstown, Ballynadrinna, Nurney, Kilrenny, and Carrick: there are three chapels in the union, situated respectively at Johnstown-Bridge, Garrisker, and Nurney; the first is a handsome edifice in the later English style, with a tower and spire of hewn stone. At Johnstown-Bridge are also the ruins of the old church.

CAHENY, a village, in the parish of ACHAROWY, union and barony of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER; containing 201 inhabitants. In this village are about 34 houses.

CAHER, an island, in the parish of KILGEEVER, union of WESTPORT, barony of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It lies on the western coast, and comprises 128½ statute acres. There are some remains of antiquity known as Labapatrick, Templepatrick, Tubermurry, and Bohornanaccede; also a burial-ground. The highest point is 300 feet above the sea.

CAHER.—See CAHIR, county of TIPPERARY.

CAHERA, or CAHARAGH, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, partly in the Eastern, but chiefly in the Western, Division of the barony of WEST CARRERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (N.) from Skibbereen; containing 8375 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the roads from Skibbereen and Dunmanway, which meet at Dromore, near its centre, and proceed northward to Bantry; and is also intersected by the river Ilen, on which, near Dromore, are some beautiful cascades. It contains 27,380 statute acres; 17,284 are arable, 8211 pasture, 155 woodland, and the remainder waste or bog. The surface is uneven, but in many places very productive, although it consists chiefly of small fields interspersed among rocks, and cultivated by spade labour; and though the roads are excellent, the farmers continue to carry manure to their land on the backs of horses. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £487. 10. The church is a small, neat, cruciform edifice, without tower, spire, or bell: it was built in 1829, at an expense of £650, given by the Board of First Fruits. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is the head of a district, comprising the parish of Cahera and part of Abbeystrowry: there are two chapels, one a large and handsome building at Killeenagh, on a lofty eminence near the church; the other, a small plain edifice at Dromore. Near Lisnagle are the ruins of a strong castle, once the residence of McCarthy, King of Cork. The ruins of the old church also remain, the people here calling them the Abbey of Cahir.

CAHERNARAN, an island, in the parish of AUGHAL, union of WESTPORT, barony of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It lies in Westport bay, and comprises 4 statute acres.

CAHIR, a parish, in the union of CAHIRIVEEN, barony of IVERAGH, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with the town of Cahiriveen, 6315 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the harbour of Valencia, on the south-western coast; and is intersected by the high road from Tralee to Valencia: it includes within its limits Beg-innis or Begnis Island, which, however, lies nearer to the island and parish of Valencia, and between which and Dowlas Head is the northern entrance to the harbour. It comprises 19,100 statute acres; about 7000 are arable, 6500 mountain pasture, about 30 woodland, and the remainder waste and bog. The soil is in general light; and the system of agriculture, though still in a backward state, has improved considerably since the construction of the line of road through this and the neighbouring parishes, and along the coast of Castlemaine bay, as projected by Mr. Nimmo about 30 years since. By the completion of this undertaking, great benefit has been conferred upon a district depending for manure chiefly upon sea-weed and sea sand, for the conveyance of which from the coast to the interior it affords facility. Shell sand of superior quality is also brought from Begnis Island, and is extensively used for manure. There is no limestone nearer than Killybeggin, a distance of 28 miles; and, probably on account of the steepness of the hills, and the imperfect drainage of the lowlands, the spade is much more in use than the plough. The seats are, Castlequin; Bahosa, situated nearly in the centre of a reclaimed bog, and commanding a fine view of the mountains by which it is encircled; and Hillgrove, surrounded by a well-wooded demesne, a feature of rare occurrence in this wild district. Near the foot of Hillgrove is Cashen, the old house of the O'Connell family, and the birthplace of Daniel O'Connell, Esq., who holds the greater portion of a large estate in this parish under the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, besides a considerable tract his own estate. The prevailing rocks are of the slate formation, and slates of a good quality have been quarried on Cahiriveen mountain, and used for roofing houses in the town. A few boats belonging to the parish are employed in the fishery, and several others are engaged in the conveyance of shell sand from Begnis Island.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardferd and Aghadoc, episcopally united, prior to the date of any existing record, to the rectory and vicarage of Glenbegh and the rectory of Killinane, together constituting the union of Cahir, in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge of Cahir is £170. 2. 8., and of the whole benefice £388. 5. 5. The church is a neat plain edifice, built in the year 1815 by aid of a loan of £540 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house is in a ruinous state; the glebe lands, in four separate parcels, comprise 107½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Cahiriveen, which also comprises the parish of Killinane: there are two chapels, situated at Cahiriveen and Fielmore; the former is a spacious building with a belfry of hewn stone surmounted by a cross; the latter is a chapel of ease in the parish of Killinane. There is a national school endowed with the interest of a bequest of £500 from the late General Count O'Connell, aided by annual donations from the Marquess of Lansdowne, and Daniel and Maurice O'Connell, Esqrs.; also a free school supported by subscription. A fever hospital was established in 1834, for the reception of 25 patients; and there is a dispensary. Nearly opposite to the town are the extensive ruins of the ancient castle of Bally-Carbery; and at a small distance from them are the remains of one of those remarkable circular buildings, similar to Staig Fort, which are found only in Kerry, and which are generally supposed to have been built as places of security against the incursions of pirates on this wild and remote coast. Opposite to the north-east coast of Valencia Island is the lofty cliff called Dowlas Head, near which is a spacious cavern; the entrance is low, but the interior is lofty, and bears a slight resemblance to a cathedral.—See CAHIRIVEEN.

CAHIR, an ancient parish, in the poor-law union of DUNROW, barony of UPPER OSSORY, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER. It is situated on the road from Dunrow to Kilkenny, and forms part of the ecclesiastical union of Aughamacart, in the diocese of Ossory, in which the vicarage is included: the rectory is impropriate in John Wilson Fitzpatrick, Esq. In the Roman Catholic divisions Cahir is part of the district of Durrow.

CAHIR, or CAHER, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of CLOGHEEN, barony of IVFA and OFFA WEST, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Clonmel, and $8\frac{1}{2}$ (S.W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 8753 inhabitants, of whom 3668 are in the town. This place is situated on the river Suir, and at the junction of the coach-roads leading respectively from Waterford to Limerick, and from Cork, by way of Cashel, to Dublin. The town is of remote antiquity, and appears to have attained a considerable degree of importance at a very early period. A castle was built here prior to the year 1142, by Connor, King of Thomond and Monarch of Ireland; and in the reign of John, Geoffry de Camvill founded a priory to the honour of the Blessed Virgin, for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, which continued to flourish till 1540, when it was surrendered to the crown: there are still some remains of the buildings. The manor was one of those belonging to the Butler family. In the reign of Elizabeth the castle was besieged by the Earl of Essex with the whole of his army, when the garrison, encouraged by the hostilities then waged by the Earl of Desmond, held out for ten days, but was at length compelled to surrender. In 1647, this fortress was invested by Lord Inchiquin, and, notwithstanding its great strength, surrendered in a few hours, after some of its outworks had been gained by the assailants.

The present town owes its rise to the late earl of Glengall, and has been enlarged and greatly improved by the present earl, whose seat is within its limits; it is pleasantly situated on the river Suir, is well built and of handsome appearance, and now consists of 588 houses. About a mile distant are extensive cavalry barracks, adapted for 23 officers and 346 non-commissioned officers and privates, with stabling for 292 horses, and an hospital attached; and the staff of the Tipperary militia is also stationed in the town. At Scartana, in the vicinity, races are held annually in September or October, and are generally well attended. A linen factory was some years ago established under the Cahir Local Association, formed originally in 1809, and which laid the foundation of a spinning-school, and in 1823 established a market for the sale of linen and yarn. Diapers and fine linens were at first the principal articles manufactured, but coarser fabrics were latterly produced. For want of an advantageous market the whole of this trade declined; and in lieu of it, the London Relief Committee, under the immediate patronage of the Earl and Countess-Dowager of Glengall, established the present Leghorn, Tuscany, British, and fancy straw-plat manufactory: it was projected by Mr. John Parry, of London, who first introduced the manufacture of Italian straws into England, for which he received a medal from the Society of Arts. The produce of this manufacture, in which a large number of females are employed, is chiefly disposed of to the wholesale houses in London. By a failure of one of those houses in 1828, the business of the factory was greatly impeded; but the pecuniary assistance afforded by the Earl of Glengall enabled the proprietor to carry it on as extensively as before. The articles manufactured are of superior quality, and find a ready sale. Weaving-ooms for fancy plats of Italian straw with silk, of very ingenious workmanship, have been recently established, and at present afford employment to 68 females; and arrangements are in progress for considerably extending this branch of the trade. There are five flour-mills in the town and its immediate neighbourhood; the mill at Cahir Abbey is on a very large scale, and is worked by water equal to 80-horse power. The market, which is chiefly for agricultural produce, is on Friday; the market-house is a neat and commodious building. Fairs are held on Feb. 8th, April 12th, May 26th and 27th, July 20th, Sept. 18th and 19th, Oct. 20th, and Dec. 7th. A constabulary police force is stationed in the town. A manorial court, in which debts to the amount of £10 are recoverable, is held every six weeks by the sceneshal; and petty-sessions are held weekly. The hridewell contains five cells, one day-room, and two airing-yards. The trade of this place will be much improved by the construction of the contemplated railway from Limerick to Waterford. Fifteen years ago it was proposed to make a railway from Tipperary, through Cahir, to Carrick-on-Suir, for which an act was obtained, and towards the completion of which the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland agreed to advance a loan, on condition that there should be an equal subscription. It was to have a branch from Tipperary to Killaloe, to communicate with the Upper Shannon; and the estimated expense did not exceed £150,000. This plan, however, has been abandoned.

The PARISH comprises 13,513 statute acres, of which about 890 are woodland, 9560 arable, 1764 pasture, and the remainder waste, bog, and mountain: the land is in general of good quality, and the system of agriculture is in a very improved state. The Galtee range of mountains commences here, and the scenery in the neighbourhood is of a highly picturesque character. Cahir House, the seat of the Earl of Glengall, is situated in the town, and the demesne extends for more than two miles on both sides of the river. The park, which is finely planted, and well stocked with deer, comprises 560 acres; and in a secluded part of it is a "retreat" of modern erection, called the Cottage, which is greatly admired for the extreme beauty of its situation. The river Suir winds gently through the demesne, and contributes to the interest and diversity of the landscape. Cahir Abbey is a handsome house, pleasantly situated in grounds tastefully disposed: the other seats are, Garnavella; Altavilla; Ballybrado; and Killemeley Hall, beautifully situated on the river Suir, and commanding picturesque views. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, and in the patronage of the Crown; the rectorial tithes were left by Bishop Gore to the bishop for the time being, as trustee, for the repair, &c., of churches in the diocese of Lismore. The tithe rent-charge is £675, of which £375 are payable to the bishop, and £300 to the vicar. The church was rebuilt, in 1817, by aid of a loan of £2500 from the Board of First Fruits; it is a spacious structure of stone, in the later English style, with an embattled tower surmounted by a finely proportioned spire, the whole after a design by Mr. Nash, of London. The glebe-house, a handsome residence, was built by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £750 from the same Board, in 1809; it has been enlarged and much improved by the present incumbent.

The glebe consists of 9½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Cahir and Mortlestown; the chapel, lately rebuilt, is a cruciform edifice in the later English style, with a lofty spire. There is a place of worship for the Society of Friends. The parochial schools are under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity; the schoolhouse was built at an expense of £1034, of which £600 were defrayed from the funds of that charity, and £434 by the late earl of Glengall, who also gave two acres of land. A dispensary and fever hospital were founded by the local London Relief Committee. The workhouse, on a site of six acres purchased for £2650, was completed at a cost of £2547, and is constructed to admit 400 paupers. The ruins of the old castle are situated on an island in the river, and present a very interesting and highly picturesque appearance. Cahir is the burial-place of the Butler family, earls of Glengall, to whom it gives the inferior titles of viscount and baron.

CAHIRCIVEEN, a market and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of CAHIR, barony of IVERAGH, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 36 miles (S. W.) from Tralee, and 183 (S. W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 1492 inhabitants. This town, the greater portion of which has arisen since the formation of the new line of road along the coast of Castle-maine bay and through the Iveragh mountains to Valencia, is situated at the base of the Cabirciveen mountain, and on the high road from Tralee to Valencia. In 1815 there were only five dwellings in the entire village, but within the last 20 years it has rapidly increased, and there are now 252. It consists of one principal street stretching along the main road, and of two smaller streets branching from it at right angles, one of which leads down to the quay, and the other to the upper road or the old village of Cahir, which consists only of mud cabins. Some of the houses on the new road are neatly built, and roofed with slate; the town has a tolerably cheerful appearance; the chief approaches are by moderately good roads, and some few improvements have been made in the neighbourhood. A subscription news-room upon a small scale has been established; also a branch of the National Bank. The trade carried on is, the importation of timber, salt, and iron; oats, and flour from some mills to the east of the town, are occasionally exported. The mills were erected at an expense exceeding £4000, and, from the increasing cultivation of wheat in this district, are now extensively worked. On the whole, however, the trade of Cabirciveen is of little importance. A pier and a small quay were constructed in 1829, which are much used, but they would have been more beneficial to the town had they been built a little below the present site; the quay is accessible to vessels of considerable burthen. About 400 persons are employed in the fishery, but being also engaged in agriculture, they neglect the best seasons for fishing. At Renard Point, immediately opposite to the "foot" of Valencia Island, is another small quay, from which is a ferry to Valencia. It is supposed that Renard, about 2½ miles to the west of Cabirciveen, will be the commencement of the great south-western railway, should that work be carried into execution. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on the 1st of September and 13th of December, besides which, several others have been recently established. A constabulary police force has been stationed here; and petty-sessions are held in the town every alternate week. The bridge is a neat building. The parish church and the Roman Catholic chapel (the latter a handsome building), a fever hospital, and a dispensary, are situated in the town.—See CAHIR.

CAHIRCONLISH, a post-town and parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, union and county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Limerick, and 116 (S. W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 2925 inhabitants, of whom 562 are in the town. It is situated one mile west of the new line of road from Limerick to Clonmel, and was formerly a walled town, containing four castles and an extensive and celebrated college; every vestige of the latter has long since disappeared, and its site is only known from a field still retaining the name of the College Field. The town was anciently incorporated, as appears by a grant made in the 32nd of Edward III., and dated Nov. 9th, 1358, conferring "murage for 20 years" on "the Provost, Bailiff, and Commonalty of the town of Catherkenlyshe." On Aug. 7th, 1690, William III. encamped here on his march to the siege of Limerick, as did also General de Ginkell in the following year. The town contains 92 houses, and has been considerably improved lately, by the substitution of slated for thatched houses; it has a sub-post office in connexion with Limerick and Clonmel, and is a constabulary police station: fairs are held on May 16th, Aug. 20th, Oct. 17th, and Dec. 5th.

The parish contains 5173 statute acres: the soil is variable, but in general very productive; about one-third is under tillage, and the remainder is meadow, pasture, or demesne, with about 120 acres of bog, which is valuable. Near the town stands Cahirconlish House, a handsome modern residence, erected near the site of the old family mansion, by the late Major William Wilson; it is surrounded by fine plantations and ornamental grounds. The old mansion, which stood on a rock, was one of the castles above noticed, and, though previously exhibiting no extraordinary marks of decay, suddenly split from top to bottom, one half falling into a heap of ruins, and the other being left standing; the gateway, on which are the arms of the Wilson family, yet remains. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, united in 1791, by act of council, to the vicarage of Luddenagh and the rectory and vicarage of Carrigparson, together forming the union of Cahirconlish, in the patronage of the Bishop of Cashel; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge of Cahirconlish is £436. 3. 4., of which £376. 18. 6. are payable to the vicars-choral, and the remainder to the vicar; the gross rent-charge payable to the incumbent from the union, is £274. 1. 6. The church is a spacious edifice, in the early English style, with a lofty square tower surmounted by an octagonal spire of hewn stone. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £100, in 1796, from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe which is attached to the glebe-house is tastefully planted, and contains 14½ statute acres; besides this there are two other glebes, one of 5 statute acres, opposite the entrance to Cahirconlish House, and the other in the townland of Grenane, of 2 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Cahircorlish, Isert-Lawrence, Carrigapson, Ballybrood, and part of Dromkeen, and containing two chapels, one at Ballyvounreen, and the other at Isert-Lawrence: a chapel at Kilmurry in Cahircorlish has been condemned. Near the glebe-house, about a mile from the town, is the castle of Carrigfarrigla, now called Carrigoreely, or "O Farrell's Rock", built by the Bourkes, but last occupied by the O'Dalys. There are also near the town the scattered fragments of what appears to have been an outer wall of an old fortress called Croc-a-Yenachuisleann, or "the old Hill of the Castle;" and on the banks of the Mulchair are the ruins of Castle Brittas, built by the Bourkes, lords of Brittas.

CAHIRCORNEY, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of SMALL COUNTY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (S. S. E.) from Limerick; containing 522 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Comogue, and on the high road from Limerick to Hospital; it contains 1546 statute acres, three-fourths of which are meadow and pasture, and the remainder under tillage. The soil is fertile, and the land under tillage produces abundant crops; but the system of agriculture is in a very backward state, the farmers directing their chief attention to the produce of the dairy. The Comogue or "Crooked" river has its source near the ancient cathedral of Emly, and, taking a westerly course, passes through the parish, near the ruins of Glenogra castle and church, the castle of Rathmore, and the splendid remains of Monisternagh, and falls into the river Maigue at Croom. On the south-west the parish is bounded by a small portion of Lough Gur, which is surrounded by limestone hills of gentle elevation covered with luxuriant verdure. In this lake are two islands, from one of which, strongly fortified, the English troops were much annoyed, on their march between Cork and Limerick during the war in the reign of Elizabeth. At Ballingoola is a paper-mill, affording employment to a number of persons. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, episcopally united in 1681 to the vicarage of Kilkellane, together forming the union of Cahircorney, in the patronage of the Earl of Kenmare, owing to whose legal incapacity the presentation is in the Crown; the rectory is inappropriate in John Croker, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of Cahircorney is £112. 10., of which £75 are payable to the proprietor, and £37. 10. to the vicar; the gross rent-charge of the benefice payable to the incumbent is £71. 5. The church is an ancient structure, and contains a handsome monument to the Croker family, erected in 1723; it was re-roofed in 1804. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £120 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 7a. 4p., subject to a rent of £14 per annum, payable to the Croker family, proprietors of the whole parish. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Herbertstown and Hospital. At Raleighstown are the remains of an ancient building, inclosed with a bawn defended at the angles by four small towers; it was erected in the reign of James I. by Thomas Raleigh, uncle to the celebrated Sir Walter Raleigh, and afterwards became the property of the Croker family, who built a splendid house here, now in ruins. On the summit of a hill above Raleighstown is an extraordinary circular building of huge blocks of stone, curiously fitted into each other without mortar; it is of great strength, and evidently of remote antiquity. Near the shore of Lough Gur are the remains of two concentric circles of upright stones; but they are so much broken that the form can scarcely be determined.

CAHIRDUGGAN, a parish, in the union of MALLOW, barony of FERMoy, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Doneraile; containing 1626 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Awbeg, by which it is bounded on the north; and on the mail-coach road from Mallow to Buttevant and Charleville: it comprises 6131 statute acres. The land, in general of excellent quality, is chiefly under tillage, with some good pasture; and the system of agriculture is improving. At Drumcree is a common of about 262 acres, title free, and used by the inhabitants for grazing cattle. The parish contains abundance of limestone, which is extensively worked for building and for agricultural purposes: culm has been found in the lands of Baltindaniel, but is not worked at present. There is a patent for holding several fairs, but the only one held is that of Cahirmee, on July 12th, which is one of the largest horse fairs in the south of Ireland. Cahirduggan is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Cloyne, and forms part of the union of Buttevant; the rectory is inappropriate in Sir Denham Norreys, Bart., and Major Crone. The tithe rent-charge is £255. 8., the whole payable to the proprietors, who allow a stipend for the discharge of the clerical duties. The church, which is in ruins, was built on its present site in the reign of Charles II. In 1717 the roof was taken off, and service discontinued, by order of Bishop Crewe, and the parish was united to Doneraile; it was separated, however, in 1758, and continued to be a distinct benefice till 1806, when it was united to Buttevant. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is one of the three parishes that form the district of Doneraile. Several Danish raths are found here, in excellent preservation, and generally surrounded by a single rampart and ditch. The site of an ancient castle, formerly belonging to the Roches, is still visible about a mile from Doneraile: near it stood a considerable village, which tradition says was nearly depopulated by a plague, and subsequently deserted.

CAHIRELLY, or BALLYBRICKEN, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (S. E.) from Limerick; containing 1346 inhabitants. This place appears to be of considerable antiquity, and its church is said to have been founded by St. Ailbe, Bishop of Emly, in the time of St. Patrick; it would also appear to have attained an early degree of importance, as three castles were erected within its limits. The parish is situated on the river Comogue, by which it is bounded on the south; the coach-road from Limerick to Cork passes within a quarter of a mile of its western extremity; and it is intersected from north to south by the road from Limerick to Hospital. It comprises 2636 statute acres, whereof 33 are road and waste, and the remainder arable, pasture, and meadow land, of which last a great portion is frequently overflowed by the river: the western portion of the parish is rich grazing-land, mostly belonging to large dairy-farms; while the greater part of the eastern portion is in the occupation of small farmers, and is generally cultivated by spade labour. A patent for a market and four fairs on May 14th, Aug. 26th, Nov. 6th, and Dec. 21st, was lately granted to Michael Furnell, Esq. On Mr. Furnell's estate are quarries of very excellent limestone, worked at present chiefly for the proprietor and his tenantry. On this estate are West Cahir Elly Castle, and the residence of Mr. Furnell, the latter a neat building in the cottage style, with tastefully disposed grounds, situated near Longford bridge, an ancient structure of nine arches: this gentleman has some fine specimens of the moose-deer and coins dug up on the estate. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Cashel; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge is £105, of which £67. 10. are payable to the appropriators, and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe, in two detached portions, comprises 9½ acres; there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of the district of Ballybricken, which also comprises the parish of Carrigarron; the chapel is a substantial and handsome edifice, erected on the site of a former chapel, in the townland of Ballybricken. Of the three ancient castles, one, called the Black Castle, lately fell to the ground; West Cahir Elly Castle is in perfect and substantial repair; and Ballybricken Castle is in ruins. Here are also the ruins of Cahirelly Abbey, the burial-ground of which is inclosed and planted, and contains the ancient tomb of the Furnell family.

CAHIRFOSSORGE.—See BALLYNARD.

CAHIRKEEN, a village, in the parish of KILCA-TERN, union of BANTRY, barony of BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (N. W.) from Castletown-Berehaven; containing 320 inhabitants. It is seated on the peninsula that separates Berehaven from the Atlantic Ocean.

CAHIRLAG, a parish, in the barony of BARRYMORE, union and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (E. by N.) from Cork; containing 1767 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Cork to Youghal, and comprises 3557 statute acres: nearly one-third is held by private gentlemen, and laid out in lawns, plantations, and pleasure-grounds; the remaining two-thirds are almost equally divided between pasture and tillage. The dairy-farms furnish Cork and its neighbourhood with a great quantity of butter, which is celebrated for its flavour. The tillage is conducted on an improved plan, the Scottish system being generally prevalent; and, from the vicinity of Cork and the sea, an abundance of various kinds of manure is easily obtained. The river Glanmire turns several valuable mills; it is navigable, at spring tides, to the bridge at Lower Glanmire for vessels of considerable burthen, which bring up coal, culm, and sea-sand, for the supply of the neighbourhood. At Riverstown is a distillery belonging to Messrs. Lyons and Co., and capable of making 180,000 gallons of spirits annually. The scenery of the parish is pleasingly diversified, and embellished with numerous gentlemen's seats and villas. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, united by act of council, in 1785, to the rectories and vicarages of Little Island and Rathcooney, together forming the union and corps of the prebend of Rathcooney, formerly Cahirlag, in the cathedral church of St. Finbar, Cork; the tithe rent-charge of Cahirlag is £225. There is a glebe comprising 7a. 3r. 3p. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, sometimes called Glauantane or New Glanmire, comprising the parishes of Cahirlag, Little Island, and Kilquane, and containing two chapels, one in the village of Glauantane or New Glanmire, the other in Kilquane. The rents of two farms, one on the lands of Rockgrove, the other on those of Rougrane, left by the late Rev. Murtagh Keene, P.P. of Glauantane, in trust to the Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese, and James Cantillon, Esq., of Little Island, are appropriated to the education of poor children of this division, without regard to religious distinction; and a school-house has been built at Glauantane, adjoining the chapel. On a lofty eminence stand the ruins of the old parish church; and not far distant are the remains of a pagan judgment-seat, and Druids' circle and altar.

CAHIRNARRY, a parish, in the poor-law union of LIMERICK, barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Limerick; containing 1388 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Limerick to Charleville, and comprises 2478 statute acres. About one-fourth of the land, which is in general remarkably good, is under tillage; nearly all the remainder is rich meadow and pasture land, chiefly grazed by milch-cows, whose milk is daily sent to Limerick. Limestone quarries are numerous, all furnishing good stone, which is raised for agricultural purposes. At one of the extremities of the parish is a valuable bog of about 70 acres. A new line of road leading from Limerick to Charleville, and avoiding the hill, has been recently opened. In the village of Ballyneety is a constabulary police station. The principal seats are, Ballyneguard, the residence of J. Croker, Esq.; Cahirnarry House, of Henry Watson, Esq.; and Ballyneety: there are several other excellent houses. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the gift of the Dean; the rectory is part of the union and corps of the deanery of Limerick. The tithe rent-charge is £130, payable to the dean. The curate's income is, £63 per annum paid by the dean, and an augmentation of £17. 6. paid from Primate Boulter's fund; he has also the glebe-house, and a glebe of 4½ acres. The church is a small plain building, with a tower and spire of hewn stone, erected in 1812, by aid of a gift of £350 from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £450, and a loan of £50, from the Board, at the same time. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Donoughmore or Knocken. On the summit of the hill, east of the church, is a small turret erected by the late John Howley, Esq., in 1821, to commemorate the election of Thomas Spring Rice, Esq., now Lord Monteagle, as a member of parliament for the city of Limerick. In the churchyard is a monument covering a large vault erected by the same Mr. Howley, and in which his remains are interred; also a handsome monument of the late Viscount Gort, erected by his widow, over the vault of the Vereker family. From the summit of the hill are some very extensive views; and not far distant from it are the ruined castles of Rathisward, Drombanny, and Licadocan.

CAHIRULTAN, a parish, in the union of MIDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; contiguous to the town, and within the demesne, of Castlemartyr. This parish, at a very early period, belonged to the Knights Templars, and subsequently to the Knights Hospitallers; it afterwards merged into the parish of Ballyoughtera, and both appear to have formed the ancient parish of Ballymartyr. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne; united by an act of the 9th of Anne, cap. 12, to Ballymartyr and Imogeely or Imogeely, under the name of Castlemartyr; and constituting the corps of the prebend of Cahirlan in the cathedral of St. Colman, Cloyne, in the patronage of the Bishop: the title rent-charge for the whole is £326. 14. 6. The ruins of the old church are in the park of Castlemartyr. The glebe-house and glebe are in the parish of Imogeely; the glebe of the union comprises 32a. 3r. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Imogeely, or Castlemartyr.

CAHIRVALLY, or CAHIRVALLAGH, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Limerick; containing 1463 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Limerick to Fedamore, and contains 3517 statute acres. The land is remarkably good; part of it is under tillage, and the remainder is rich meadow, pasture, and demesne. There are several large and handsome houses in the neighbourhood, the principal of which are, Roxborough, late the mansion and demesne of the Hon. J. P. Vereker, now Viscount Gort; and Friarstown. Cahirvally is a rectory, in the diocese of Limerick, and was till lately part of the union and corps of the treasurer'ship of the cathedral of Limerick: the title rent-charge is £158. 18. 6., and is received by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church has long been in ruins, and the parishioners resort to that at Killeacan. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Donoughmore or Knockea; the chapel is a large and handsome edifice. At Liscadoon is a very good spa, the water of which is strongly impregnated with iron and sulphur; but it is much neglected, and other waters are allowed to mingle with it.

CAIRNCASTLE.—See CARNCASTLE.

CALARY, a district parish, partly in the baronies of RATHDOWN and NEWCASTLE, but chiefly in that of NORTH BALLINACOR, poor-law union of RATHDOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Bray; containing 2954 inhabitants. This parish was formed out of the several parishes of Kilmacanogue, Killoole, Derrallossory, Newcastle, and Powerscourt, in 1831, under the provisions of an act of the 7th and 8th of George IV. It is situated in the rugged table-lands extending southward from the great Sugar-Loaf mountain to the vicinity of Roundwood; and lies embosomed between the lower range of hills among which the Downs hill claims pre-eminence, and the more elevated chain of heights above which the lofty Djouce rises in towering grandeur. It comprehends a dreary tract of poor, elevated land, bog, and barren mountain, extending on the east to the glen of the Downs, and on the west to Luggelaw; the whole comprising 19,583½ statute acres. The Sugar-Loaf mountain rises to the height of 1651 feet above the level of the sea; on the western side its height is apparently diminished by the low range called the Long Hill, which conceals its base. The Djouce mountain has an elevation of 2384 feet, and is conspicuous in every extended view in the north part of the county. The easiest ascent to the summit of this stupendous mass is from the waterfall at Powerscourt; the view obtained from it is of the most magnificent character. To the west of the Djouce mountain is LUGGELAW, a richly verdant vale, beautifully contrasting with the rugged severity and dreary barrenness of the other parts of this wild and romantic district. This delightful place is commonly visited from Roundwood, and has, under the auspices and by the taste of the La Touche family, been rendered one of the most interesting scenes in the county. The approach to it is over the southern shoulder of the Djouce mountain; and on passing the summit of a ridge which previously presented only bold undulations of dark heath-clad mountains, a sudden turn of the road discloses a fine view of Lough Tay, overshadowed by the vast granite precipice of Carrigernann on the opposite side, rising in rugged cliffs perpendicularly to the height of 1000 feet. A little further, on the opposite side of the road, an opening commands a good prospect of an extensive glen in the mountain, whose precipitous sides are richly planted to a certain height, above which they are thinly clad with heath. At the head of the glen are some meadows of beautiful verdure, and a fine lawn shaded by overhanging woods, on which is a handsome Lodge in the early English style, built by the late David La Touche, Esq., and now the residence of David Charles La Touche, Esq. The Lodge, which is open to visitors by permission of the family, is approached by a road through the wood, near the margin of the lake, a fine sheet of water comprising 72 Irish acres, and abounding with trout and char. On the side above the house a hanging-walk has been constructed among the plantations, commanding a view of the glen and lake below, and a splendid mountain vista across the lower extremity of Lough Dan, terminating in a prospect of the unrivalled mountain of Lugnaquilla. The new line of road from Bray to Roundwood, and the Long hill road from Enniskerry to the same place, pass through the parish; but the latter is little used, as there is a branch communicating with the former, on which Major Beresford has built a very neat hotel. The river Liffey has its source near the War hill, in this parish.

The living is a perpetual curacy in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, instituted by diocesan authority, and in the patronage of the Incumbents of the parishes of Kilmacanogue and Derrallossory, each of whom pays one-third of the curate's stipend of £50 per annum, and has two presentations; and of the Incumbents of Powerscourt and Newcastle, each of whom pays one-sixth, and has one presentation. The church, a neat edifice in the later English style, with a square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, was built in 1834, on a site near the new line of road, presented by the Earl of Rathdown; and the late Board of First Fruits granted £900 towards its erection: the lower part of the tower is appropriated as a vestry-room. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is comprised in the districts of Bray and Powerscourt, Glendalough, and Kilkquade. A dispensary has been built at Ballinastoe.

CALEDON, a market and post town, in the parish of AUGHALOO, union of ARMACH, barony of DUNCANON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 7 miles (W.) from Armagh, and 70 miles (N. W.)

from Dublin; containing 1046 inhabitants. This town, which was formerly named Kennard, as it is still frequently called by old people, although its manor, markets, and fairs are all known by the modern name of Caledon, seems to have been more anciently called Aghaloo, it being the head of the parish of that name, and the site of its venerable church, which was destroyed in the insurrection of 1641. It appears to have been an important military post from a very early period, having been the property and principal residence of one of the princely sept of O'Nial. The first direct mention of it is in 1498, when the Lord-Deputy Kildare marched against Mac Art O'Nial, and, having driven him from his stronghold in Kennard, presented the fortress and territory to the British ally, Tirlagh O'Nial, whose descendants seem never to have been found in arms against England, until Sir Phelim O'Nial headed the insurgents in 1641; for, in the settlement under James I., Tirlagh O'Nial had a grant of Kennard, with 4000 acres. Tirlagh built here a bawn of lime and stone, some time prior to 1619, and also erected a castle. This was afterwards the residence of Sir Phelim, who sallied hence on the evening of the 23rd of October, 1641, having invited himself to supper with Lord Caulfield, at Charlemont. While at the supper-table he made Lord Caulfield a prisoner, and having separated his lordship's family and the garrison, carried the former to Kennard, in the castle of which he put his lordship to death. Sir Phelim, who had been educated as a Protestant in England, soon found himself at the head of 30,000 men, and waged a sanguinary warfare against the English. The whole of the county of Tyrone remained in the possession of the insurgents till 1646, when General Munroe, at the head of 6000 foot and 800 horse, marched against the Irish under Owen Roe O'Nial. Having passed through Armagh, Munroe, on the 6th of June, crossed the Blackwater at the ford near Kennard, and fought the battle of Benburb, or, as it is here called, Batterford Bridge, in which he was defeated and many British officers and men were slain. The rebellion was not suppressed for some time.

This town, which is situated on the river Blackwater, and on the road from Armagh to Omagh, was, before 1816, a mean village; but is now, through the exertions of the Earl of Caledon, one of the best-hill towns in the north of Ireland: it contains 183 houses, nearly all of which are of stone. The neighbourhood presents gentle swells and fertile vales, producing abundant crops. Close to the town are extensive flour-mills, erected by Lord Caledon in 1823, and where above 9000 tons of wheat are ground annually, all of which is grown in the vicinity, though scarcely an acre of wheat was sown at the beginning of the century. The Ulster canal passes through the earl's demesne, a little to the west of the town. The market is on Saturday, and is well attended; a fair is held on the second Saturday in every month. A constabulary police force has been stationed here; and there are barracks for the staff of the Tyrone militia: in the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Armagh. A court for the recovery of debts under 40s. is held in the market-house, on the first Monday in each month, for the manor of Caledon, which extends into the parishes of Aghaloo and Cloanaclea in the county of Tyrone, and of Tynan in that of Armagh; petty-sessions, also, are held in the town once a fortnight. There are several large and elegant houses in the neighbourhood; the principal is Caledon Hill, the seat of the earl, which stands in a richly ornamented demesne of 650 Irish acres, extending beyond the Blackwater into the county of Armagh. Not far distant are Tynan Abbey, the residence of Sir James Stronge, Bart.; and Glasslough, the seat of C. P. Leslie, Esq.

The LIVING was made a perpetual curacy in 1807, and 20 acres were then added to the old glebe, which consisted only of 6½ acres: it is in the diocese of Armagh, and patronage of the Archdeacon. The income is £100 per annum, arising from a salary of £50 paid by the archdeacon; from £15, the estimated value of the glebe land; and £35, paid by the trustees of Primate Boulter's Augmentation fund. The present church occupies the site of the ancient building, and is the parish church of Aghaloo. It was erected by Primate Robinson, in 1767, during the incumbency of the Rev. C. W. Congreave; the spire was built by the present Lord Caledon, by means of a bequest by his father; and the church has been enlarged, and otherwise improved, by parochial assessment. It is a large and handsome edifice, in the later English style of architecture, comprising a nave, chancel, and south transept. A new church has been erected for the district of Brantry, at the expense of the Countess Dowager of Caledon. There are a Roman Catholic chapel, and a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parochial school is situated near the church; it was built in 1776 by Mr. Congreave, and is endowed with 3 acres of land and 3 teneements given by Primate Robinson, and also with £8 per annum by Lord Caledon. Here is a dispensary; and a mendicity association was established in 1829, to which his lordship subscribes £100 per annum. Among the charitable bequests is £100 left by Alex. Pringle, Esq., and vested in the funds, in the name of Lord Caledon; the interest, with that of several smaller sums, is applied to the relief of the poor. Two extensive lakes existed here formerly, one on the north and the other on the south side of the town, with an island in the centre of each: that on the south has been drained, and brought into cultivation; the north lake remains, and the island in it, which is part of the glebe, is planted. Almost the last vestiges of the ancient castle of the O'Nials were removed a few years since, and a clump of trees was planted to mark the entrance into the courtyard: some of the flooring of the castle was subsequently discovered, about four feet beneath the surface of the ground, in forming the new road to Aghnacloy. Some old swords and other military instruments have been found in the neighbourhood, and are preserved at Caledon Hill. Caledon gives the titles of Baron, Viscount, and Earl, to the family of Alexander, in which the proprietorship of the town is vested.—See AGHALOO.

CALF ISLAND, in the parish of TEMPLECRONK, poor-law union of GLENTIES, barony of BOYLAGE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER; on the north-west coast, and comprising 5 statute acres.

CALF ISLAND, in the parish of KILMEENA, poor-law union of WESTPORT, barony of BURRISHOOLE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; situated in Clew bay, and comprising 8½ statute acres.

CALLABEG, or KILNASEAR, a parish, in the poor-law union of THURLES, barony of ELIOGARTY, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E.) from Templemore; containing 2429 inhabitants. This parish, commonly called Loughmore-East, is situated on the river Snir, which separates it from Loughmore-West, and on the road from Templemore to Thurles: there are 6014 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, and is part of the union of Templetuohy and corps of the prebend of Kilbragh in the cathedral of Cashel: the tithe rent-charge is £187. 10.

CALLAGHAN'S MILLS, a village, in the parish of KILLURANE, union and barony of TULLA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S.W.) from Tulla: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the high road from Six-mile-bridge to Scariff, and about midway on the road from Tulla to Broadford. Fairs are held on May 8th, June 27th, and Nov. 14th. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel of ease to the parochial chapel of Kilkishen.

CALLAN, a market and post town, a parish, the head of a poor-law union, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the barony of CALLAN, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 8 miles (S. by W.) from Kilkenny, and $65\frac{1}{2}$ (S.W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 6128 inhabitants, of whom 3111 are in the town. This is a place of considerable antiquity, and was the territory or ancient inheritance of the O'Gloherays and the O'Coillys or O'Callans: the Forstalls or Forestalls, Butlers, and Comerfords had fortified castles here, the ruins of some of which yet exist. It was a walled town, as appears from divers grants of murage to the local authorities. In the year 1361, the native sept of McCarty took up arms, and here attacked by surprise John Fitzgerald, whom they slew, together with his son Maurice and several knights and other gentlemen of that family: but from the dissensions which subsequently arose among the Irish themselves, the Fitzgeralds recovered their power and possessions. The Earl of Desmond, in 1345, summoned a parliament to meet at this place, in opposition to that convened by the English deputy; but the vigorous measures enforced by the latter prevented its assembling. In 1405 a battle was fought near the town between James, Earl of Ormonde, lord-deputy, and the Irish under O'Carroll, aided by the sept of the Burkeens, of the county of Tipperary; O'Carroll was slain. James, a subsequent earl of Ormonde, founded here an Augustinian friary, the origin of which has by some writers been erroneously attributed to Hugh De Mapiilton, Bishop of Ossory, about the year 1256: the founder died in 1487, and was interred in it; at the Dissolution it was granted, with its possessions, to Thomas, Earl of Ormonde. In the reign of Elizabeth, the celebrated James Fitz-Maurice of Desmond took this town; and in 1650 it fell into the hands of Cromwell, who, aided by Ireton, had besieged it for a few days with great loss of life to the inhabitants.

The town is situated on the King's river, and on the coach-road from Dublin, by way of Clonmel, to Cork; it is chiefly the property of Viscount Clifden, and consists of four streets meeting in the centre, and of 585 houses. In point of size it ranks the second in the county, but it is indifferently built; the thoroughfares were formerly very bad, but have been improved, and since 1840 it has been under the Lighting and Paving act. Many years ago, the late Lord Callan introduced some weavers from Carrick-on-Snir, but the project of establishing a manufacture was soon abandoned: there are at present a large flour-mill and two grist-mills, but the want of employment for the excessive population is very great. The market is held in a small market-house, on Tuesday and Saturday; and a market for pigs is held every Monday from January to May, and attended by buyers from Waterford, Kilkenny, Clonmel, and Carrick-on-Snir: the sales are extensive. Fairs for the sale of live stock, wool, and, in autumn, considerable quantities of poultry, are held on May 4th, June 13th, July 10th, Aug. 21st, Oct. 10th, Nov. 4th, and Dec. 14th; the May, June, July, and October fairs are the principal. Here is a chief station of the constabulary police.

This appears to have been a CORPORATION by prescription; and it is recorded that Wm. Mareschal, or Marshall, granted a charter to it in 1317. A writ of the 4th of Richard II. (1380) recites that the towns of Callan and Kilkenny were part of the lordship of the Earl of Gloucester, and that all merchants and others within that lordship ought to be free of customs and murage, which immunities the sovereigns and commonalties had enjoyed since the foundation of those towns; it then commands that they should not be molested against the tenor of such liberties. Other grants were made in the 19th of Richard II., 4th of Henry IV., 11th of Elizabeth, 7th of Charles I., and 30th of George III. The corporation, previously to its late dissolution, was styled "the Sovereign, Burgesses, and Freemen of Callan," and consisted of a sovereign, and an undefined number of burgesses and freemen, with two bailiffs and a town-clerk. The sovereign was elected annually by the burgesses and freemen; the latter were about 20 in number, and were admitted for life by the corporation at large. On the passing of the act 3rd and 4th of Victoria, cap. 108, the corporation was dissolved, and its property became vested in the Commissioners of Paving and Lighting, towards defraying the rates; this property consisted of land and houses let for about £15 per annum, and of a small revenue derived from the customs, which on an average yielded about £50 per year. The borough sent representatives to the Irish parliament of the 27th of Elizabeth, and thenceforth without intermission until the Union, when it was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded in compensation for the abolition of its electoral rights was paid to George, Lord Callan. The late town court was held before the sovereign or his deputy, generally every Monday, but sometimes on other days, for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40s.

The parish comprises 5634 statute acres: about 600 of these were inclosed under an act in 1831. The whole is capable of tillage, and, with very trifling exceptions, is in cultivation; vast quantities of limestone are procured and burnt for manure. The residence of West Court, situated in a very neat demesne, and surrounded by trees of stately growth, formerly belonged to Lord Callan, and prior to that had been the property of the Earl of Desart. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, united by act of council, in 1763, to the rectories and vicarages of Tullaroan, Tullmain, Coolaghmore, Killaloe, and Ballycaellan, together forming the ecclesiastical union of Callan, in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Marquess of Ormonde. The tithe rent-charge of Callan is £412. 10., and of the entire benefice £1754. 5. There are two churches in the union, one at Callan, and the other at Ballycallan. The first, which was formerly very extensive, was occupied by Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, under an abbot: the ante-chapel is in ruins, but displays two windows of beautiful design and in good preservation, and there are several tombstones of considerable antiquity, some of which are elaborately carved, with a handsome monument to the Comerfords. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £393 for the repair of this church. The church at Ballycallan, distant about four miles, is a small edifice, built about 70 years since by parochial assessment and a grant from the Board of First Fruits. There is no glebe-house: the glebe lands of the union are in divers places, and comprise 32 acres. In the ante-chapel at Callan was a shrine under the invocation of the Holy Trinity and St. Catherine for the purpose of saying mass for the repose of the noble family of Desart: this foundation still exists as a chaplaincy, in the gift of the Earl of Desart; it has no cure of souls; but the chaplain is required to attend visitations.

In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the union or district of Ballycallan; and the remainder forms the head of a union, comprising also the parishes of Coolaghmore, Tullamain, Earlstown, and part of that of Kells, called Mallardstown. The latter union contains three parochial chapels, situated respectively at Callan, Newtown, and Coologh. That at Callan is a spacious edifice, in the southern part of the town; the interior is very neat, and the ceiling is chaste and handsomely carved. The chapel or (as it is called) church of the Augustinian friary was erected through the exertions of the Very Rev. John Rice, at an expense of £4000: the building was commenced in 1810, and completed in a few years. It is of hewn stone, in the ancient English style of architecture, and has a beautifully groined ceiling: the altar-piece is a copy of a design by Dominichini, by an Italian artist; and on each side of the altar is a niche, in which have been placed two marble statues, executed at Rome by Mr. Hlogan. The chapel is situated on the declivity of a hill; and in the basement story are apartments for the clergymen, harmonising with the general design of the building, and fronting a small lawn environed by gravel walks and bounded by the King's river: this stream is crossed by a neat wooden bridge leading into the Abbey field, in which are situated the venerable ruins of the ancient friary, consisting principally of a tower 90 feet high. The present friary is occupied by three Augustinian friars of a different order from the Canons Regular previously noticed. A dispensary is maintained in the customary manner; and a loan fund has been established. The workhouse on a site of 6½ acres purchased for £760, was completed in 1840, at a cost of £5500, and is constructed to admit 600 paupers. Callan gives the title of Viscount in the peerage of Ireland to the family of Feilding, earls of Denbigh, in right of their superior title of Earl of Desmond.

CALLIAGHSTOWN, an ancient parish, in the union of CELBRIDGE, barony of NEWCASTLE, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER; contiguous to the post-town of Rathcoole. It is situated on the old road from Dublin to Naas, and comprises 1004½ statute acres of arable and pasture land. For all civil purposes it is considered a townland in the parish of Rathcoole, and even in ecclesiastical affairs is regarded only as a chapelry in that parish. It is an ancient rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Rathcoole, in which its tithes are included.

CALRY, a parish, in the barony of CARRERY, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with a part of the borough and sea-port town of Sligo, 6045 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Garvogue, which separates it from the parish of St. John, in its course from Lough Gill to the sea; and on the roads from Ballyshannon and Enniskillen to Sligo. It contains 11,510½ statute acres: the land is generally light, with a small quantity of bog and some mountain wastes, and is principally under tillage; the state of agriculture is improving. There is an abundance of limestone, which is used for building. The manufacture of linen was formerly carried on extensively, but few are now employed in it. Lough Gill, of which 1536 acres are in the parish, is a beautiful sheet of water, about a mile and a half from Sligo, with which it is connected by the river Garvogue, that is navigable for large boats. The scenery is very romantic, and is greatly embellished with the highly cultivated demesne of Hazlewood, the handsome residence of the Wynne family. The lough is 20 feet above the sea at low water, and comprises 3131 statute acres, whereof 750 are in the parish of St. John, and 835 in that of Killery; it is studded with islands, of which Church and Cottage Islands are the largest. At Hollywell is another demesne belonging to the Wynnes, from which, mountains covered with wood, the lake with its numerous islands, and the road sometimes running under stupendous rocks and sometimes through small planted glens, present scenes of great beauty.

The living consists of a vicarage and perpetual curacy in the diocese of Elphin, the former being part of the union of St. John's, Sligo, and the latter in the patronage of the Incumbent of St. John's; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge is £265. 3. 9., payable in moieties to the vicars-choral and the vicar. The income of the perpetual curacy amounts to £93. 1. 6., arising from £43. 1. 6. paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £50 from the Incumbent of St. John's. The church, belonging to the perpetual cure, is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a beautiful spire; it was built in 1824, by aid of a gift of £3000 and a loan of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 in 1822, from the same Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Sligo; the chapel is at Colga. That portion of Calry which is within the town of Sligo contains the barracks, county infirmary, fever hospital, dispensary, and union workhouse. The remains of antiquity consist of the Sod fort, which was defended by Sir Teague O'Regan against William III.; the ruins of some churches in Church and Cottage Islands; and what are supposed to be Druidical remains in Mr. Wynne's park at Hazlewood.

CALTRA, or CALTRAUGH, a village, in the parish of CASTLE-BLAKENEY, barony of TYQUINN, union of BALLINASLOE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 1 mile (E.) from Castle-Blakeney; containing 164 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Tuam to Ballinasloe; and has four fairs, which are held on May 14th, July 16th, Sept. 21st, and Dec. 14th.

CALVERSTOWN, a village, in the parish of DAVIDSTOWN, union of ATHY, barony of NARRAGH and RHEBAN EAST, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (N.) from Ballytorc. It is situated on the road from Dublin to Carlow, and has fairs on May 1st and Sept. 21st.

CALVES ISLANDS, in the parishes of KILCOE and SKULL, poor-law union of SKIRBEREN, barony of WEST CARRERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. W.) from Ballydeob. They are three in number, and are situated at the entrance to Roaring-water bay, off the harbour of Skull: the largest, called the Middle Calf, contains 78 statute acres; the second in size called the East Calf, contains 75 acres; and the third, called Leacerr, or the West Calf, 65 acres. There are two families in West Calf, and six in Middle Calf, which belong to the parish of Skull; and five families in East Calf, which forms part of the parish of Kilcoe. The islands are contiguous, lying in a line nearly east and west, about midway between Cape Clear and Long Island, and about 5 Irish or $6\frac{1}{2}$ British miles from the main land.

CAMLIN, or CRUMLIN, a parish, in the poor-law union of ANTRIM, barony of UPPER MASSARRENE, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Crumlin, 2157 inhabitants. This parish is situated on Lough Neagh, by which it is bounded on the west, and on the road from Antrim to Lurgan; it comprises 6417½ statute acres, of which 708½ form part of the lake. About three-fourths of the surface are good arable land, and the remainder is pasture. The system of husbandry is greatly improved, and the whole of the parish is in an excellent state of cultivation, and is well fenced, drained, and planted: wheat, which was scarcely raised in the district, has, since the establishment of large flour-mills at Crumlin, been extensively cultivated, and now forms the principal feature in the agriculture of the district. Independently of agricultural pursuits, several hundreds of the population are employed in weaving linens and cottons for the manufacturers of Belfast and its neighbourhood; here are likewise a flax and a flour mill. Fairs are held monthly for cattle and pigs, and of late very valuable horses have been also sold. Camlin is a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, and is part of the union of Glenavy; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Hertford. The tithe rent-charge is £146.5., of which £32. 8. 9. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the incumbent. The church is a fine ruin; it was destroyed by the army of James II., which had its depot here in 1689: in the north and south walls are series of sepulchral arches continued the entire length of the building, and nearly in a perfect state. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish forms part of the union or district of Glenavy. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the Remonstrant Synod. Dr. William Crawford, author of Remarks on Chesterfield's Letters, a History of Ireland, and other works; and Adam Crawford, Esq., M.D., author of an Experimental Essay on Animal Heat, and compiler of the Transactions of the Royal Society, were natives of Crumlin, which see.

CAMLOUGH, an ecclesiastical district, in the union of NEWRY, barony of UPPER ORION, county of ARMAUGH, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (W.) from Newry. This was anciently part of the O'Hanlons' country; and at the general plantation of Ulster, 1000 acres, or 12 townlands, with the manor of Maghernahely, were granted to Henry Mac Shane O'Nial for life, and after his death to Sir Toby Caulfield, who built an extensive bawn of stone and lime at Maghernahely, on the site of an ancient church. At Corrinchigo, in this district, Sir John Davis had at the same time a grant of 500 acres; but he neglecting to plant or tenant the allotment, it was resumed, and granted to Sir Oliver St. John: it is now the property of Viscount Mandeville. Camlough was formerly part of the extensive parish of Killevey, which, for ecclesiastical purposes, was divided into two parts in 1773. It is situated on the road from Newry to Newton-Hamilton, and on a lake called Cam Lough, or "the Crooked Lough;" and comprises 10,176 statute acres, of which 2415 are mountain and bog, and 144 lake and water. The greater portion of the land is remarkably good, and in an excellent state of cultivation. Much of the mountain land cannot be brought into cultivation, although in many places there is sufficient depth of soil for the growth of forest-trees. Near the village is the lake from which it derives its name, a fine sheet of water comprising 90 acres, a stream issuing from which flows in a northern direction to the Newry water, and gives motion to the machinery of several corn and flour, flax-spinning, and scutch mills, besides beetling-engines, spade manufactories, and bleach-greens. At Bessbrook is an extensive mill for spinning linen-yarn, worked by steam and water: this mill was destroyed by fire in 1839, and remained unoccupied until 1845, when it was purchased by the Messrs. Richardson, of Lishburn, and repaired. A new mill on a larger scale is now in course of erection, and when completed will be one of the finest in the north of Ireland. Here are also two extensive bleach-greens, but only the beetling-engines are at present employed. A receiving-house for letters, in the village, is in connexion with Newry: a fair is held on the third Monday in each month; and a constabulary police force has been stationed here. There are several handsome houses in the district.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Precentor of the cathedral of St. Patrick, Armagh: the curate's income is derived from the tithe rent-charge of five townlands, amounting to £109. 12. The church is a small edifice, with a tower and low spire, and is one of the numerous churches built by Primate Robinson; it was erected in 1774, but not consecrated till 1785: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £150 for its repair. The glebe-house is situated at Ballintemple, three miles from the church, on a glebe of 80 statute acres; it was built in 1805, the late Board of First Fruits granting £150. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is the head of a district, sometimes called Carrickcruppin, comprising Camlough and part of the parish of Killevey, and containing three chapels; two in Camlough, situated respectively at Carrickcruppin and Lisslea; and the third at Killevey. A school at Sturgan, under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, is endowed with £30 per annum, and with two acres of land and a residence for the master: a school at Corrinchigo was built, and is supported, by Lord Mandeville; and a handsome school-house has been erected in the village, in connexion with the National Board, aided by the noble proprietor, the Earl of Charlemont. In the townland of Aughnacloghmullan is an extraordinary cairn, 44 yards in length by 22 in breadth: it contains a chamber 19 yards long, divided into four compartments, and formed of upright stones about seven feet high, surmounted by very large stone slabs; the whole covered with loose stones and earth. The walls of the hewn erected by Sir Toby Caulfield remain almost entire, and exhibit many of the hewn stones of the ancient abbey of Killevey. A little eastward of these walls, stands the shaft of an elegant cross, the rest of which lies in a ditch. Some of the mullions of the windows of the abbey are to be seen in the walls at Divernagh; and an elegant silver medal has been found near its site. The Rev. H. Boyd, translator of Dante's Divina Comedia, was perpetual curate of this parish.

CAMMA, or CAM, a parish, in the union and barony of ATHLONE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 8 miles (W. N. W.) from Athlone, containing 3830 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Athlone to Mount-Talbot, and comprises 12,403½ statute acres, chiefly under tillage; there are about 648 acres of bog, but no waste land; the system of husbandry is improving. Limestone is quarried for agriculture and other uses. Camma is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and is part of the union of Kiltoom; the rectory is impropriate in the Incorporated Society. The tithe rent-charge is £146. 5., of which £63. 15. are payable to the improprators, and the remainder to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions Camma is the head of a district including also the parish of Kiltoom; there is a chapel at Curragoy, and also one in the parish of Kiltoom. Only the ruins of the parish church, with a burial-ground, remain; and there are some ruins of the old castle of Curragoy, built by the Dillons, near which are several raths or forts.

CAMOLIN, a village, in the parish of TOMB, union of GOREY, barony of SCARAWALSH, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 20½ miles (N.) from Wexford, and 53½ (S.) from Dublin; containing 561 inhabitants. This place derives its name from a religious house, founded, according to Alban Butler, by St. Molin, second bishop of Ferns, who died in the 7th century, and of which there are still some remains on the Mountorris estate. It is situated on the river Bann, on the mail-coach road from Gorey to Wexford, and contains about 100 houses. A constabulary police force is stationed here, and fairs for cattle and pigs are held on Feb. 9th, April 4th, June 9th (which is the principal fair), Aug. 9th, Sept. 28th, and Nov. 9th. The parish church of Tomb, and the Roman Catholic chapel of the district of Camolin, are situated in the village; and there is a dispensary.—See TOMB.

CAMUS-JUXTA-BANN.—See MACOSQUIN.

CAMUS-JUXTA-MOURNE, a parish, in the union and barony of STRABANE, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER; containing, with part of the town of Strabane, 6039 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the old road from Dublin to Londonderry, and on the river Mourne, comprises 7505½ statute acres; 103½ are water, about 4540 are arable and pasture land, and the remainder mountain and bog. The land, although in some places rocky, is generally very fertile, producing abundant crops, particularly in the vale of Mourne. The inhabitants combine the weaving of linen with their agricultural pursuits. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £351. The church is in the town, and is a large and handsome edifice, for the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £184: it was originally built as a chapel for the then new town of Strabane, by the Earl of Abercorn, in 1619, and has been used as the parish church since the destruction of the mother church. The glebe-house was built in 1835, by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £800 from the Board of First Fruits, upon the townland of Bearney, which constitutes the glebe, comprising 566 statute acres; it is more than three miles from the church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Clonleigh and Camus, and comprising both those parishes: there are two chapels in the union, of which that of Camus, in the town of Strabane, is a large plain edifice. There are likewise a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and places of worship for Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists. The parochial school, on the glebe of Bearney, is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, and the master has a rent-free residence and two acres of land. At Milltown is a school for boys and girls, erected by the Marquess of Abercorn, a handsome building with a separate residence for the master and mistress, each of whom receives £20 a year from the marquess, who also aids a school established at Edmore. There is also a school at Strabane, for which a house was erected through the exertions of the rector, the Rev. James Smith. Near Milltown school are the dispensary and fever hospital belonging to Strabane; they are large and well ventilated buildings, admirably arranged for their purposes. The ruins of the old parish church are situated on the banks of the Mourne; it was founded by St. Colgan in 586, and destroyed during the insurrection of 1641.—See STRABANE.

CANICE, ST.—See KILKENNY.

CANNAWAY, or CANNABOY, a parish, in the union of MACROOM, barony of EAST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 1547 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the south side of the river Lee, and is connected with the parish of Ahinagh by the ancient bridge of Carrigadrohid: it comprises 5245 statute acres. There are about 300 acres of woodland, 100 of bog, and a good deal of rocky waste; the remainder is almost equally divided between pasture and arable land, the latter producing good crops. Here are some dairy-farms, the butter from which is sent to Cork market. At Barnateampul is a small turf bog, which supplies the inhabitants with fuel. The river here flows with great rapidity, particularly after heavy rains, when it inundates the adjacent country to a considerable distance: the scenery presents an alternation of rock and meadow, the latter receding into small deep glens covered with wood, which produce a very pleasing effect. Petty-sessions are held at Shandangan every alternate Wednesday. The living is a vicarage and partly a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the remainder of the rectory is part of the union of Kilcoan and corps of the prebend of Killaspigmillane in the cathedral of St. Finbarr, Cork. The tithe rent-charge is £300. 5., of which £41. 5. are payable to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a plain building with a square tower, on a hill about a mile and a half west of Killinardrish; its erection was aided by a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1814. There is no glebe-house, but a glebe of about four acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Kilmurphy; there is a neat chapel at Barnateampul. The male and female parochial school is chiefly supported by the vicar, as is also the Sunday school.—See KILLINARDRISH.

CANON ISLAND, or INNISNEGANAGH, an island, in the parish of KILDYSART, union of KILRUSH, barony of CLONDERLAW, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Kildysart: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated at the confluence of the Shannon and Fergus, about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile from the main land, and comprises 271 statute acres of an excellent soil, partly under tillage, the seaweed collected on its shores being used as manure. It was anciently called Elnagranoch; and here Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, in the 12th century, founded or rebuilt a priory for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine. A moiety of the priory, with the various lands, tithes, profits, and demesne lands thereof, was granted in fee, in 1605, to Donogh, Earl of Thomond, and was afterwards granted in fee, or confirmed, to his successor Henry, in 1661. The ruins, which are locally called Tobhernamastragh, are at the north-eastern extremity of the island, and consist of a square tower and a considerable portion of the body of the building, which is said to have covered a quarter of an acre.

CAPE CLEAR ISLAND, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, Eastern Division of the barony of WEST CARBERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 16 miles (S. by W.) from Skibberreen; containing 1052 inhabitants. This island, called by the Irish Innisk Dharney, and in ecclesiastical records Insula Sanctæ Clare, may be regarded, though it is at a much greater distance from the main land, as the principal of a large cluster of islands in the Atlantic Ocean, lying off the coast of Carbery, and situated between Dundedy Head and Brow Head, which latter was the Notium of Ptolemy. It is separated from the main land by the sound of Gaskenane, in which is always a strong tide, and in high winds a very heavy sea; and having, consequently, less intercourse with it than the islands nearer the coast, the native inhabitants retain more of their original manners, language, and customs. The island, which is now the property of Sir William Wrixon Becher, Bart., is three miles in length and one mile and a half in breadth, and comprises 1506 statute acres. The soil is shallow, and would be unproductive but for a careful system of cultivation, performed by the women, and wholly with the spade: the chief crops are oats and potatoes; but the quantities raised in some seasons are inadequate to the supply of the inhabitants. The manure is sand and seaweed, which the women collect upon the strand, and carry on their backs up the steep and dangerous cliffs surrounding the island, which is accessible only by two small harbours that nearly intersect it from north to south. The chief supply of fuel is brought from the main land, as the island itself affords none, except what is made of a black mud found near the western lake, and haked during the summer; the inhabitants suffer extreme privations in winter from the scarcity of fuel. Flax is grown in some parts, and spun into yarn, and coarse woollen-cloths are manufactured, for domestic use: these, instead of being thickened by mills, are put into pools of water, and trampled by the younger and more active females. All the more elevated parts of the island are of the schistus formation, but in several parts, near the level of the sea, good freestone is found in abundance.

The scenery is extremely wild and romantic, particularly on the south side of the island, where it presents to the Atlantic a steep and inaccessible cliff. At the south-west point of the isle, overhanging the sea, and approachable only by a dangerous pathway not more than three feet in breadth, are the ruins of Dunanore Castle, or the "Golden Fort," which, from its distance from all the landing places, would appear to have been built more for the purpose of a safe retreat in case of invasion, than for the defence of the shores. The view from the battlements is very extensive, and embraces a great variety of objects of a bold and imposing character. In the south-western part of the isle are also three fresh-water lakes, one of them called Lough Erral, the water of which has a saponaceous and powerfully detergent quality, cleansing in a short time any vessel that may be thrown into it; this water, which is used for washing and for cleaning flax, has been analysed by Dr. Rutty, and found to contain a portion of natron, to which he attributes its cleansing properties. There is also a lake near the western coast, remarkable for the number and size of its eels; and there are numerous springs of excellent fresh water in several parts. The men are wholly employed in fishing, for which the island is admirably adapted: they leave home every Monday or Tuesday morning during the summer season, and return on Friday evening or Saturday morning. Their fishing craft and tackle were much improved upon the establishment of the late Fishery Board; they now go out to sea in hookers, or half-decked vessels, to the distance of 20 or 30 leagues. On their return, the fish are given to the women to cure, and the men generally spend their time in leisure and recreation till the day of their departure next. The fish, when cured, are sold to retail merchants who visit the island for that purpose; and should any remain unsold, they are sent to the Cork market. The men are expert and resolute seamen, and the best pilots on the coast; they are remarkable for discerning land at a distance in snowy or foggy weather, possess uncommon sagacity in discovering the approach of bad weather, and are exceedingly skilful in the management of their vessels. The inhabitants of the isle seldom leave home unless to sell their fish, or to supply themselves with necessaries from the main land. The cattle and sheep are very small, and there are only four horses: the wool is exceedingly fine, which is attributable to the pasturage, as sheep brought in from the main land produce in a short time a fleece of excellent quality. A good harbour was formed, and a neat pier constructed, on the south side of the island, at the joint expense of Sir W. W. Becher and the late Fishery Board.

Cape Clear is well known to mariners as a conspicuous landmark. On the south side of the isle is a lighthouse, erected by the corporation for improving the port of Dublin : it exhibits a bright revolving light of 21 lamps, seven of which become visible every two minutes ; the lantern has an elevation of 480 feet above the level of the sea, and in clear weather the light may be seen from all points at a distance of 28 nautical miles. Adjoining the lighthouse is a signal tower, erected after the attempt of the French to land at Bantry bay, and purchased by the above corporation. On the north side of the island, and about a quarter of a mile from the shore, vessels may anchor in moderate weather. About four miles west from Cape Clear is Fastnet rock, famous for the quantities of ling, hake, &c., taken near it. According to the census of 1841, there were 207 houses in the parish, occupied by 211 families : the houses are mostly built of stone, but, from the unsheltered situation of the island, are exposed to every raging blast ; and the inhabitants are obliged to secure the thatch on the roofs by an interwoven covering of netting or matting kept down by heavy stones. There is a coast-guard station on the island.

It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, and is part of the union of Kilcoe ; the rectory is inappropriate in Sir W. W. Becher. The tithe rent-charge is £25. 10., one-half payable to the impropriator and one-half to the vicar. There is now neither church nor glebe-house ; divine service is occasionally performed in the tower of the lighthouse. The glebe, on which are the ruins of an ancient church, comprises 25a. 3r. 26p. In the Roman Catholic divisions this island is the head of a district, comprising also the island of Innisberkin, and containing in each a chapel ; the chapel here is a small thatched building. Not far from the harbour are the ruins of St. Kieran's church ; on the shore is an old stone with a cross rudely sculptured on it, and at a short distance a holy well. Till about the year 1710, the islanders had a resident king chosen by and from among themselves, and an ancient code of laws handed down by tradition, which it was his duty to administer ; and though the king had neither funds for the maintenance of his dignity, nor officers to enforce his authority, the people generally submitted to these laws, and were always ready to carry his judgments into execution. The greater number of the laws are become obsolete, but some still remain and are enforced with rigour. The island was formerly remarkable for a race of men of extraordinary stature and strength, whose feats are the subject of many interesting narratives. The O'Driscolls, several of whom were kings of the island, were the most celebrated ; they had large possessions, and held five or six castles in different parts of the country, which were all forfeited in the insurrection of 1601, after which they emigrated to Spain, leaving behind them only their dependants, whose posterity have long since mingled with the peasantry.

CAPELL, or CABLE, ISLAND, in the parish of KILMACDONOUGH, union of MIDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S.) from Youghal. This island, which is uninhabited, lies at the entrance to Youghal bay, off Ring Point, in lat. 51° 53' 30" and lon. 7° 51' 30". Being high and precipitous, it is difficult of access, except in calm weather ; its south-western side has been much excavated by the waves, and at the base of some of the cliffs are huge detached masses of rock. It contains about 30 acres of excellent pasturage for sheep. Its elevation and central position point it out as an admirable site for a lighthouse, which would be of great benefit to vessels entering Youghal bay, and to the trade of Cork harbour. On this island the Capella, or Supples, as they are called in Irish, are said to have landed at the period of the first English invasion ; and from them it takes its name. It is laid down in most charts and maps as Cable Island ; but so early as the reign of Richard III., and frequently since, it is mentioned in the charters of Youghal as Capell Island, having been made one of the boundaries of the admiralty jurisdiction and the port of Youghal, as well by land as by water.

CAPPACLOUGH, a village, in the parish of KILGOBIN, union of TRALEE, barony of CORRAGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, about 9 miles (W. S. W.) from Tralee ; containing 277 inhabitants. It is situated on the original road from Tralee to Dingle, and contains the ruins of the old Roman Catholic chapel which gives name to the parochial district ; a new chapel has been built near the village, at Camp, where are also the ruins of a castle.

CAPPAGH, or CAPPA, a parish, in the union of RATHKEALE, Shanid Division of the barony of LOWER CONNELLO, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W.) from Adare ; containing 655 inhabitants, of whom 108 are in the village. This parish is situated on the road from Adare to Shanagolden, and comprises 1268 statute acres. The soil in some parts is good, but a great portion is stony, and in several places the limestone rock rises above the surface ; on the border of the parish, next to Rathkeale, are some exhausted bogs. The village is a station of the constabulary police. Cappagh is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and is part of the union of St. Mary and corps of the deanery of Limerick : the tithe rent-charge is £71. 5. The church is in ruins, and there is no glebe-house, but a glebe comprising above eight acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Stonehall and Cappagh ; the chapel is a large plain thatched edifice. Near Cappagh House are the ruins of Cappagh Castle, built by Dermot Mac Einery in the reign of King John, and which, having fallen into the hands of the Geraldines, shared the fate of their numerous other castles, being confiscated for the rebellion of the family against Queen Elizabeth ; it stands on an artificial mound, and the ruins are 90 feet high, and form an interesting feature of the landscape.

CAPPAGH, a parish, partly in the barony of OMAGH, but chiefly in that of STRABANE, union of OMAGH, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Omagh ; containing, with the district parish of Mountfield, 13,330 inhabitants. This parish comprises 37,670½ statute acres, of which 34,62½ are in Strabane, and 3043½ in Omagh. The greater part is reclaimed bog or mountain, and about 1500 acres are woodland : in some places the land is remarkably good, particularly in the eastern portion of the parish ; but not more than one-fourth of the whole is cultivated. Part of the mountains of Bessy Bell, Mary Gray, and Mullaghcairn are in this parish, and afford pasturage for cattle to their very summits. The inhabitants combine with agricultural pursuits the spinning of flax and weaving of linen. There is abundance of freestone, with limestone of inferior quality, and several indications of coal are met with. Gortin gap, through which a road runs from Omagh to Gortin, is a deep ravine stretching in a northern and southern direction through Mullaghcairn or Cairntogher, which is the highest mountain within the county, being 1778 feet above the level of the sea. There are several excellent houses in the parish. The improvements made during the last 70 years are very extensive; Lord Mountjoy commenced planting the demesne of Rash, now called Mountjoy Forest, in 1780, and much of the timber is large and promising. The late Sir W. McMahon built a very handsome house, surrounded by plantations, at Facary; and laid out a town at Mountfield. A new road, also, has been opened through the parish, direct from Omagh to Belfast.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £750. The church is a large and handsome edifice in the Grecian style, with a lofty and beautiful octagonal spire; it was erected, in the demesne since named Mountjoy Forest, in 1768, at the sole expense of Dr. Gibson, then rector. The glebe-house has been rebuilt upon an enlarged scale: the glebe consists of 573 acres about half a mile from the church, and of two other portions containing 999 acres; making a total of 1572 acres, 410 of which are under cultivation. There is a chapel of ease at Mountfield, four miles from the church; it is a small but very beautiful edifice with a lofty spire, standing on the south side of a high mountain, and was built at an expense of £1000 by the Board of First Fruits, in 1828: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £25 per annum from Primate Boulter's fund, and in the gift of the Rector. Divine service is also performed, every second Sunday, in the school-houses of Calkill, Carrigan, Castletown, Tascru, and Mayne. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has two chapels, one at Knockmoyle, the other at Killyelagher. There are places of worship for Baptists and for Presbyterians of the General Assembly. The male and female parochial schools are situated on the glebe, and are supported by the rector, who has given the master a house and three acres of land. Mountfield male and female schools were originally supported by the late Sir W. McMahon. A school at Knockmoyle was founded under the will of John McEvoy, who endowed it with £16 per annum for the gratuitous education of the poor children in Mountjoy Forest, and vested its management in the rector for ever. There are several other schools. The ruins of the old church are scarcely discernible, but the cemetery is still much used: some forts are to be seen on Mary Gray mountain, close to each other.

CAPPAGHWHITE, a village, in the parish of Toom, union of TIPPERARY, barony of KILNERMANAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Tipperary; containing 1046 inhabitants. This place, which has been much improved within the last forty years, and contains 175 houses, is situated on the new line of road from Tipperary to Nenagh. It has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Tipperary, and is a constabulary police station; fairs are held on June 4th, July 27th, Sept. 29th, Nov. 16th, and Dec. 21st; and there are a Roman Catholic chapel and a dispensary. Five hundred acres of land near the village were, about sixteen years since, leased by Colonel Purefoy to the Mining Company of Ireland, who, after incurring some expense in searching for copper, relinquished the enterprise.

CAPPAMORE, or TUORAGH, a village, partly in the parish of DOON, and partly in that of TUORAGH, barony of OWNKEYBG, union and county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (S. E.) from Limerick; containing 551 inhabitants. This village is situated near the banks of the small river Mulcairn, over which is a handsome stone bridge, and on the road from Limerick to Templemore; it consists chiefly of two irregularly built streets, and has 104 houses. Fairs are held on April 30th, July 1st, Sept. 20th, and Dec. 13th, for cattle and pigs. A spacious chapel was lately built for the Roman Catholic district of Cappamore, which includes the parish of Tuoragh and part of the parishes of Doon and Abington.

CAPPANACROSS, or CAPPANACUSH, the chief of a group of islands of that name, in the parish of TEMPLENOKE, union of KENMARE, barony of DUNKERRON, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, about 3 miles (S.W. by W.) from Kenmare: the population is included in the return for the parish. It is situated in the river Kenmare, and consists entirely of limestone rock, in some places approaching to a grey marble, and said to have been formerly worked by Sir William Petty, ancestor of the Marquess of Lansdowne. About a British mile west of the island are the Roanacarrig rocks, so called from the number of seals that frequent them.

CAPPOG, or KIPPOGUE, a parish, in the poor-law union of ARDEE, barony of ARUE, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (N.) from Duleer; containing 568 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Drogheda to Dundalk, and comprises 1283½ statute acres, partly pasture but chiefly arable land. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and constitutes part of the union of Duleer: the tithe rent-charge is £95. 13. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is also part of the union or district of Duleer.

CAPPOQUIN, a post-town, in the parish and union of LISMORE, barony of COSHMORE, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 30½ miles (W.S.W.) from Waterford, and 106½ (S.W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 2341 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, and had anciently a castle, supposed to have been erected by the Fitzgerald family, but at what period is unknown. In the war of 1641, this castle was garrisoned by the Earl of Cork; and in 1642, Lord Broghill, on his return from the relief of Knockmoone with about 60 horse and 140 foot, defeated a party of the insurgents who were strongly posted in its vicinity, and, with the loss of only one man of his own force, killed 300 of them and two of their captains. In July, 1643, General Purcell, having assembled his army at this place to besiege Lismore, ravaged the surrounding country; and, in 1645, the castle was taken by Lord Castlehaven after an obstinate defence. The Earl of Cork built a bridge over the river Blackwater at this place, and in the 17th and 18th of Charles II., an act was passed for building a new bridge. The town is pleasantly situated on the northern bank of the river, in the angle from which it takes its course southerly to Youghal; and on the coach-road from Waterford, through Youghal, to Cork. The navigation is continued by a canal to Lismore; and several new roads have been formed on the best levels, diverging from the town, and opening an improved communication with the adjoining counties. A road has also been constructed along the western bank of the river to Youghal; and it is intended to take down the present bridge, which is a light structure of wood, and replace it with a substantial building of stone. The surrounding country is finely diversified, and abounds with highly picturesque scenery. Near the town is the seat of Sir R. Keane, Bart., a handsome mansion of hewn stone, situated in a richly improved and well planted demesne, commanding a fine view of Dromana and the river Blackwater. Fairs are held in the town on March 17th, May 31st, July 5th, Sept. 20th, and Oct. 29th. A constabulary police force has been stationed here, and petty-sessions are held once a fortnight.

The church of Cappoquin, which is a chapel of ease to the church of Lismore, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles distant, is a neat edifice with a spire; and near it is a Roman Catholic chapel. There is a school under the Cork Society for supporting Schools in Munster, for which a neat school-house of stone has been erected, at an expense of £250; and a dispensary is supported. At Mount Melleray, near the town, is the abbey of St. Bernard la Trappe, recently erected in the midst of a large mountainous tract, previously a barren wild, granted for that purpose to the society on very liberal terms by Sir R. Keane. The monastery incloses a quadrangular area, on three sides of which are ranges of building 162 feet in length, 30 feet broad, and 32 feet high, containing a dormitory, kitchen, chapter-room, sacristy, and other apartments; on the fourth side is the church of the monastery, 185 feet in length, 30 feet wide in the nave, 52 feet in the transept, and 50 feet high, with a tower surmounted by a spire of wood sheathed with copper painted to imitate stone, 140 feet high from the ground. Great improvements have been made in the land; 120 acres of the mountain have been reclaimed; and fencing, draining, and the making of roads have been extensively carried on: about eight acres have been inclosed for a kitchen garden, producing excellent vegetables; and more than 30,000 trees have been planted, most of which are flourishing. The monks have opened a school for the poor of the neighbourhood.

CARAGH, or CAROGH, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of CLANE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (N.W.) from Naas; containing 921 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which is sometimes written Kerogh, comprises 3733 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, and is situated on the river Liffey, and on the turnpike-road from Naas to Edenderry. The soil is fertile; the land is chiefly in the occupation of private gentlemen, and is in a state of excellent cultivation. Clover, turnips, and other green crops are raised with success, and the potatoes are all drilled; there is no bog in the parish, but fuel is obtained in abundance from bogs in the immediate vicinity. Donore, a spacious mansion, was built by the late Walter Hussey, Esq., who afterwards took the name of Burgh, and was appointed chief baron of the Irish exchequer. On the river are the Yeomanstown mills, capable of manufacturing from 6000 to 7000 barrels of flour annually. The living consists of a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare: the rectory is united to the vicarage of Naas; the vicarage was episcopally united, in 1764, to the entire rectory of Bridechurch and the vicarage of Downings, together forming the union of Caragh, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £153. 15., of which two-thirds are payable to the rector, and one-third to the vicar. The church was erected in 1842, by aid of a grant of £900 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: divine service had been previously performed in a house at Downings, licensed by the bishop. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, including also the parishes of Downings and Ladytown: the chapel of Caragh is a neat modern edifice, near the site of the old parish church; there is also a chapel at Prosperous.

CARBERRY, an island, in the parish of SAULL, union of SKIBBEREEN, Western Division of the barony of WEST CARBERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 16 miles (S.W.) from Bantry. This island is situated in Dunmanns bay, and comprises only six acres of land: it is very little frequented, although large ships may ride in summer on good ground any where above it, and there is excellent anchorage to the west of the island.

CARBERRY, or CASTLE-CARBERRY, a parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, barony of CARBERRY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.N.E.) from Edenderry; containing 754 inhabitants, of whom about 160 are in the village. This place derives its name from an ancient castle, of which there are some remains situated on a lofty isolated hill, and which was, early in the 14th century, a seat of the Bermingham family, of whom Sir William Bermingham, Knt., was created Baron of Carbery in 1541. It was afterwards the property of the family of Colley or Cowley, ancestors of the present noble family of Wellesley; and in 1783, Arthur Pomeroy, Esq., having married an heiress of that house, obtained the title of Lord Harberton of Carbery: he was subsequently created Viscount Harberton. The parish comprises 4796 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, and is situated at the north-western extremity of the county, on the confines of the King's county, and on the verge of the Bog of Allen, which is here bounded by abrupt eminences of limestone: the greater portion of the land is arable, and some of the farms are wholly under tillage. Within the parish is the source of the river Boyne. Newberry, the former seat of Viscount Harberton, is in the immediate vicinity of the village. The village consists of 27 dwellings; it is a constabulary police station; and fairs are held on May 26th and Oct. 2nd. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, united to those of Nurney, Ballynadrimma, Cadamstown, Dunforth, Mylerstown, Ardkill, and Carrick, together forming the union of Castle-Carbery, in the alternate patronage of Lord Harberton and the Hon. George Colley: the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Downshire. The tithe rent-charge of Carbery is £100. 10., of which £67 are payable to the marquess, and the remainder to the vicar; the rent-charge of the whole vicarial union is £227. 15. 3. The church, built in 1772, is a neat plain edifice, with a square tower. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres in several detached portions. In the Roman Catholic divisions, this parish is partly in the union or district of Ballina, and partly the head of a union comprising also the parishes of Dunforth, Ardkill, and Kilmore, in which are two chapels, one here and one at Dunforth. The ruins of the castle consist chiefly of a square pile of building with tall chimneys.

CARDANGAN, or CURDANGAN, a parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, union and county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with part of the town of Tipperary, 3089 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 3906 statute acres, is situated on the road from Tipperary to the glen of Aherlow, and extends into a plain which for its fertility and beauty is called the Golden Vale: it contains some of the richest land in Ireland. Cardangan is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, and was part of the late union and corps of the prebend of Lattin in the cathedral of Emly; the rectory is inappropriate in William Moore, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £115. 6., of which £76. 17. 6. are payable to the impropriator. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is still part of the union or district of Lattin.

CARENTEEL, county TYRONE.—See CARRENTIEL.

CARGAN, or CARRIGIN, a parish, in the barony of CLARE, union of TUAM, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Headford, and on the eastern shore of Lough Corrib; containing 1369 inhabitants. It comprises 3609 statute acres. Agriculture is here much improved, vast quantities of sea-weed for manure being brought up the lake from Galway; and many of the cottages are of a superior description: there are good marble and limestone quarries, and a considerable extent of waste land and bog, partly reclaimable. Cargan is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and is part of the union of Headford: the tithe rent-charge is £77. 13., and is equally divided between Sir G. T. Staunton, Bart., and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish forms part of the union or district of Headford. Sir George Leonard Staunton, secretary to the British embassy to China in 1793, of which he published an account, was a native of this place. Some battle-axes and javelins were found within the limits of the parish a few years since; and there are still some remains of an ancient castle and church.

CARGINS, or CARRAGANS, a district, in the union of DUNDALK, barony of UPPER ORIOR, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (N. W.) from Dundalk; containing about 355 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Newtown-Hamilton to Dundalk, and in the midst of a mountainous district. It comprises 503 acres: more than 100 are mountain, half of which is barren rock; the land in cultivation is of a light friable nature, producing good crops.

CARIG, in the barony of SHELMALIER WEST, county of WEXFORD.—See CARRIGG.

CARLANSTOWN, a village, in the parish of KILBEG, union of KELLS, barony of LOWER KELLS, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Kells; containing 282 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Bailieborough to Duhlin, by Navan, and comprises 48 houses. Fairs are held on March 12th, May 1st, Aug. 6th, and Nov. 19th; the last of these fairs is for fat-cattle, and is considered the largest and best of the kind in the county.—See the article on KILBEG.

CARLINGFORD, a sea-port, market, and post town, a parish, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the union of DUNDALK, barony of LOWER DUNDALK, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Dundalk, and $59\frac{1}{2}$ (N.) from Dublin; containing 13,549 inhabitants, of whom 1110 are in the town. This town appears to have originated in the erection of a castle, either by De Lacy or De Courcy, by order of King John, in 1210; but is mentioned by some authorities as the place where St. Patrick, in 432, effected his second landing; and the ferry of Carlingford was given by Sir John de Courcy, in the year 1184, to the abbey of Downpatrick. The town, which gradually rose in the neighbourhood of the castle, seems to have consisted chiefly of castellated buildings, arising from its situation on the frontier of the pale. In 1301, Matilda de Lacy, widow of David, Baron of Naas, granted the advowson of the church to the priory of Kilmainham; and in 1305, Richard de Burgo, Earl of Ulster, founded a monastery for Dominicans here, dedicated to St. Malachy. Edward III., in 1358, granted to his son, Lionel, Earl of Ulster, license to hold a weekly market on Thursday, and a yearly fair for six days. In 1404, the manor of Carlingford and town of Irish-Grange, which had previously belonged to the abbey and convent of Newry, vested by forfeiture in the king, who granted them in fee to Richard Selgrave. A mint was established here in 1467, by act of parliament; and in 1495 it was enacted that Englishmen only should be constables of the castle. In 1596, Henry Oge, son-in-law of the Earl of Tyrone, notwithstanding the submission made and pledges given by that nobleman to Queen Elizabeth, attempted to surprise the castle, but was defeated. Sir Henry Tichbourne took possession of the town in 1642, not, however, before it had suffered much injury by fire, from the adherents of Sir Phelim O'Neill. In 1649, Lord Inchiquin, after taking Dundalk, marched to this place, and compelled the castle, with other neighbouring fortresses, to surrender; but in the following year it was delivered up to Sir Charles Coote and Colonel Venables. A party of the forces of James II., in 1689, set fire to the town, in their retreat before the army of Duke Schomberg, who, in consequence, issued a proclamation threatening that, if such conduct were repeated, he should give no quarter. During the duke's encampment at Dundalk, and while disease was spreading through his forces, the sick were removed into Carlingford, until they became too numerous to be accommodated.

The town is beautifully situated on the south-west side of the spacious lough or bay to which it gives name, and immediately at the base of an extensive range of mountains which terminates at this point. It consists of 270 houses, and, though small, has an interesting appearance, from the venerable ruins of its castle and abbey; it has a sub-post office to Newry. The scenery of the bay is remarkably fine: the Morne mountains, on the opposite side, are beautifully varied with rocks, woods, heath, and verdure; and in the foreground, the shores are enlivened with neat cottages and numerous bathing-lodges. Carlingford mountain, which overhangs the castle, attains an elevation of 1935 feet above the level of the sea: from its height and position it intercepts, during a great part of the summer, the direct rays of the sun, for several hours before sunset. The oysters found in the bay are highly esteemed, and are sent in considerable quantity to Liverpool and other places. There is some trade in grain; great quantities of herrings are caught during the season; and fishing-nets are made. The port has also some trade with Dublin, to which it sends cargoes of potatoes; and coal is imported from Scotland and Whitehaven. The bay, one of the finest natural havens on the coast, is eight miles in length and about four in breadth, extending inland in a north-western direction to Warren Point. The tide flows past the town to the port of Newry, and the harbour is accessible to large vessels at spring tides, but near the month the navigation is rendered rather hazardous by shoals and sunken rocks. A lighthouse at Cranfield Point on the northern side of the bay has been removed, and one, showing a bright fixed light, has been erected in its stead on Hawlbowl rock: at half-tide it shows, at night, an additional light halfway up the building; in the day, a black ball is hoisted on the top of a pole, 10 or 12 feet above the lantern, and in thick or foggy weather a bell is kept continually tolling by clock-work. On Greenore Point, also, a small lighthouse with a revolving light has been erected. The harbour dues are collected in the name of the Marquess of Anglesey, as lord of the manor and admiral of Carlingford bay; they are leased for £30 per annum. The market is on Saturday; fairs are held on the first Saturday in each month, and there is also one on Sept. 29th. There are a coast-guard and a chief constabulary police station in the town; also coast-guard stations at Cooley Point, Greenore Point, and O'Meath.

This is a borough of very great antiquity, probably by prescription. A corporation is recognised so early as 1326, when the king granted to the bailiffs of "Karl-yngford" a charter for levying murage for six years, to inclose the town with a stone wall. By patent dated the 13th of March, 1409, Henry IV., on the petition of the corporation, representing that the town had been often burned and wasted by the Irish and Scotch, acquitted them of all subsidies, tollages, &c., for several years; and for the same reason, customs were granted to them, for 24 years from 1501, towards fortifying the town with a stone wall. Queen Elizabeth bestowed by charter, in 1571, extensive privileges and immunities. The late governing charter, dated the 9th of August, 17th of James I. (1619), created a sovereign, 12 burgesses, and a commonalty of six, giving them authority over the whole of Carlingford and its liberties, with the exception of the castle of Arthur Bagenal, lord of the manor and its appurtenances. This charter, now no longer in force, declared that the corporation should be styled the "Sovereign, Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town and Borough of Carlingford," and should consist of a sovereign, twelve burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen; two sergeants-at-mace and a coroner, a clerk of the market, and clerk of the entries, were also to be appointed. The sovereign, previously to the late dissolution of the corporation, was elected by and from among the burgesses, on Sept. 29th, and was a justice of the peace within the borough; he had the power of appointing a deputy, subject to the approbation of the burgesses. The burgesses were elected out of the commonalty, for life, by the existing burgesses, and in conjunction with the sovereign possessed the power of admitting freemen and appointing corporation officers. As the admission of freemen, however, was optional with them, none had been admitted since 1754. By the act 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108, the corporation was dissolved, and any property it possessed became vested in the guardians of the poor of the union of Dundalk. The sovereign and burgesses returned two members to the Irish parliament prior to the Union, when the £15,000 paid as compensation for the loss of the franchise were divided equally between the Marquess of Downshire and the guardians of Mr. Ross Balfour Moore. The limits of the borough are reputed to extend about 2 miles on the north, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile on the south, side of the town, along the sea-shore, and from the top of a ridge of mountains rising immediately behind it to the shore of the bay. A borough and a manor court, formerly held here, have been discontinued; and the borough gaol, called "the Blackhole," under the Tholsel, has been disused for many years. Petty-sessions are held on alternate Saturdays. The late corporation had no property, except what they were entitled to in commons belonging to the town, which, according to the Down survey, contained 1231 acres; and the only officer latterly appointed was the sovereign.

The parish comprises 20,049 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which 65 $\frac{1}{2}$ are water. The commonage extends along the side of a mountain, some part of which is inclosed, and on which the poor of the neighbourhood graze their cattle: the land in Cooley is of very superior quality, and under a good system of tillage. There is no bog, and fuel is consequently scarce. Near the town are some extensive limestone quarries, the produce of which is principally sent northward. Nooka Lodge, in the parish, commands a fine view of the sea and the Morne mountains. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Archbishop, to whom the rectorial tithes are appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £342. 15s., of which £114. 5s. are paid to the archbishop, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a modern building, with the exception of the tower. A house was purchased for the incumbent, and improved by means of a loan of £750 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1813; the glebe comprises 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. A church and glebe-house were built in 1838, in the district of O'Meath, 5 miles north of Carlingford, at a cost, with a school-house, of £2000, raised by subscription, aided by a grant of £300 from the Church Building Society and £200 from the Board of Erasmus Smith's Fund: the trustees of this church have the nomination to the living, a perpetual curacy, subject to the approval of the Lord Primate. In 1838, also, a chapel of ease was built at Rathcor, 3 miles south of the town, at the expense, with a school-house, of upwards of £500, raised by subscription. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms the two districts of Carlingford and Cooley, comprising four chapels, those of Carlingford and O'Meath in the former, and of Grange and Mullanay in the latter: the chapels of Carlingford and Grange are neat buildings; that at O'Meath was built on a plot of ground given by the Marquess of Anglesey, who likewise contributed £30 towards the expense. There is also, in the town, a place of worship for Presbyterians of the Remonstrant Synod. The parish contains several schools: a considerable sum was lately contributed by Alexander Hamilton, Esq., towards the erection of a school-house, which has been built on a piece of ground belonging to the Lord Primate, and is under the superintendence of the curate. Here is also a dispensary.

The remains of the Dominican Monastery consist principally of the walls of the conventual church, with a square tower supported on lofty pointed arches, and separating the nave from the chancel; at the west end of the nave are two turrets, connected by a battlement, and on the south is a small detached ruin, probably a chapel. These ruins, which are situated at the extremity of the town farthest from the castle, are overgrown with ivy, and have a very interesting and romantic appearance. On the summit of a neighbouring hill, at Ruskey, are the small remains of a church, or chapel, with traces of a burial-ground, but no monuments or even graves: it is thought by some to have been a rural residence of the abbot. About halfway between the abbey and the castle are the ruins of a square building, with windows of an ecclesiastical character, curiously ornamented with sculpture of animals, human heads, and foliage. The remains of the castle, called King John's Castle, shew it to have been an irregular pile, nearly in the form of a horseshoe: the walls in some parts are eleven feet thick, and some of the salient points are defended by loophole abutments; it is washed by the sea on the eastern side, and on the land side there is a narrow pass overhung by wild and lofty mountains. The castle seems to have been erected to command this pass, and it inclosed various baroucai halls and apartments, and a courtyard surrounded with galleries: the chief entrance is on the side next the sea, from a platform, on which was apparently a battery for the defence of the harbour. The pass is only wide enough to allow a very small number of men to walk abreast: on one side of it the mountain rises abruptly, and on the other are dangerous precipices with the sea below. At Templetown are the ruins of an ancient church, with a burial-ground attached; near which are the remains of the castle of Ballug, a square pile of building with very thick walls, defended at the opposite angles by square turrets; the lower part has been converted into stables, and the upper into corn-lofts. Carlingford formerly gave the title of Earl to the family of Taafe, which becoming extinct on the death of Theobald, the 4th earl, in 1738, George III. in 1761 conferred the title of Viscount Carlingford on the family of Carpenter, together with that of Earl of Tyrconnel.

CARLOW, an inland county of the province of LEINSTER, bounded on the east by the counties of Wicklow and Wexford, on the north by those of Kildare and Wicklow, on the west by the Queen's county and Kilkenny, and on the south by that of Wexford. It extends from 52° 26' to 52° 54' (N. Lat.), and from 6° 30' to 7° 12' (W. Lon.); and comprises an area, according to the Ordnance survey, of 221,342 statute acres, of which 184,059 are arable, 31,249 uncultivated, 4927 in plantations, 602 under towns and villages, and 505 covered by water. The population, in 1821, was 78,952; in 1831, 81,988; and in 1841, 86,228.

This district, so far as can be collected from Ptolemy, was the habitation of the Brigantes and Cauci; or, according to Whitaker, of the Coriundi. Afterwards, it formed the northern part of the principality of Hy Kinselagh, and was distinguished by the name of Hy Cabnagh and Hy Drone; in later times it was called Catherlough. It is noticed in the earliest period of Irish history as the scene of contention between Conmal, son of Heher and grandson of Milesius, and a certain descendant of Heremon, the latter of whom was defeated at Leighlin. When Con of the Hundred Battles, who reigned about the middle of the second century, divided the island into two jurisdictions, a place named Dirigh or Dewa Slaney, between Carlow and Leighlin, and Naas, in Kildare, were made the sites of the two royal palaces of the kingdom of Leinster. No traces of ruins, however, now exist to confirm the truth of this traditional record, with respect to the former of those places. The synod of the clergy held about the year 630, to decide on the proper time for the celebration of Easter, met at St. Gohhan's abbey, in Old Leighlin; and about the same time, the bishopric which takes its name from that place was founded. That the county shared with the other parts of the island in the devastations committed by the Danes, during the ninth and tenth centuries, appears from the fact that the rich abbey of Achadfinlas was plundered by them in 864. The year 908 was distinguished by a decisive battle between the people of Leinster and those of Munster, the latter headed by Cormac Mac-Caillenan, better known as the writer of the Psalter of Cashel than by his political or military acts: the scene of this battle was at Moyalbe, supposed by O'Halloran and Langin to be somewhere in the vicinity of Ballymoon, in this county; the Munster men were defeated, and Cormac, with many of his nobles and officers, and six thousand of his best soldiers, slain. In the same century, the monastery of St. Mullins was plundered by the Danes, and Leighlin was three times taken by the people of Ossory.

After the arrival of the English it appears that some of the petty chieftains of the district refused to join in the alliance formed by Dermot Mac Murrough, their king, with the Welsh invaders. For, when Strongbow, after having dispersed the numerous army with which Roderick, King of Ireland, had invested Dublin, marched southward to relieve Fitz-Stephen, then blocked up in Carrig Castle, near Wexford, he was assailed during his passage through Hy Drone by O'Ryan, the lord of the county, with such impetuosity that victory remained doubtful, until the death of the Irish leader turned the scale in favour of the invaders. It was in this battle that Strongbow is said to have hewn his son, a youth about fifteen years of age, in two, for deserting his post during the engagement. The importance attached by the conquerors to the possession of the territory thus acquired, is evident from the fact that, within a few years after, the castles of Carlow, Leighlin, and Tullow, were erected by Hugh de Lacy, then lord-deputy. After the death of William, Earl-Marshal, to whom nearly the whole of Leinster belonged in right of his wife Isabel, daughter of Strongbow by Eva, princess of Leinster and heiress of Dermot Mac Murrough, this vast estate was divided among his five daughters; and the palatinate of Carlow, which had been previously made one of the twelve counties into which King John divided all those parts of Ireland that acknowledged his government, devolved on Hugh le Bigod, Earl of Norfolk, who became earl-marshal and lord of Carlow in right of his wife Maud, eldest daughter of the deceased. For many subsequent years the English kept possession of these border districts by a very frail tenure.

At the close of the thirteenth century, Old Leighlin was burnt in an incursion of the people of the neighbouring territory of Sliegmargy, which was then considered to be part of the county; and at the commencement of the next century, it appears that the owners of this princely estate, the palatinate of Carlow, having also large possessions in England, paid but little attention to its interests. Residing in another country, and finding their income from this diminishing, in consequence of the mismanagement of their deputies and the disturbed state of the island, they had recourse to a remedy, which, however effectual at first, ultimately proved destructive to their interests in this quarter. They retained one of the Kavanaghs, a descendant of Mac Murrough, and, though illegitimate, the inheritor of hereditary rights, as a kind of military agent, to supply by the sword the deficiencies of the law. Kavanagh, thus placed in a situation peculiarly tempting to a turbulent and ambitious character, soon broke the connexion, and seized upon a great portion of Carlow and Wexford, as belonging to him of right: he further assumed the regal title of Mac MURROUGH, and strengthened his newly acquired power by an alliance with the O'Byrnes and O'Tooles of the neighbouring mountainous district of Wicklow. In 1316, Sir Edmund Butler, lord-justice, defeated Mac Murrough near Ballylethan; and the same year was marked by the incursion of Edward Bruce into the southern counties. But though the invader passed through Castledermot and Tullow, in his progress southward, he made no impression on this county; and, that it still continued subject in a great degree to the sway of the Kavanaghs may be inferred from the circumstance that, in 1323, Donnell Mac Arthur Mac Murrough, "a slip of the royal family," as Campion calls him, raised forces and displayed his banner within two miles of the city of Dublin. He paid dearly, however, for his temerity, being defeated by a party of the garrison. O'Nolan, dynast of Forth barony, and twenty-five of his followers, were killed; and Mac Murrough's life was spared only on payment of £200, a large sum in those days: at length, however, after remaining six years immured in Dublin Castle, he contrived to effect his escape through the connivance of his keeper.

After this the Irish enjoyed the ascendancy for some time; they plundered the English, and burnt their churches. One outrage was marked with features of peculiar atrocity. The church of Freineston, or Friars-town, was attacked during the time of divine service, the building fired, and the priest and congregation, while attempting to escape, driven back into the flames. The spiritual as well as temporal power was called into action to inflict punishment for this horrid act. It was followed by a sentence of excommunication from the pope; and the burghers of Wexford, aided by others of the English, having attacked the perpetrators when preparing to advance upon the English settlement there, routed them with considerable loss both in the field and in crossing the Slaney. The depredations of the Irish borderers at this period called for the most decisive measures, as a preliminary for which, it was deemed expedient to summon the most distinguished nobles and prelates to a council in England. But such was the reduced state of the county, from the long continuance of deeds of outrage, that the return to the writ of summons states that, "by reason of poverty, from the frequent robberies and depredations of the Irish enemies, there was no layman able to attend the king in the English council." It appears further that a temporary protection from the predatory assaults of the borders, could only be procured by the degrading payment of a tribute called the Black Rent. In 1332, the castle of Clonmore was taken by the English; yet, notwithstanding the advantage thus gained, Sir John D'Arcy, the lord-justice, could devise no more effective means for repressing the spirit of insubordination than by calling in the assistance of Maurice Fitzgerald, afterwards Earl of Desmond, whose services were purchased by a promise of remuneration from the treasury, and whose compliance changed the aspect of affairs. Advancing against the Mac Murroughs and O'Nolans, he ravaged their district, compelled their submission, and exacted hostages for its continuance. But the most disastrous effects were produced by this connexion: the lord-justice, unable to fulfil his pecuniary engagements, was forced to connive at the extortion of coin and livery, now first practised by the English; a grievance the more intolerable, as it was limited neither in place nor time. Every lord of a castle, or warden of the marches, made war at his pleasure, until the desolation became universal and threatened to be perpetual. Still, however, the Irish, though worsted on most occasions, were in arms. In 1339, the Earl of Kildare pursued the O'Dempseys across the Barrow; and the greatest booty ever seized in the country was carried from Idrone, by the Bishop of Hereford, then lord-justice. In 1346, the county of Carlow, with all its appurtenances, was granted in capite to Thomas de Brotherton, Earl of Norfolk and Marshal of England. The next year, Donald Mac Murrough, styled Prince of Leinster, was murdered by his own followers: some years after, the castles of Kibbelle, Galbarstown, and Rathlyn were taken and dismantled by the O'Nolans, the Mac Murroughs, and the O'Byrnes. In 1361, Lionel, the king's son, arrived in Ireland as lord-lieutenant. The importance attached by him to the possession of this district is shown by his causing the king's exchequer to be removed to Carlow town, and by his expending the large sum of £500 on the repair of its fortifications. But the neglect of the English government, and the intestine feuds of the natives, had been suffered to ferment too long to admit of an effectual remedy by the exertions of any single governor. To such a height had the power of the Irish chieftains increased, that, within a very few years, the boundary of the pale was transferred from Carlow to the immediate vicinity of Dublin. The system of ravage and desolation continued. The annals of the time state, that the priory of Old Leighlin, being situated in a depopulated and wasted country, obtained a grant of public money to enable it to give refuge and succour to the king's subjects; and that the bishop of the diocese was plundered of all his goods, in 1376, by the insurgents; also that, in 1389, he obtained a grant of Galroestown, near the O'Tooles' country, as a residence in lieu of his own, which had been rendered uninhabitable.

When RICHARD II. first visited Ireland, in 1394, the place selected by him to receive the homage and oaths of fidelity of the Irish was in an open field at Ballygorey, near Carlow, when Malachias and Arthur Mac Murrough, Gerald O'Birne, Donald O'Nolan, and others, swore fealty before the earl-marshal on bended knees, and without girdle, skein, or cap. Pensions on this occasion were granted to several of them, especially to Art Mac Murrough, chief of the Kavanaghs, whose grant was continued to his family till the time of Henry VIII. Yet hardly had the king quitted the country, when the Irish again asserted the independence they had so long struggled to maintain; and Richard, determined to effect the complete subjugation of the country, returned thither in 1399. He marched from Waterford to Dublin through the districts of the Mac Murroughs, Kavanaghs, O'Tooles, and O'Byrnes; but, in consequence of the severe pressure on his men from want of provisions, he performed no action worthy of notice, beyond that of felling considerable quantities of timber, and clearing the highways through his line of march. The state of affairs in England compelled his speedy departure. In 1420, in order to make up a subsidy of 1000 marks voted to the king, the county of Carlow was assessed at only four marks, one shilling, and fourpence; while that of Louth, nearly of the same area, was charged with twenty-five marks, twelve shillings, and fivepence; a convincing proof of the low ebb to which the former had been reduced by its internal distractions. In 1494, the brother of the Earl of Kildare, then strongly suspected of treasonable intentions, seized on Carlow Castle; but was compelled by the lord-deputy to surrender it, after sustaining a siege of ten days. Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, better known by the name of "the Silken Knight," who broke out into rebellion against HENRY VIII. in 1534, was in possession of six of the chief castles of the kingdom, of which Carlow was one. Three years afterwards, the act of Absentees was passed: in consequence the Duke of Norfolk was deprived of this county, which he had inherited from Thomas de Brotherton, and a great part of it was afterwards bestowed upon the Ormonde family. In the same year, the lord-deputy defeated the Kavanaghs, and compelled their chief to submit, and give hostages. The act for the suppression of religious houses, in 1537, caused the dissolution of three only in this county, being the preceptory of Killarge, the Carmelite monastery of Leighlin-Brigge, and the Augustinian friary of Tullow.

In the same reign, a fierce contest for their territorial possessions took place between two branches of the Kavanagh family; in which, after a pitched battle, wherein upwards of one hundred were killed on each side, Cahir Mac Art of Polmonty prevailed over Gerald Mac Cahir of Garryhill, and secured possession of the disputed property. During the succeeding reign of Edward VI., this family was perpetually harassed by Sir William Brabazon, lord-deputy, who ravaged the country, and ultimately compelled the chieftain of it to make a formal submission, renounce the name of Mac Murrough, and surrender his jurisdiction and territory. A change of fortune attended it in the ensuing reign: Charles Mac Art Kavanagh was created Baron of Balian, and after his death, his brother Dermot had the same title. But these honours were insufficient to secure their attachment to the government; for, in 1555, they invaded the county of Dublin, whence they were ultimately driven by a sortie of the armed citizens into Powerscourt Castle, where, on the appearance of a regular military force, they surrendered at discretion: being taken to Dublin, seventy-five of them were hanged. During this and the preceding period, the barony of IDRONA was considered to be a distinct jurisdiction from the county of Carlow. By an inquisition taken in the reign of Richard II., it appears that Sir John Carew, who came into the country in the train of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, obtained possession of it, and that it devolved, at his death, on Sir Leonard Carew, upon whose decease the Kavanaghs seized and held it by force of arms. Sir Peter Carew revived and established the family claim to it before the privy council of Ireland, in 1567; and the next year he was employed by the lord-deputy to put down Sir Edmund Butler, who had joined the great Earl of Desmond in his rebellion. He succeeded not only in taking Sir Edmund's castle of Cloughgrenan, but in routing a large body of the earl's friends in Kilkenny, and in compelling the Kavanaghs, who had taken up arms in the same cause, to throw themselves upon the queen's mercy, and give hostages. Still, the restless spirit of the natives of this district seems to have been indomitable; for, in 1571, they "began again," as Hooker quaintly expresses it, "to play their pageants." A quarrel having taken place between one of the Kavanaghs and a proprietor of the name of Browne, recourse was had to arms, and Browne was killed; but the strife was not thus terminated. The Wexford people joined the weaker party, and the quarrel was still carried on for some time in petty but sanguinary conflicts, in which the superior generalship of the leader of the Kavanaghs finally prevailed. The strife, however, led to no remarkable changes.

During the attempts made by the court of Spain to excite insurrections in Ireland, in the latter part of ELIZABETH's reign, the county was harassed by a new disturber. Rory Oge O'More, a chieftain of the Queen's county, attacked and burnt part of the town of Leighlin-Brigge: he did not, however, remain unmolested. Sir George Carew, a relative of Sir Peter, attacked him unexpectedly by night, and routed his party; but the fugitives having discovered the great inferiority of numbers that pursued them, rallied, and drove the English back to Leighlin Castle, which they very nearly succeeded in taking. O'More afterwards made an attack on the town of Carlow, but with as little success; he was finally taken and executed as a rebel. The same spirit of turbulence continued to the close of Elizabeth's reign. Donell Kavanagh, usually called Spaniagh or the Spaniard, made himself peculiarly formidable by his prowess and activity: in 1590, having procured the aid of the mountain tribes of Wicklow, he plundered the whole country from the border of Wexford to the gates of Dublin. At length Lord Mountjoy undertook the subjugation of the district, which he effected after ravaging Donell Spaniagh's country, whence he carried off an immense booty of cattle, securing his conquest by placing garrisons in the strong posts of Wicklow and Tallow. So completely, in fact, did he succeed, that the leaders of those districts served under his standard in his subsequent operations for tranquillising Munster, in effecting which he made Carlow his headquarters, "it being, as things stood, the place best to give directions to all parts and to secure the most dangerous." It was not until the ninth year of his reign that James I. found sufficient leisure to put forth his pacific project for the settlement, or plantation, as it was called, of Carlow, Wexford, and Wicklow counties. In that year a king's letter was issued on the subject; but it does not appear to have been followed, with respect to the first of these counties, by further measures. On the breaking out of the civil war in 1641, the people of Carlow and Wexford, together with those of the Wicklow mountains, took up arms against the government; and not content with overrunning these counties, they marched into Waterford, where they were defeated by Sir William St. Leger, president of Munster. The next year, the Earl of Ormonde having entered the county with a large force, the Irish, who were in possession of the town of Carlow, and had blocked up the English garrison in the castle, raised the siege, and retreated with some loss; the garrison, consisting of 500 men, was thus saved from destruction. When the confederate Catholics afterwards resolved to levy a force of 31,700 men, this county was assessed at 2400, of which 40 cavalry and 400 infantry were to serve in the general army, and the remainder to act within the shire. The county was not exempt from its share in the sufferings of 1798: the amount of money claimed by the loyalists within it, in compensation for their loss of property during the disturbances, was £24,854.

This county is entirely within the diocese of Leighlin. For purposes of civil jurisdiction it is divided into the baronies of Carlow, Idrone East, Idrone West, St. Mullins Lower, St. Mullins Upper, Rathvilly, and Forth. Idrone was divided into East and West, and made two distinct baronies, in 1802, under the provisions of an act passed in 1799; and by an order in council, dated June 2nd, 1834, St. Mullins was also divided, pursuant to the same act, into North and South, or Upper and Lower, St. Mullins, now constituting distinct baronies. The county contains the borough, market, and assize town of Carlow; the market and post towns of Tullow, Bagnalstown, and Leighlin-Briggs; the market-town of Hacketstown; the post-town of Clonegal, and part of that of Newtownbarry; and the ancient borough of Old Leighlin, now a small and deserted village. The largest villages are Borris, Rathvilly, and Royal-Oak. Prior to the Union it sent six members to the Irish parliament; namely, two knights of the shire, and two representatives for each of the boroughs of Carlow and Old Leighlin; but since that period its representatives, in the Imperial parliament, have been limited to two members for the county at large, and one for the borough of Carlow. The county election takes place in the town of Carlow; and the constituency, as entered on the register, and qualified to vote, up to 1844, is 2063, of whom 293 are £50, 172 £20, and 1193 £10, freeholders; 94 are £20, and 190 £10, leaseholders; and 121 are rent-chargers. The shire is included in the home circuit: the assizes and general quarter-sessions are held at Carlow, where are the court-house and county gaol; and quarter-sessions are also held at Tullow and Bagnalstown, at the former of which and at Moneybeg are bridewells. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, 7 deputy-lieutenants, and 44 other magistrates, besides whom there are the usual county officers, including a coroner. There are 21 constabulary police stations, with a force consisting of a county inspector, 4 sub-inspectors, 6 head constables, 26 constables, and 140 sub-constables, with five horses; the expense of whose maintenance, in 1842, was £8008, defrayed by grand jury presentments and by government. There are a district lunatic asylum, and a county infirmary and fever hospital, at Carlow; also fever hospitals at Tullow, Borris, and Bagnalstown; and dispensaries, supported by equal subscriptions and grand jury presentments, at Carlow, Tullow, Leighlin-Briggs, Borris, Hacketstown, Bagnalstown, Myshall, Clonegal, &c. The amount of grand jury presentments, for 1844, was £16,891. In the military arrangements the county is included in the Dublin district, and contains one barrack station for cavalry at Carlow, affording accommodation for 6 officers, 112 men, and 90 horses.

The county presents a considerable variety of surface. The ground is generally undulating, particularly in the northern parts, where the rivers Barrow and Slaney form broad valleys of great fertility and beauty, rising into low hills clothed to the summits with a rich herbage varied by fine plantations. To the south and west the character changes. In the south the land rises into a very elevated ridge, which runs along the whole of the south-eastern verge of the county, separating it by a strongly marked natural barrier from that of Wexford. The northern portion of this ridge, which commences from the valley of the Slaney at Newtownbarry, is called Mount Leinster; rises 2610 feet above the level of the sea; and is separated at its southern extremity from the Blackstairs mountain by Scullage gap, the only passage through which a communication can be kept up between the two counties. Blackstairs, 2409 feet above the sea, extends in the same direction till it is interrupted by the Barrow, where its rugged and precipitous termination, together with the peculiarly sombre tints of its appearance throughout its whole extent, has fixed upon it the name just mentioned. This part of the county is comparatively barren and of discouraging aspect. To the west of the Barrow, and bounding the Queen's county, are Gallows-hill and Seskinrath, upwards of 900 feet high, and constituting portions of a tract of elevated land called the Ridge of Old Leighlin, which, however, being cultivated to the very summit, does not strictly merit the name of mountain. The latter district is deficient in the natural beauties which gratify the eye in the northern and eastern parts; but their absence is considered to be amply compensated by the treasures concealed beneath the surface, as this portion of the county forms the commencement of the great coal-field of Leinster, and bears all the external marks of diminished fertility which usually characterise such tracts. Notwithstanding that the county is well watered, there is nothing in it entitled to the name of lake, although the more ancient name of its chief town, Catherlough, "the city on the lake," would lead to such an inference. The two principal rivers are the Barrow and the Slaney.

The former enters the county from Kildare, and running for a short distance along the boundary of the Queen's county, divides the town of Carlow from its suburb of Graigue, in the Queen's county, passing under a bridge of four arches; thence it proceeds by Leighlin-Bridge, Bagnalstown, and Goresbridge, and along the boundary of the county of Kilkenny, until it meets the tideway at the rocks called the Scars, below St. Mullins, where it quits the county in its course to Waterford harbour. The Slaney enters the county from Wicklow, at the parish of Rahill, and passing near Rathvilly, and by the town of Tullow, enters the county of Wexford at Newtownharry. The Burren has its source in the parish of Fennagh, and running a circuitous course, falls into the Barrow at Carlow: the Derreen, or Derry, enters the county from the county of Wicklow, along the boundary of which it runs; and falls into the Slaney near Aghade.

The climate is mild and salubrious, subject neither to the extremes of heat and cold, nor of excessive moisture, to which regions in the neighbourhood of lofty mountains, or near the shores of the Atlantic, are liable. The soil is rich, and generally of a calcareous nature, except in the more mountainous parts; and even there, cultivation has been carried to a considerable height on the acclivities. Agriculture is in as highly improved a state here as in any other part of Ireland. So far back as 1779, the vicinity of Carlow town was noticed by Young as one of the few places in which green crops formed part of the system of rural economy, turnips being at that time extensively planted there; though it does not appear that they became a general farm crop till many years after. Since 1817, agriculture, as a system, has been extending its beneficial effects with rapid progress under the fostering care and spirited example of some of the resident gentry. Wheat of a superior quality is grown in every part, barley on some of the most favoured soils, whilst oats and potatoes are universal: the barley has long been celebrated and in great demand, and large quantities are annually shipped to England; the potatoes also, particularly those grown on the calcareous soils, are much esteemed. Turnips are every where cultivated with success by the gentry and large farmers; but the small farmers are generally averse from the culture of green crops, notwithstanding the inducement held out by several landlords of releasing them from the payment of rent for land tilled for turnips or mangel-wurzel. Clover seed is sometimes sown on the larger farms, and the sowing of grass seeds in laying down exhausted land is now pretty general, although the old and pernicious system of allowing the land to recover by a natural process is still too prevalent; flax, hemp, rape, and vetches, are occasionally sown. The pastures are remarkably good, and though the land is not so rich as in some parts of Tipperary and Limerick, the cattle attain a larger size here than in either of those counties. Dairies are numerous, and the dairy farms extensive and profitable: butter, generally of very superior quality and much esteemed in the English and foreign markets, is the chief produce; cheese is made only for domestic consumption. The dairy-farmers pay great attention to the selection and breed of milch-cows. Limerick heifers were formerly much in demand, but a cross between the Durham breed and the old country cow is now the favourite: some of the Durham breed are, nevertheless, highly prized for the dairy, but they neither fatten so soon nor weigh so profitably as those crossed with the Limerick, Devon, or Teeswater breeds. Sheep of the new Leicester breed have been introduced at considerable expense by some of the most spirited agriculturists, and are now become pretty general and in high repute; they appear to be well adapted to the soil and climate, and bear an excellent fleece. In the hilly districts the sheep are smaller; those in highest repute in the county are a cross between the new Leicester and the Kerry. Pigs are not so generally kept here as in some of the adjoining counties, and are mostly of an inferior kind. The number of farms of more than one acre each, is 6378, on which there was, in 1841, a stock of 8186 horses and mules, 23,163 horned-cattle, 28,432 sheep, 21,408 pigs, 102,031 head of poultry, and 1516 asses; the whole of the estimated value of £278,159.

Draining has been introduced by some of the gentry, but irrigation is very little practised. The fences are far superior to those of the neighbouring counties, though in many cases the large old ditches or mounds of earth, with a deep shough on one or both sides, are to be seen. A kind of fence common here is formed out of the blocks of white granite which lie scattered over a great part of the county or are procured from the quarries; these blocks being cloven with great regularity, the larger slabs are fixed upright in the ground, and the lighter and longer pieces ranged transversely along the top, in the manner of posts and rails, forming an unique and very durable fence. Agricultural implements on the most approved principles are generally used in every part, except the hilly districts, where the old heavy implements may still be partially seen: the iron plough and light harrow have been in use some years by gentlemen, and are now in the possession of almost every farmer. The old heavy wooden car has given place generally to one of lighter form, with iron-bound spoke wheels, but having very short shafts: carts nearly similar to those of England, with narrow wheels, are every where used by the wealthy farmers. The whole of the county, with the exception of the mountainous parts already noticed, is well wooded: trees thrive well, but attention is not paid to every species; an oak wood is rarely met with, although oaks flourish in the soil. The spruce and silver fir, after having been tried for some time, were extirpated on account of their unhealthy appearance; the soil was thought not suitable to them. The weeping, or Hertfordshire, elm is frequently to be seen: the elm in general germinates earlier here than elsewhere. But the most beautiful and ornamental trees are the sycamore, chestnut, lime, hirsch, and white-thorn, the last of which attains a large size: the entire level part of the county presents much the appearance of some of the English counties. According to a parliamentary return of the extent of the plantations, there appear to be 851 acres of oak, 50 ash, 78 elm, 26 beech, 268 fir, 3341 mixed timber, and 313 fruit; besides 560,243 detached trees, equivalent to 3501 acres: total, 8428 acres. Lime is plentiful, and the facilities of its conveyance for agricultural purposes abundant. Fuel is equally so: coal is brought from the collieries of Kilkenny and the Queen's county by land carriage, and turf is procured from the small bogs in this and the adjoining counties. Horticulture is in an advanced state; few farmhouses are without a vegetable garden; and the scarcer kind of esculents, and likewise flowers, are generally cultivated.

The county lies between the great eastern granite district of the county of Wicklow and the coal formation of the Queen's county and Kilkenny. The granite shews itself along the south-eastern verge, in the mountainous range of Mount Leinster and Blackstairs; it is interrupted by the precipitous valley of St. Mullins, but appears again at Brandon hill, in the southern part of Kilkenny. The coal country is surrounded by and rests upon limestone, the strata of which, wherever examined, present appearances extremely similar. A description of the LIMESTONE valley between the GRANITE country, two miles east of the town of Carlow, and the COAL field as far westward, may serve to give a clear idea of the general nature of this part of the country. At the base of Browne's hill, two miles east of Carlow, the granite is covered with stratified silicious limestone, dipping 60° west of north at an angle of 10° from the horizon: the colour is light greyish blue, and the stone has numerous petrifications, chiefly bivalve shells; it is calcined with great difficulty, and gives, on analysis, of carbonate of lime, 95.00; of silica, with a tinge of iron, 4.50; and of carbon, 0.50. The stratification is quite regular between the granite country and Carlow, but with a change of colour and character as it recedes from the mass of granite. At first it changes to a dark blue, and madrepores are visible in it. The beds are extremely vesicular, and their numerous cavities are coated with a series of different fossils. On approaching Carlow, the limestone becomes more silicious and of a deeper colour: at the town the colour is dark or iron grey, and the texture fine-grained, and it is sometimes polished and used for chimney-pieces: to the west of the town the limestone is lighter in colour and much purer. Here the Lydian stone begins to appear in quantity, both in irregular beds and round nodules. The limestone becomes still lighter in colour and finer in quality as it approaches the west: some specimens from the higher quarries were found to contain solely carbonate of lime, with a small residuum of carbon, not amounting to a quarter per cent. The number of petrifications in the upper quarry is immense, comprehending a great variety of fossil productions. On approaching the point where the coal strata join the limestone, the stratification is generally disturbed; the rock becomes shivery, and breaks into indeterminate angular small fragments. The quantity of Lydian stone is greatly increased; the actual point of contact between the limestone and coal being scarcely visible, on account of the disturbance of the strata. The Lydian stone appears to pass into slate-clay, no division existing between them. The succession of rocks visible at Old Leighlin, is as follows, commencing from the bottom: dark blueish grey limestone, 10 feet; irregular black Lydian stone, with silicious petrifications, 2 feet; light grey limestone, 20 feet; Lydian stone, with numerous silicious petrifications, 3 feet; flinty slate, in very thin beds, the uppermost of which graduate into slate-clay, and contain balls of clay-ironstone of a dark-blue colour, 30 feet; and sandstone flag, 200 feet. This last stone continues to the summit of the hill, where it varies very much in quality, and passes from soft sandstone into soft micaceous slag, which divides into thin laminae from one-tenth of an inch to an inch in thickness. Besides the irregularities above described, beds of brown spar rock are met with near the point of junction of the two formations; but they are more frequent on the southern and western boundaries than on the northern and eastern. The limestone field abounds with rolled calcareous masses, pebbles, gravel, sand, and marl, forming escars of considerable elevation, in which the calcareous gravel and sand frequently exhibit a stratified disposition with layers very distinct from each other.

Carlow is almost exclusively an agricultural district. An inland trade, particularly in grain, is carried on by the Barrow to Waterford, and by the Slaney to Wexford: but though the county is much indebted to both these rivers for the increase of its agricultural prosperity, neither has any claim to be considered as belonging to it exclusively. The former has been rendered navigable from Athy bridge, in the county of Kildare, to the tide-way below St. Mullins, a distance of about 43 miles; the total fall is 172 feet. The navigation is in the bed of the river, except near the several mills, where there are artificial cuts and locks: the total extent of the new cuts is five miles; their breadth, 27 feet at the bottom and 42 at the surface of the water. The roads are numerous, and in general well constructed.

Among the more remarkable RELICS of ANTIQUITY are, a large cromlech at Browne's hill, near Carlow, and another, still larger, at Tobinstown; also a rath near Leighlin-Bridge, and, near Tallow, a pillar perforated at the top, and thence called Clogh a' Phail, "the stone with the hole." The Kavanagh family were formerly in possession of several relics of antiquity, the most curious of which was an ivory horn mounted and ornamented with gilt brass, supposed to have been the tenure by which they held the estate: it has been deposited in the museum of Trinity College, Dublin. Another of these is the Figeen, a kind of ring, composed of a mixture of silver and tin; it was found in a ditch in the demesne of Borris. A third is the Liath Meisicith, being a brass box encased with silver, and containing extracts from the gospels written on vellum in Latin, but in the Irish character; it is also deposited in Dublin College. Near Cloghgrenan, some brazen swords and arrow-heads were raised out of a ford in the Barrow. Several remains of monastic buildings still exist: the most striking are those of Achadínsglass near Leighlin, Athade, Ballymoon (or, as it is called by Archdall, Bally-Mac-William-roe), Killarge, Kilfortchean, Old Leighlin, Leighlin-Bridge, St. Mullins, and Tullow. The remains of a round tower were visible near the church of Kellsytown, until the year 1807, when they were cleared away to make room for a belfry. Around Old Leighlin are numerous remains of ancient buildings, among the most conspicuous of which are those of the venerable cathedral; and in several parts are ruins of churches, some of remote origin, close to which the modern churches have in many instances been built, tending to heighten the picturesque effect. The most remarkable of the military antiquities is Carlow Castle, on the banks of the Barrow. In Idrome East are, Ballylaughan, called also Ballylorgan Castle, whose remains retain many traces of its former strength and importance; and Ballymoon Castle, a structure of the Knights Templars, the walls of which are of great thickness: sheep graze peaceably within its inclosure. Black Castle, built on the eastern side of Leighlin-Bridge, retains its walls: near it was another fortress, built by one of the Fitzgeralds, and named for distinction White Castle. The castles of Gilbertstown, Rathlin, Lorum, and Rathnegeragh, were in the same barony. Clonmore Castle, in Rathvilly, is in tolerable preservation. There are no remains of the castle of Tullow; it is supposed to have stood near the site of the present church. The ruins of Castle-Grace are near Tullow. Clonmullen Castle, of which some traces were in existence about 60 years since, though now obliterated by the plough, was anciently remarkable as the residence of Donell Spaniagh, and perhaps not less so, at a more modern period, for possessing as an inmate Ellen Kavanagh, immortalized by Carolan in his affecting melody of Aileen a Roon, and recently made the subject of an interesting poem by Mr. R. Garrett, of Janeville, in this county. The habits of the peasantry are of a better description than those in many other parts of the country; the general appearance and habits of both sexes are much improved, and the interior of their dwellings neat and comfortable. At Garrowhill, or Knockdrimagh, near the bottom of Mount Leinster, is a chalybeate spring; but its efficacy is little known except in its immediate vicinity.

CARLOW, a borough, market, and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $18\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Kilkenny, and $39\frac{1}{2}$ (S. W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 9901 inhabitants, of whom 8734 are in the borough; the parliamentary limits include the suburb of Graigue, in the barony of Sliemargue, Queen's county, and contain altogether 10,409 inhabitants. This town, called till within a comparatively recent period Catherlough, or Catherlagh, is supposed to have derived that name, signifying in the Irish language "the city on the lake," from its proximity to a large sheet of water which formerly existed here. The erection of the castle has been variously attributed to Eva, daughter of Dermot Mac Murrough; to Isabel, daughter of Strongbow; and to King John; but with more probability to Hugh de Lacy, about the year 1180. In the reign of Edward II., the castle belonged to the crown, and was made the headquarters of the seneschalship of the counties of Carlow and Kildare, instituted on account of the disturbed state of those districts. About the year 1361, Lionel, Duke of Clarence, established the exchequer of the kingdom at this place, and expended £500 in fortifying the town with walls, of which at present there is not a vestige. James Fitzgerald, brother of the Earl of Kildare, seized the castle in 1494; but it was soon afterwards invested by the lord-deputy, Sir Edward Poynings, to whom, after a siege of ten days, it was surrendered. In 1534 it was taken by Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, during his insurrection; and in 1577 the town was assaulted by Rory Oge O'More. James I. granted the manor to Donogh, Earl of Thomond, whom he also made constable of the castle. In 1641, the whole county was overrun by the insurgents, and the castle of Carlow was invested by a strong party, and reduced to great extremity; a number of Protestants had taken refuge within its walls, and the garrison was about to surrender, when it was relieved by a detachment of the Earl of Ormonde's forces under the command of Sir Patrick Wemyss. On his approach the insurgents raised the siege, and, after burning the town, took flight; but 50 of them were killed in the pursuit. This place was still constantly exposed to the assaults of the insurgents; and the castle, after sustaining a siege for nearly a month, ultimately surrendered in May, 1647. It was, in 1650, closely invested by Ireton and the republican army; and after a severe cannonade which greatly injured the castle, the garrison surrendered on conditions to Sir Hardress Waller, whom Ireton had left to conduct the siege. After the battle of the Boyne, in 1690, William III. led his army southward through this town; and during the disturbances of 1798, it was assaulted by the insurgents on the morning of the 25th of May. The garrison, consisting partly of regular troops and partly of yeomanry, amounting in the whole to 450, repulsed the assailants, though 2000 in number, with the loss of 600 of their men; on which occasion the loyalists were obliged to burn several of the houses, in order to compel the insurgents to abandon them.

THE TOWN is pleasantly and advantageously situated on the eastern bank of the river Barrow, over which is a bridge of four arches connecting it with the extensive suburban village of Graigue: the whole is surrounded by a rich agricultural district, and sheltered by some ranges of hills well cultivated to their summits. It is of considerable extent, and contains more than fourteen good streets: the two principal, intersecting each other at right angles, and continued through its whole length and breadth, divide the town into four nearly equal portions, which are again divided and subdivided by smaller streets into 42 portions; having in the whole, 1355 houses. The town is rapidly increasing in all directions; and a new street, chiefly for private residence, is now in progress, which, when completed, will be one of its greatest ornaments. Though a place of such high antiquity, it has an air of modern neatness: the streets are paved and kept in repair by county presentments, the two principal by the county at large, and the others by the barony in which the town is situated; and the inhabitants are supplied with water from public pumps. On the south side of the town is a stream called the Burrun, which flows into the Barrow; and on a rising ground above its influx are the stately remains of the ancient castle, towering to a height of 60 feet above the roofs of the houses. There are two subscription reading-rooms; and to the south-east of the town are cavalry barracks for 8 officers and 112 non-commissioned officers and privates, with stabling for 90 horses, and an hospital for 20 patients.

From its advantageous situation on the Barrow, affording a facility of communication with the ports of Ross, Waterford, and Dublin, Carlow has become the principal mart for the agricultural produce of the well-cultivated districts around it, and carries on an extensive trade in corn and butter; the latter is of a very superior quality, and meets with a ready sale in the London market. The trade down the river has, within the last 14 years, greatly increased; while that upwards has diminished, in consequence of the heavy tolls demanded on the canal conveyance to the metropolis. The quantity of corn and flour sent hence to Waterford and other ports for exportation has, within a few years, advanced from 2000 to 15,000 quarters; and the quantity of butter weighed in the market and in private stores is at present not less than 35,000 firkins. The river is navigable from Athy, where the Grand Canal from Dublin joins it, to its confluence with the Suir below Waterford. Boats consequently pass from this place to Dublin, Ross, and Waterford; there is a lock on the river, and good quays have been constructed for the accommodation of vessels employed in the trade. The Dublin and Cork line of railway has a branch to Carlow, passing near Athy. Carlow is the head-quarters of the southern district of the revenue police, and sub-stations are fixed at Newtownbarry, Freshford, and Gore's-bridge: there is also a chief constabulary police station in the town. Branches of the Bank of Ireland, the Provincial Bank, and the Tipperary Joint-Stock Bank, have been established. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Kilkenny. The market-days are Monday and Thursday; and fairs are held on May 4th, June 22nd, Aug. 26th, and Nov. 8th.

The earliest charter on record relating to the borough is that of William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, granted about the close of the 13th century. It created an open community of burgesses endowed with considerable privileges, including a guild mercatory and other guilds, with exemption from tolls and customs throughout the earl's whole lands, except the towns of Pembroke and Wexford; it also mentions a hundred court as being then in existence in the town, and ordained that it should be held only once in the week. James I., in 1613, granted a charter of incorporation, conferring, among other privileges, a right to return two members to parliament; the late governing charter was obtained on petition from Charles II., in 1674. James II. granted a charter founded on a seizure of the franchises by a decree of the exchequer; but it soon became inoperative. Under the charter of Charles II. the corporation, previously to its late dissolution, was styled "The Sovereign, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Catherlagh;" and consisted of a sovereign, twelve free burgesses, and a commonalty, assisted by a town-clerk, two sergeants-at-mace, a weighmaster of butter, and a bellman. The sovereign was annually elected by the sovereign for the time being and a majority of the burgesses from their own body, on the 24th of June, and entered upon his office on the 29th of September; he was ex officio a justice of the peace for the borough and the county, and clerk of the market, and with the approbation of the burgesses could appoint one of them to be his deputy. The burgesses were elected from the freemen by a majority of the sovereign and burgesses; the town-clerk and sergeants-at-mace were chosen by the sovereign and burgesses, and the weighmaster of butter was appointed by the sovereign. The freemen were elected by the sovereign and burgesses. The corporation continued to exercise all its rights and privileges until the passing of the act 3rd and 4th of Victoria, cap. 108, when it was dissolved, and its property became vested in a board called the "Municipal Commissioners."

The borough returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, since which period it has sent only one to the Imperial parliament. The right of election, previously confined to the sovereign and burgesses, was, by the act of the 2nd of William IV. for amending the representation, extended to the resident freemen and £10 householders: the constituency on the register, and qualified to vote, is 565, of whom 556 are £10 householders, and 9 burgesses; the high sheriff is now the returning officer. By the charter, the corporation had power to hold a court of record for pleas to the amount of five marks; but they latterly exercised no jurisdiction whatever, either civil or criminal. The assizes, and also the quarter-sessions for the county, are held here; and petty-sessions are held every Thursday before the county magistrates. The manor court has jurisdiction to the amount of £10 late currency over the entire town and an extensive rural district: it had fallen into disuse prior to 1833, when the lord of the manor, B. Hamilton, Esq., appointed a seneschal, and the court was revived; but few cases have been since determined in it. The court-house, a newly-erected building at the junction of the Castledermot and Athy roads, near the entrance of the town, is a handsome octagonal edifice, with a fine Doric portico in imitation of the Acropolis at Athens, resting upon a platform to which is an ascent by a broad flight of steps; the whole is of hewn granite, of chaste design and execution, and forms a striking ornament to the town. Near it is the county gaol, which, exclusively of the female and the debtors' prisons, contains 26 cells, with seven small rooms, in the old building, and 20 cells in the new; the prisoners are engaged in useful labour, and are taught trades, to qualify them on their discharge for a life of industry. The female prisoners are also carefully instructed, and employed under a duly qualified matron; a school has been established, and the sick are attended by a medical officer. There is a tread-wheel, worked for raising water to supply the gaol.

The PARISH comprises 3330½ statute acres, of which about 648 are plantations, a few acres bog, and the remainder good arable and pasture land. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and in many parts beautifully picturesque: there are several handsome seats. Oak Park, formerly called Paynestown, is a spacious building consisting of a centre and two wings, situated to the north of the town, in a fine demesne embellished with stately groves of full-grown oak. To the east of it are Browne Hill and Viewmont House, the latter formerly the seat of Sir E. Crosbie, Bart., and commanding a beautiful prospect of the neighbouring country. On the opposite side of the river, below the town, is Cloghgrean, situated in a highly improved demesne. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the patronage of the Crown for two presentations, and of the Bishop for one: the tithe rent-charge is £225. The church is a modern structure, with a beautiful spire terminating at an elevation of 195 feet, and having a massive gilt cross presented by the ladies of Carlow: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £488 for repairs. Near the river, to the north of the town, is an ancient burial-ground called "The Graves," said to have been granted to the parish by the Earl of Thomond. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 2½ acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is the benefice of the Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin. The Roman Catholic cathedral is an elegant cruciform structure in the later English style, with a lofty tower at the western extremity of the nave, surmounted by a lantern of beautiful design terminating at a height of 151 feet from the base; it occupies the site of the old chapel, and is a rich ornament to the town. At the foot of the altar are interred the remains of the Right Rev. Dr. James Doyle, late bishop, distinguished by his letters under the signature of J. K. L., and by his important evidence before both houses of parliament. He entered the college of Carlow, as professor of rhetoric, in 1811, and was soon afterwards appointed professor of theology; he was raised, in 1819, to the Roman Catholic see of Kildare and Leighlin, and died of a lingering decline on the 10th of June, 1834. Braganza House, the residence of the bishop, is in the immediate vicinity of the town. There are places of worship for Presbyterians, the Society of Friends, and Wesleyan Methodists.

The College of St. Patrick, for the education of youth and of the Roman Catholic clergy, was founded by the Rev. Dr. Keefe, and opened in the year 1795 under the direction of Dean Staunton. The system of education comprises the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, French, and English languages, sacred and profane history, rhetoric, geography, arithmetic, and the mathematics, to which are added natural and moral philosophy, humanity, and theology; the whole under the superintendence of professors and assistants, who are members of the house and resident. The building, which consists of a spacious centre connected with two wings by corridors, is situated in a park comprising an area of 34 acres nearly in the centre of the town, inclosed with high walls, and well planted, affording ample opportunities of healthful recreation and undisturbed retirement. The institution is under the direction of a president, vice-president, and prefect, of the lay college, a dean of the ecclesiastical college, and other officers; the fees are £31. 10. per annum for lay, and £27 for ecclesiastical students. Connected with it is a neat chapel having a burial-ground attached. A convent of the Presentation order was established in 1814, consisting of a superior and 16 nuns, who gratuitously instruct about 350 children; it is a handsome edifice in Tullow-street. A branch from the Sisters of Mercy in Baggot-street, Dublin, was formed here in 1837. The Diocesan School of Leighlin and Osory is supported by the bishop and the clergy, the bishop paying one-third of the master's salary. The District Lunatic Asylum for the counties of Carlow, Kilkenny, Wexford, and Kildare, and the county of the city of Kilkenny, is situated in this town, and was built in 1831, at an expense, including the cost of erection and purchase of land and furniture, of £22,552. 10.; it is under excellent regulation, and attached to it are 15½ acres of land. From the time of its opening to the 31st of March 1841, 445 patients were admitted, of whom 213 recovered and were discharged, 20 were discharged relieved, and 54 died; 158 remained in the asylum, whereof 20 were relapsed cases. The expenditure of the year ending on the above day was £2451: in 1844 the expenditure was £2319. The county infirmary is supported by grand jury presentations and local subscriptions, aided by a parliamentary grant; a fever hospital, opened for the reception of patients in 1829, is supported by grand jury presentations alone; a dispensary is maintained in the usual way, and a Magdalene asylum wholly by subscription.

The workhouse, on a site of 7½ acres purchased for £1000, was completed in 1842, at a cost of £9000, and is constructed to admit 800 paupers.

The remains of the old castle consist of one side of the quadrangle, at each end of which is one of the massive round towers that flanked its angles: the walls shew that it must have been a fortress of much strength; and from the loftiness of its elevation and the commanding position which it occupies, it has still a striking appearance of majestic grandeur. Near Oak Park was a small Franciscan friary, founded by the Cooke family, formerly proprietors of that estate. Browne Hill and Viewmount occupy the site of an ancient religious establishment, called St. Kieran's Abbey; and in the vicinity are the remains of a cromlech, the table-stone of which is 23 feet in length, 19 in breadth, and at the upper end nearly 4½ feet thick; it is supported at the east end on three upright stones, 15 feet 8 inches high, and at a distance is another upright stone standing by itself. Carlow gives the inferior title of Viscount to the family of Dawson, earls of Portlborough.

CARMAVY, a grange, in the parish of KILLEAD, union of ANTRIM, barony of LOWER MARSAREENE, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (S.E.) from Antrim; containing 307 inhabitants. This grange is situated upon the road from Belfast to Antrim, and comprises 789½ statute acres.

CARMONEY.—See CARMONEY.

CARN, or CARNDONAGH, a market and post town, in the parish of DONAGH, union and barony of ENNIS-HOWEN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 17 miles (N.) from Londonderry, and 135½ (N.W.) from Dublin; containing 653 inhabitants. This place, which is pleasantly situated on an eminence near the head of the bay of Straghtbegagh, or Strabegagh, and on the road from Londonderry to Malin, consists of a small square and four good streets, and contains 140 houses, many of which are large and well built; a river runs through it, and another has its course a little to the north. The market is on Monday; and fairs are held on the 21st of Feb., May, Aug., and Nov. Here is a chief constabulary station, with barracks for the police; and Carn is the head of a coast-guard district, comprising also the stations of Dunree Fort, Dunaff Head, Malin Head, Port Redford, and Green Castle. In the vicinity are many excellent houses. The parish church, near which is an ancient and curious stone cross, and the Roman Catholic parochial chapel, a large and handsome edifice erected in 1826, are both situated in the town. There are also a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and a dispensary.—See DONAGH.

CARN, a village, in the parish of DUNGIVEN, union of NEWTOWN-LIMAVADY, barony of KENAUGHT, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 2½ miles (E.S.E.) from Dungiven; containing 124 inhabitants. It lies on the road from Maghera to Newtown-Limavady.

CARNAGH, a parish, in the poor-law union of NEW ROSS, barony of BANTRY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.E. by S.) from New Ross; containing 352 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Enniscorthy, by Ballinlaw Ferry, to Waterford, and comprises 2106½ statute acres: the lands are principally under tillage; an exhausted bog has been reclaimed, and is now under cultivation: there is no waste land. The system of agriculture is progressively improving, and the industry and comfort of the farmers and the peasantry are evident from the external appearance of their dwellings. There are some quarries of building-stone, which, although of inferior quality, is still used for that purpose in the neighbourhood. Carnagh, a family seat here, is situated in a pleasant demesne. At Ballinabooley is a constabulary police station. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and is part of the ecclesiastical union of St. Mary, New Ross: the tithe rent-charge is £60. The church is in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish, with the exception of the townland of Ballymacar, is the head of a district called Cushinstown, comprising the parishes of Carnagh, Ballyane, Tallerath, and Old Ross; the chapel is at Cushinstown. Near Ballinabooley is a rath, underneath which has been discovered a subterraneous apartment, approached by a passage of upright flag-stones, and capable of receiving from 20 to 25 persons; it is supposed to have been constructed by the Danes, for the concealment of plunder in cases of emergency. The streams in various parts of the parish are of a chalybeate nature, but the water is seldom used medicinally.

CARNALLOWAY, or CARNALWAY, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of SOUTH NAAS, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Naas; containing 1181 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the river Liffey, which separates it from the parish of Old Kilcullen; and is on the turnpike-road from Naas to Dunlavin. During the disturbances of 1798, a battle was fought at Nineteen-mile-House, in this parish, between a party of the insurgents and a detachment of cavalry. The parish comprises $3840\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres: the lands are chiefly under tillage; the soil is good, and the system of agriculture much improved. There is no waste land, but a large quantity of bog. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and in the patronage of the Bishop and of Robert La Touche, Esq.; the former having one, and the latter two turns: the tithe rent-charge is £169.12. The church, a very neat edifice with a tower and spire, was built by the late John La Touche, Esq., and contains a tablet to the memory of Captain Cooke, who fell while charging the insurgents at Kilcullen bridge, in 1798. The Board of First Fruits granted £100, in 1810, towards the erection of a glebe-house, attached to which are 10 acres of glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Newbridge. In that portion of the town of Kilcullen which is in this parish are a fever hospital and a dispensary.

CARNCASTLE, or CASTLE-CAIRN, a parish, in the union of LARNE, barony of UPPER GLENARM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Larne; containing 3079 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shore of the North Channel, which forms its eastern boundary, and upon the road from Larne to Glenarm, and the royal military road from Belfast to the Giant's Causeway. It comprises 9725 statute acres, and is in an excellent state of cultivation: the soil is very fertile, producing valuable crops; there are only 15 acres of bog. Basalt is quarried for building, and repairing the roads; limestone is abundant, and coal is known to exist in great quantities. At Ballygally is a coast-guard station, which is one of eight that are included in the district of Carrickfergus. About five miles from the coast are the Hulin or Maiden rocks, two of which are always visible above water: upon these, lighthouses have been built by the corporation for the improvement of the port of Dublin, which are called the North and South Maiden-Rock Lights, and are 1920 feet apart. The northern light is 84 feet above high-water level, and the southern, 94 feet; both are fixed and bright lights.

The living is a rectory and perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Connor. The rectory was united, by charter of the 7th of James I., to the rectories of Kilwaughter, Ballycor, Rashee, and Derrykeighan, together constituting the corps of the prebend of Carncastle in the cathedral of St. Saviour, Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the perpetual curacy is in the gift of the rector. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £119.18. 4., and the gross rent-charge of the union £602.10. 2., of which £45 are paid by the prebendary to the perpetual curate, whose stipend is augmented to £85 per annum out of Primate Boulter's fund. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have recommended that, on the next avoidance, the parishes of Kilwaughter and Carncastle become a distinct benefice, the perpetual curacy to be absorbed therein. The church, a small plain edifice with a lofty spire, was built in 1815, on the site of a former church, by aid of a loan of £350 granted by the Board of First Fruits; and a house was purchased for a glebe-house with a gift of £450, and a loan of £50, from the same Board: the glebe comprises five acres. The grange of Killyglen is generally regarded as under the charge of the rector of Carncastle. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Larne and Carrickfergus; the chapel is a small building. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians, one connected with the General Assembly, the other with the Remonstrant Synod. On an insulated rock in the sea are the remains of Ballygally or Cairn Castle, from which the parish takes its name. There are also some remains of the ancient manor-house, built in 1625, in the Elizabethan style; and of an old church. In the parish are, a curious perforation in a mass of basalt, called the Black Cave; and a very pure vein of felspar, capable of being worked to advantage.

CARNE, county of DONEGAL.—See CARN.

CARNE, or CARNA, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of EAST ORPHALY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Kildare; containing 499 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Athy to Newbridge, and comprises 1457½ statute acres. It is a rectory and a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare. The rectory is appropriate to the dean and chapter of Kildare, who possess 178 statute acres of land in the parish; the vicarage once formed the corps of the precentorship of that cathedral, in the patronage of the Bishop, but is at present sequestered in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The tithe rent-charge is £67. 10., of which £61. 2. 1½. are payable to the dean and chapter, and £6. 7. 10½. to the Commissioners. There is no church or glebe-house, but a glebe of ten acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district called Sanicroft, comprising the parishes of Carne, Ballysonan, Kilrush, and Ballysax; the chapel at Sanicroft is a large building.

CARNE, a parish, in the poor-law union of CARLOW, barony of FORTH, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E. by S.) from Broadway; containing 914 inhabitants. This place, the present name of which in the Irish language signifies a stone, was anciently called Salanga, afterwards Slieve Domangaird, and in the time of Ptolemy Hieron, or "the Sacred Promontory." According to Archdall, St. Domangart founded a monastery here, but no traces of it can be discerned: near the spot, however, is a burial-ground with the ruins of a chapel, called St. Vaugh's, the rude architecture of which denotes its remote origin. The parish is situated on the shore of St. George's Channel, and terminates in Carnsore Point, the south-eastern extremity of Ireland, in Lat. $52^{\circ} 10'$ (N.) and Lon. $6^{\circ} 16' 45''$ (W.). It is bounded on the south and east by the sea, and on the west by the lough of Lady's Island; and comprises $1963\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, nearly the whole of which is arable and pasture. With the exception of a small eminence called the Hill of Chour, at the south-west point, the surface is flat, and being destitute of timber it has a naked aspect: the soil, though naturally poor, is, from the extensive use of sea-weed and marl as manure, rendered very productive. Little improvement, however, has taken place in the system of agriculture, except the practice of drilling potatoes, which has been lately introduced; the arable lands in many parts are so interspersed with large stones as greatly to obstruct the progress of the plough. Beans, which form one of the principal crops, find a ready market at Wexford for exportation. The farm buildings are neat, and the dwellings of the peasantry have an appearance of cleanliness and comfort. The chief articles of fuel are furze and bean-stalks; some sea-coal is brought from Wexford. The road from Carnsore Point to that town divides the parish into two nearly equal parts.

Castletown, situated in the centre of the parish, about a quarter of a mile to the west of the main road, is the ancient mansion of the Pallisers: Castle-Palliser, another residence, was erected by the late Captain Pierce Harvey. Some coarse linen and linsey-woolsey are manufactured for home consumption; and during the season, about twelve boats are employed in the herring and lobster fisheries carried on off the coast, on which are two small but convenient creeks, one at Carne and the other at Nethertown. At Carne bay is a coast-guard station, which is one of the six stations comprehended within the Wexford district; it has a detachment at Tacumshane. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithes rent-charge is £210. The church is a plain edifice of great antiquity, without tower or spire; the interior was repaired in 1825, by subscriptions and assessments amounting to £120. The glebe-house, a neat substantial building with suitable out-offices, was erected in the year 1803 by the late incumbent, the Rev. R. Bevan, at an expense of £1039, of which £100 were granted by the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the district of Lady's Island. On the estate of the Waddy family are the remains of the ancient castle of Cloest, built by the earliest English settlers in the reign of Henry II., and consisting of a tower between 70 and 80 feet high, in good preservation.

CARNEW, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of SHILLELAGH, partly in the baronies of SCAREWALSH and GOREY, county of WEXFORD, but chiefly in the barony of SHILLELAGH, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 23 miles (S. W. by S.) from Wicklow, and 47 (S. by W.) from Dublin; containing 7205 inhabitants, of whom 979 are in the town. During the disturbances of 1798, Colonel Walpole, who had been ordered to collect what forces he could and place them under the command of General Loftus, then at Gorey, arrived at this place on the evening of June 2nd, with 500 men, two six-pounders, and a howitzer, which he stationed here as the best point from which to attack the insurgents, who were encamped at Ballymore Hill. On the day following, leaving two companies in the town, he marched with the remainder to Gorey, where, in conjunction with General Loftus, he concerted a plan for attacking the enemy by two different routes on the next day. But unfortunately disregarding the arrangement he had made, and rashly assuming the entire command, he led his men into a defile, where a great number were slaughtered and he himself was killed in the first onset. The insurgents, after spending several days in plundering the town and neighbourhood of Gorey, advanced to Carnew, which they destroyed, with the exception of a malt-house, in which the garrison had retired; and after several ineffectual attacks, wherein they sustained considerable loss, they pursued their march to Kilcavan Hill. Near Ballyellis, also, while a troop of the Ancient Britons, under the command of Captain Erskine, was on its march to attack the insurgents, they blocked up the way with cars, carts, &c.; hemmed in the little party on all sides; and killed every one of the troop, who were all buried in the vicinity.

The town is situated on the road from Gorey to Tullow and Carlow, on the side of a mountainous eminence that overlooks a fertile valley; and is entirely within the Wicklow part of the parish. It consists principally of one street, containing 151 houses, and has been greatly improved by Earl Fitzwilliam, who, besides other buildings, has erected two rows of neat houses. The air is salubrious, and there is a good supply of water, but peat is obtained only from a bog at the distance of seven miles. Two snuff and tobacco manufactories, and a small brewery, are carried on. The market is on Thursday, chiefly for potatoes, pigs, and poultry; and horse and cattle fairs, which are frequently attended by English dealers, are held by patent on the first Thursday after the 12th of Feb., May, Aug., and Nov. Four other fairs have been recently established, on the 1st of April, July, and Oct., and Dec. 22nd. Petty-sessions are held on alternate Saturdays, in a neat building erected by Earl Fitzwilliam, over which is the constabulary police barrack, this town being the residence of the chief constable of the Tinahely district.

The parish comprises 23,466 statute acres, of which 8115½ are in Wexford: about one-fifth of its waste land, and there are 500 acres of wood; the remainder is arable and pasture. The soil is in general fertile, and the lands chiefly under tillage; the system of agriculture has been greatly improved since the institution of the Shillelagh and Casha Farming Society at Coolattin, by the late Earl Fitzwilliam, in 1830. At Kilcavan are quarries of building-stone and slate, the latter of which is sent into the counties of Carlow and Wexford: detached granite is also worked in the parish. Among the residences is Coolattin Park, the property of Earl Fitzwilliam. Carnew Castle is popularly said to have been battered and unroofed by the army of Cromwell from a rock above the town, still called Cromwell's rock, on his march from Dublin to Wexford: it was newly roofed and thoroughly repaired, about 30 years since, by the late Earl Fitzwilliam. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £622. 16. 6. In 1833, a portion of the parish was detached, and erected into the perpetual curacy of Shillelagh, in the gift of the rector. The church, which was enlarged in 1813, is a handsome building with an embattled tower crowned with pinnacles and surmounted by a spire, which was added in 1831: the Rev. C. Cope, who was 33 years rector of this parish, bequeathed £100 for the purchase of a bell. The edifice contains three marble monuments; one in memory of J. Charney, Esq., Captain of the Coolattin Yeomanry Infantry, who, with his nephew, also an officer in that corps, was killed in the insurrection of 1798, in an action at Ballyrahine, in the adjoining parish of Mullinacut; the second to the memory of W. Wainwright, Esq., J. P., and for above 30 years agent and sole manager of Earl Fitzwilliam's estates in the counties of Wicklow, Wexford, and Kildare; and the third in memory of T. Bookley, Esq., of Mount Garnet, in the county of Kilkenny. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions, that part of the parish which is in Wicklow is included in the district of Carnew and Crosspatrick, also called Tomacork, where the chapel is situated; that part which is in Wexford is in the district of Kilrush, and has a chapel at Askeymore. There is a place of worship in the town for Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial library has been established. A dispensary is supported in the customary manner; there is an association for employing the poor in spinning and weaving, superintended by the ladies of the neighbourhood; and a loan fund was established in 1834. This last institution is conducted by a committee of gentlemen, and has been highly beneficial; the loans are returned without the loss of a single penny, although they amount to about £200 weekly. On the townland of Umrigar are five raths or mounds, in one of which, a few years since, an urn of coarse pottery containing bones and ashes was discovered. Francis Sandford, a celebrated writer on heraldry, was born here in 1630.—See SHILLELAGH.

CARNEY, a village, in the parish of DRUMCLIFF, barony of LOWER CARBERRY, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (N. W.) from Sligo; containing 158 inhabitants. It is situated on the bay of Drumcliff, about half a mile to the left of the road from Sligo to Ballyshannon; and has a market on Thursday, and fairs on May 26th and June 24th, chiefly for cattle and sheep. A receiving-house for letters at Carney is in connexion with Ballyshannon, and a constabulary police force is stationed here; a dispensary is supported principally by Sir R. G. Booth, Bart.—See DRUMCLIFF.

CARNLOUGH, or CARNALLOCK, a maritime village, partly in the parish of TICKMACREAVAN, but chiefly in 256 that of ARDCLINIS, union of LARNE, barony of LOWER GLENARM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Glenarm; containing 346 inhabitants. This place, originally a small fishing-village, is pleasantly and advantageously situated between the bays of Cushendall and Glenarm, and from the fineness of its strand is now much frequented during the summer months for sea-bathing. It consists of 58 houses; and many elegant villas and sea-bathing lodges have been erected in the valley of Glenclloy, forming an interesting and highly ornamental feature in that secluded vale. The surrounding scenery possesses great natural beauty, and in some parts assumes a character of majestic grandeur; the demesne of Glenarm Castle, and some richly wooded tracts and thriving plantations, add to its attractions. The bay of Carnlough is small but very commodious; and a quay for shipping, erected at an expense of £1200 by the late P. Gibbons, Esq., though now much injured by the sea, has contributed to promote the prosperity of the place.—See ARDCLINIS.

CARNMONEY, a parish, in the union of BELFAST, barony of LOWER BELFAST, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Belfast; containing 6128 inhabitants. This place was anciently called Cool; and according to tradition, near the present church was a town of that name of considerable extent, on the decay of which the parish took its modern name, from an adjoining hill with a large cairn on its summit. It is situated on Carrickfergus Bay, and on the road from Belfast to Londonderry; and comprises 8937½ statute acres, of which about 230 are too mountainous to be cultivated, and the remainder is arable or pasture land, excepting about 70 acres of bog. The land is mostly in a high state of cultivation, especially near the shore; several gentlemen who are practical agriculturists till their own estates, and their improved methods are generally followed by the farmers. Great quantities of limestone are raised in the parish, and are shipped to Scotland and other places. There are extensive factories for spinning flax at Whitehouse (which see), White Abbey, Monkstown, and Mossley, which have entirely superseded the former cotton and printing establishments: these together employ about 2000 persons. The scenery is embellished with some gentlemen's seats; and besides the villages of Whitehouse and White Abbey, the parish contains the village of Ballyduff, in which is a post-office, and where fairs are held in May and November.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, united, it is supposed in 1614, to the vicarage of Ballylinney and the rectory of Ballymartin, together constituting the union of Carnmoney, in the patronage of the Marquess of Donegal. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £157. 10.; and the gross value of the incumbent's union, including the glebe, is £460 per annum. The church, a spacious edifice in good repair, is built on an eminence near the site of a former structure. Another church has been lately erected, at Whitehouse. The glebe-house is a handsome building, erected by aid of a gift of £300 and a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1814; the glebe comprises 80 statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Belfast. There are two meeting-houses for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly: charitable bequests to the amount of £260 have been left, the interest of which is divided annually among poor Presbyterians. There are also places of worship for Covenanters, or members of the Reformed Synod, and for Independents. Near the church is the parochial school, principally supported by the vicar: a very large school-house was built at Whitehouse by the Messrs. Grimshaw, and there are other schools in the parish. About a mile east from the church, near the shore, are the picturesque ruins of a large religious house called White Abbey, from which the townland takes its name, and which was probably the original establishment that was removed to Woodburn: the principal remains are an elegant chapel, in the later Norman or early English style. On the verge of the parish, near Carrickfergus, are the remains of another religious house, called Monkstown, adjoining which is an ancient cemetery, where, according to tradition, Fergus, King of Scotland, who had been shipwrecked in the adjacent bay, was interred.

CARRAN.—See CARRUNE.

CARRENTEEL, or CARNTEEL, a parish, in the barony of DUNGANNON, poor-law unions of CLOGHER and DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Aughnacloy, 7903 inhabitants. This place formed part of the manor of Portlerea, a wide district granted to Sir Thomas Ridgeway, in 1611, by James I., by whose order a fortress called Lismore Bawn was erected here in 1619: of this fortress there are extensive ruins. During the war in 1641, the parish was visited by the contending parties, and the church destroyed; some vestiges of it, however, may still be traced in the ancient cemetery adjoining the village. The parish is situated on the river Blackwater, and on the coach-road from Dublin to Londonderry. Including part of the district parishes of Brantry and Ballygawley, it comprises 13,431½ statute acres, of which 61 are water; the land is chiefly under an excellent system of cultivation, and produces good crops. The northern side of the parish is mountainous, and contains a tract of bog; there are extensive quarries of limestone and freestone of very good quality. The inhabitants, in addition to their agricultural pursuits, employ themselves at home in weaving linen and cotton. Fairs are held in the village, which contains 91 houses, on the first Wednesday in every month, chiefly for cattle and horses.

By order of council under the provisions of an act of the 7th and 8th of George IV., twelve townlands were separated from this parish, in 1830, to form part of the district parish of Ballygawley; and in 1843, two townlands to form part of the district of Brantry. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Armagh, united by charter in 1637 to the rectory and vicarage of Aughaloo, together constituting the union of Carrenteel and corps of the archdeaconry of Armagh, in the patronage of the Lord Primate. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £304. 12. 4., and of the whole union £761. 10. 10. After the destruction of the church of Carrenteel, in 1641, a church was erected near Aughaloo; but it was taken down after the erection of the present church at Aughnacloy, which was built in 1736, at the sole expense of Acheson Moore, Esq.; to which, in 1796, his daughter and heiress, Mrs. Malone, added a tower surmounted by a lofty octagonal spire; and to the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £190. 18. The glebe-house, about half a mile from the church, was erected in 1792, at a cost of £2000; the glebe comprises 1046 statute acres, valued at £599. 7. per annum. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is called Aughy; the chapels are near Aughnacloy and at Caledon and Lisconduff. There are a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and places of worship for Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists. At Garvey are the ruins of an extensive and elegant house erected by the late Col. Moore, and which, very soon after its completion, was suffered to fall into decay; they are situated near those of Lismore Bawn. In the same townland, which is about a mile from Aughnacloy, is a very valuable mineral spring: the water contains sulphur, nitre, magnesia, and steel held in solution with carbonic acid; it has been found efficacious in cutaneous diseases and in dyspeptic complaints: a room has been erected over the spring, and the water issues from a fountain of marble in the centre. Near it is a house for the accommodation of persons frequenting the spa.—See AUGHNACLOY.

CARRICK, a parish, in the poor-law union of EDENDERRY, barony of CARRERY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N.) from Edenderry; containing 552 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Edenderry to Kinneag, and on the banks of the river Boyne; and comprises 5196½ statute acres: the land is in a good state of cultivation, and the system of husbandry greatly improved; there is still, however, a considerable tract of bog. Here are some excellent limestone quarries, and at Ballindolan is a quarry of black flag-stone. A fair is held at Russel Wood on the 28th of August. Carrick is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and is part of the union of Carbery; the rectory is inappropriate in the Marquess of Downshire. The tithe rent-charge is £112. 7. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Cadamstown. There are some remains of the castle of Carrig, the residence of the Bermingham family; and of the old church, their burial-place; also the ruins of Kinnefad, another residence of that family.

CARRICK, or CARRICKBAGGOT, a parish, in the poor-law union of DROGHEDA, barony of FERRARD, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. S. E.) from Dunleer; containing 302 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the coast-road from Drogheda to Dundalk, contains 826½ statute acres, chiefly arable land, and includes part of the demesne of Rokeby Hall. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and is part of the union of Rathdrummin: the tithe rent-charge is £43. 1. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Clogher. There are some remains of the old church.

CARRICK, a parish, in the barony of FARTULLAGH, union of MULLINGAR, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 5½ miles (S. by W.) from Mullingar; containing 576 inhabitants. This parish is situated upon Lough Ennel, by which it is bounded on the north and west; and contains 2957 statute acres, principally under tillage, with very little bog: there is a considerable and sudden elevation of the land above the lough. Carrick is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and is part of the ecclesiastical union of Moylisher: the tithe rent-charge is £57. In the Roman Catholic divisions, part of the parish is in the district of Fartullagh, and the remainder in that of Mullingar. Numerous raths are scattered over the surface; near Carrick are the remains of an old church, and near Robinstown those of an old castle.

CARRICK, or CARRIG, in the union of WEXFORD, barony of BARGY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (S.S.W.) from Taghmon. This place, which is situated near the southern coast, is also called St. Imock's, and by the country people Shamogues. It was originally a parish in every respect, but is now only known as a parish in the civil divisions, having been long since ecclesiastically incorporated with the parish of Bannow, in the diocese of Ferns. The village is called Danescastle: from its proximity to the coast, it is much frequented during the summer season for sea-bathing; and a car running to Wexford leaves three mornings in the week, and returns in the afternoon. A receiving-house here for letters is in connexion with Taghmon. The land is chiefly under tillage; and the system of agriculture has been greatly improved within the last few years. At Barrystown, near the village, are vestiges of ancient lead-mines, the ore of which is said to have contained a very large proportion of silver, whence probably it is that they have been traditionally called silver-mines. In the Roman Catholic divisions this place forms part of the district of Ballynitty: the chapel, a neat edifice, is at Danescastle; and in the chapel-yard is a comfortable residence for the clergyman. At a short distance from the village is a lofty square tower, the erection of which is attributed to the earliest of the Norman settlers; it has much of the gloomy character of that period.

CARRICK-A-REDE.—See BALLINTOY.

CARRICKART, a village in the parish of MEVAGH, union of MILFORD, barony of KILMACRENAN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 9 miles (N. N. W.) from Ramelton; containing 317 inhabitants. It is situated between Mulroy bay and Sheep haven.

CARRICKASHEE, an island, in the parish of INNISKELL, union of GLENTIER, barony of BOVLACH, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER. It lies in Gweebarra bay.

CARRICK-BEG, a suburb to the town of Carrick-on-Suir, and formerly an incorporated town, in the parish of KILMOLERAN, union of CARRICK-ON-SUIR, barony of UPPERTHIRD, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER; containing 2680 inhabitants. This place, the name of which signifies Little Carrick, was formerly called Carrick-mac-Griffin; it is situated on the south side of the river Suir, over which is an ancient stone bridge connecting it with Carrick. From a grant of restoration of murage and pontage to the provost and commonalty of the "town of Carrick-mac-Griffin," made in the 18th of Edward III., dated 12th July 1344, it would appear to have been a borough. A friary for Conventual Franciscans dedicated to St. Michael, was founded here in the year 1336, by James Butler, Earl of Ormonde, to whose great-grandfather, Theobald, the lands of Carrick-mac-Griffin had been granted. The first warden was John Clyn, a Franciscan friar of Kilkenney; he wrote short annals from the birth of Christ to the year 1315, and from that year continued them more copiously and carefully to the year 1349, when he died of the plague. This establishment flourished till the Dissolution, when it was granted with all its possessions to the Earl of Ormonde. Of the ancient buildings, the tower of the church is almost the only remaining portion: it is square and nearly perfect, projecting considerably beyond the foundation on which it rests, for it is based on a single stone, from which it rises in the form of a truncated pyramid inverted; a fine flight of spiral steps in the wall leads to the summit. The monastery itself, which was a large and very irregular structure, has been taken down; and a modern chapel, now the parish chapel, has been erected on the site: the chief entrance is under an arch of very elegant design, which had been preserved from the ruins of the ancient building. A new Franciscan friary was erected near the site of the former in 1822, by the Rev. Michael Fleming, afterwards Roman Catholic Bishop of Newfoundland: the friary chapel is in the later English style, and faced with hewn stone; the principal entrance is of handsome design; above it is a well-sculptured figure of a saint, and at the opposite extremity, a tower erected in imitation of that of the old abbey. The ceilings of both chapels are richly and delicately groined. The woollen manufacture was formerly carried on very extensively, affording employment to a great number of the population; but within the last 40 years it has gradually been falling to decay. Fairs are held on Jan. 26th, Feb. 26th, March 25th, April 28th, June 15th, July 15th, Sept. 27th, Nov. 7th, and Dec. 5th. A constabulary police force is stationed here.

CARRICKDUFF, a village, in the parish of BARRAGH, union of ENNISCORRY, barony of FORTH, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Myshall; containing 243 inhabitants. It is situated on the river, and near the bridge, of Clody, on the road to Newtownbarry.

CARRICKFERGUS, a sea-port, borough, and market and post town, a parish, and a county of itself, in the union of LARNE, and locally in the county of ANTRIM, of which it was the ancient capital and is still the county town, 88 miles (N.) from Dublin; containing 9379 inhabitants, of whom 3885 are in the town. This place, which is of great antiquity, is by some writers identified with the ancient Dun-Sobarky or Dun-Sobairchia, a place so called, according to Dr. Charles O'Connor, from a prince named Sobairchius, who made it his residence; but the correctness of this supposition is doubted by other writers. It is thought to have derived its present name, signifying "The Rock of Fergus," early in the fourth century, from Fergus Mac Erch, a chieftain of Dalairadia, who established the first Irish settlement on the opposite coast of Caledonia. An ancient triad quoted by Dr. O'Connor records that St. Patrick blessed a tower or stronghold of the Dalairadians, in which was a well of miraculous efficacy, called Tippa Phadruic, "The well of St. Patrick." It is uncertain at what period the castle was originally erected; the present structure, from the style of its architecture, was evidently built soon after the arrival of the English. John, Earl of Morton and Lord of Ireland, was here in the lifetime of his father, Henry II., from whom John De Courcy had received a grant of all the lands he might conquer in Ulster; and the earl's despatch to the king, dated at Carrickfergus, in which he mentions his having taken the castle, is extant among the MSS. in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, written in Latin. This castle, with subsequent additions, is still remaining, and is justly considered one of the noblest fortresses of that time now existing in Ireland. De Courcy having fallen into disgrace with the succeeding monarch, his castles and possessions in this county fell into the hands of the De Lacy family, who, becoming tyrannical and oppressive, incurred the anger of King John. During the contentions which arose among the English settlers, after they had established themselves in the country, this place suffered so much that Hugh de Lacy the younger, who, on the restoration of his family to the royal favour, repaired the town and strengthened it by the introduction of new settlers, has even been regarded as its founder. In 1234 Carrickfergus is mentioned as one of the haven towns of Ulster; but from that period till shortly after the commencement of the 14th century, little of its history is known.

The De Lacys again becoming obnoxious to the English monarch, and the Lord-Justice Mortimer being sent against them with a considerable force, they made their escape into Scotland; and invited EDWARD BRUCE, the brother of the Scottish monarch, to invade the country, and become their king. Accordingly, in 1315, Bruce embarked 6000 men at Ayr, and, accompanied by the De Lacys, and several of the Scottish nobility, landed at Wolderfrith, now Oldelfert, where, being joined by numbers of the Irish chieftains, he routed Richard de Burgo, now Earl of Ulster, who had been sent against him; and having slain several of the English nobles and taken many of them prisoners, he advanced to lay siege to the castle of this place. During the siege, Thomas, Lord Mandeville, who commanded the garrison, made a sally on the assailants, whom he repulsed at the first onset; but, being recognised by the richness of his armour, he was felled to the ground by the blow of a battle-axe, and instantly killed. The garrison, disheartened by the loss of their commander, agreed to surrender the castle within a limited time: on the appointed day, however, 30 of the Scottish forces, advancing to take possession, were seized as prisoners, the garrison declaring that they would defend the place to the last; but for want of provisions they were soon obliged to surrender. Bruce having secured Carrickfergus, marched towards Dublin, and arrived at Castleknock, within four miles of the city; but finding the citizens prepared for his reception, he entered the county of Kildare, and advanced in the direction of Limerick, laying waste the country with fire and sword. On his retreating towards the north he was attacked near Dundalk by Sir John Bermingham, who defeated the Scottish forces and killed their leader. King Robert Bruce arrived soon after with a strong reinforcement, but on learning the fate of his brother, returned to his own dominions, and thus terminated an enterprise which had thrown the country into a state of unprecedented desolation.

After the evacuation of the country by the Scots, Carrickfergus reverted to its former possessors; but the desultory warfare carried on at intervals for successive ages in the north of Ireland, during which its strength and situation rendered the town the centre of operations, subjected it to many severe calamities. In 1333, William, Earl of Ulster, was assassinated here by his own servants; and his countess, with her infant daughter, fleeing into England, the O'Nials, the original lords of the soil, immediately succeeded in expelling the English settlers, and for a time retained possession of the place. In 1386 the town was burned by the Scots; and in 1400 it was again destroyed, by the combined forces of the Scots and Irish. In 1481 a commission was granted to the mayor and others, to enter into a league with the Earl of Ross, Lord of the Isles, who had usurped the sovereignty of the Hebrides from the Scottish crown. In 1497, the town and neighbourhood were visited by famine; and in 1504 it was resolved that none but an Englishman should be entrusted with the custody of the castle, or with that of Green Castle in the county of Down. The town continued for many years to be a stronghold of the English, and even when the English government was so reduced as to be scarcely able to maintain a standing army of 140 horse within the English pale, the castle remained in their possession. In 1573 the corporation addressed a remonstrance to the Lord-Deputy Fitzwilliam, representing that one-third of the town was then in ruins; and, in the summer of the same year, it was still further desolated by fire. In this condition it remained for many years; though the Earl of Essex landed here with his train, on taking possession of the government of Ulster, to which he had been appointed; and though Sir Henry Sidney, the succeeding lord-deputy, gave the English council a forcible representation of its deplorable state, in the account of his northern expedition two years afterwards. The particular events by which it had been reduced to desolation are detailed in a Discourse of Knockfergus, preserved among the Cottonian manuscripts in the British Museum, and in which its calamities are ascribed to an early quarrel with Bryan Ballough, chieftain of the adjoining territory of Claneboy, whose son and successor continued to harass the inhabitants till they were compelled to purchase peace by consenting to pay an annual tribute; to the repeated devastating incursions of the Scots; to the continued depredations of the O'Nials and Mac Donnells; and to various other causes. The Lord-Deputy, Sir Henry Sidney, made great efforts for the improvement and security of the town; but so greatly were the resources of the townsmen reduced that, in 1581, Lord Grey, then deputy, found it necessary to issue an express edict prohibiting them from paying to the Irish lord of the country the tribute hitherto paid to the successors of Bryan Ballough, and called, in that document, "Breyne Balaf's Eric."

The extensive privileges, however, enjoyed by the inhabitants of the place, and the protection afforded by new fortifications, soon caused an increase in its population and importance. On the breaking out of the war in 1641, Sir Henry Mac Neill was to have surprised the town, but was defeated by the vigilance of Colonel Arthur Chichester, the governor; and it now became one of the principal places of refuge for the Protestants of the neighbouring counties. In 1642, the town and castle were, according to agreement, delivered up to General Monroe, who, having landed with 2500 Scottish auxiliaries, to carry on the war against the Irish, made this place his head-quarters till 1648. In that year he was taken by surprise in the castle, and sent prisoner to England by General Monk, who was, by the parliament, appointed governor in his place, and rewarded with a gratuity of £500; in the year following, the castle, which had been surrendered to the Earl of Inchiquin, was reduced for Cromwell by Sir Charles Coote. In 1666 the garrison mutinied, seized the castle and the town, and acted with such desperate resolution that the government, alarmed at their excesses, sent the Earl of Ardra, son of the Duke of Ormonde, by sea, to reduce them; and the latter nobleman marching also against them with the few forces on whose fidelity he could rely, the mutineers, after some resistance, surrendered; 110 of them were tried by a court-martial, of whom nine were executed; and the companies to which they belonged were disbanded. In the early part of 1689, an attempt was made by the Protestant inhabitants of the neighbourhood to take this fortress, which was then held by the troops of James II., but without success: in the course of the year, however, Schomberg, William's general, invested it with a large force, and the garrison, after having exhausted all their ammunition, surrendered. In 1690 William III. landed here to take the command of his army; and from this time the town was distinguished by any historical event till the year 1760, when it was attacked by the French, under the command of Thurot. The gates were quickly closed; but though General Flobert, who led the assault, was wounded, the garrison, consisting only of one hundred men, was soon obliged to capitulate for want of ammunition. The country people, however, supported by reinforcements from the interior, rose on all sides to repel the assailants; and on the approach of an English squadron, which had been despatched on the first intelligence of the projected invasion, the French, after supplying themselves with provisions and water, hastily re-embarked, taking with them three of the principal inhabitants, who were afterwards found on board the commander's ship, when she struck to the English off the Isle of Man. In 1778, the celebrated Paul Jones appeared off the town, but did not land, contenting himself with the capture of an armed vessel that had been sent to attack him. In 1785 his late Majesty William IV., when lieutenant on board the ship of Commodore Gower, arrived in the bay; on which occasion the Carrickfergus volunteers solicited the honour of forming a body guard for his Royal Highness, which was courteously declined.

The town is situated on the north-western shore of Carrickfergus bay, or Belfast Lough, along which it extends for nearly a mile. It comprises three portions; the town within the walls, and two suburbs called respectively the Irish and the Scottish quarters; the Irish quarter situated to the west, along the road leading to Belfast; and the Scottish to the north-east, stretching along the road to Larne and Island-Magee, and inhabited by the descendants of a colony of fishermen from Argyll and Galloway, who took refuge here from the persecutions of 1665. The town within the walls was formerly entered by four gates, of which only the remains of the North or Spittal gate now exist; of the walls there is yet a considerable portion on the north and west sides in a very perfect state. The entire town contains 674 houses, built chiefly of stone and roofed with slate; several of superior character have been built within the last forty years, during which period considerable improvements have taken place. The castle, which is in good preservation, and during the disturbances of 1798 was used as a state prison, is situated on a rock projecting boldly into the sea, by which it is surrounded on three sides at high water; this rock is 30 feet in height at its southern extremity, and declines considerably towards the land. The outer walls of the castle are adapted to the irregularities of the surface of the rock; and the entrance is defended by two semi-circular towers, with a portcullis and machicolation above. In the interior are barracks for the reception of two companies of foot and a few artillerymen. The keep is a square tower 90 feet high, the lower part of which is bomb-proof and is used as a magazine; in the third story is an apartment 40 feet long, 38 feet wide, and 26 feet high, called Fergus's Dining-room. The well in this tower, anciently celebrated for its miraculous efficacy, is now nearly filled up; a quantity of old iron was taken out of it many years since, from which it may have derived its medicinal properties. The castle was formerly governed by a constable, who had very extensive powers; the establishment now consists only of a governor and a master-gunner. Musical societies once existed, and occasional assemblies were held, in the town; but the only source of public amusement at present is a sporting club. Though formerly celebrated for its trade and commerce, this place has never been distinguished for the extent of its manufactures: some few, however, are carried on with success. The linen manufacture, which was the staple, has, within the last 60 years, been superseded by that of cotton; there are two cotton-spinning factories; and many persons are engaged in weaving checks, ginghams, and other cotton goods, for the manufacturers of Belfast and Glasgow. There are also two mills for spinning linen-yarn, and an extensive whisky distillery, with mills, malt-kilns, and other conveniences, on an improved system: the tanning of leather, which was introduced here at an early period, is still carried on to a great extent. The vicinity affords numerous advantageous sites for the establishment of manufactories: a considerable water power is supplied by the Woodburn and Sulla-tober rivers, and by the water of Lough Morne; there are 1070 feet of waterfalls, calculated at 676-horse power, and of which by far the greater part is unoccupied.

The fishery in the bay constitutes the chief employment of the poorer inhabitants of the suburbs, and the boats fitted out from the two quarters differ in their construction and the mode of working them. Those from the Irish quarter, of which there are about seven or eight, with four men each, are smack-rigged, and work by trawling or dredging; the fish generally taken is plaice, but skate, sole, and lythe or pollock are occasionally caught, and lobsters and oysters of very large size and good flavour are also dredged. The boats from the Scottish quarter are small and without decks, of not more than two or three tons' burthen, rigged with a fore and main lug-sail, and occasionally worked with oars to the number of six in winter and four in summer: in the latter season from 16 to 20 boats, carrying four or six persons each, are generally employed, and both lines and nets are used; but in the former, when lines are principally used, the number of hands is increased to nine or ten. The fish chiefly taken by these boats are, cod, ling, hake, lythe, and herrings; lobsters are also caught, and kept in traps or baskets. The town derives also an accession of TRADE from its being frequented as a bathing-place during summer; and from the assizes, sessions, and parliamentary elections for the county of Antrim, being held in it. Owing to the privilege of importing merchandise at lower duties than were paid throughout the rest of the country, its commerce was formerly very extensive, and its returns were greater than those of any other port in Ireland; but this privilege was sold to the crown in 1637, and the trade was immediately transferred to Belfast, to which place even the produce of its cotton manufacture is sent for exportation. It is now a member of the port of Belfast, under which head the registry of its vessels and the duties paid at the custom-house are included. The trade consists principally of the importation of coal, and the exportation of cattle, and occasionally of grain.

THE HARBOUR is situated in latitude $54^{\circ} 42' 45''$ (N.) and longitude $5^{\circ} 47'$ (W.), $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles N. W. by W. from the Copeland Islands' lighthouse. It is of little benefit, being formed by a pier extending from the old castle, in a western direction, to a distance of 460 feet only, and within about 400 feet of low-water mark at spring tides: even at high water it affords only a depth of from six to nine feet, so that vessels of more than 100 tons cannot approach the quay; it is also subject to the accumulation of mud and sand. A handsome pier was erected for the use of the fishermen, in 1834, at an expense of £2600, defrayed by a grant from government and by local subscriptions. The port is sheltered by land from the prevailing south and west winds; and though winds from the other points produce a certain degree of swell in the offing, yet, from the situation of the Copeland Islands and Kilroot Point, it is so protected as not to be open seaward more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ points of the compass. But the imperfections of the harbour greatly restrict the trade of the port. A plan and report were drawn up by Sir John Rennie, for constructing a new harbour outside the present, so as to insure a depth of 15 feet at low water of spring tides; the estimate for which, including the construction of works for protecting it against the accumulation of sand, and for the requisite accommodation of the shipping, was £55,150. These improvements, from a variety of causes, would render the port one of the most thriving and convenient in the north of Ireland, and a useful auxiliary to the flourishing town of Belfast. A new road leading to Doagh, Templepatrick, and Antrim, lately completed, affords the means of a direct conveyance of grain from an extensive tract to this port, and opens a market for the consumption of coal, groceries, and other commodities imported. An act was obtained in 1845, for constructing a railway from Belfast to Ballymena, with a branch of about three British miles to Carrickfergus. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on May 12th and Nov. 1st. The market-house, built by subscription in 1755, was also till lately used for the meetings of the "Assembly," or aldermen and burgesses of the corporation. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Lisburn. A branch of the Northern Bank is established here.

The incorporation of the town as a county of itself is ascribed by tradition to King John; the shrievalty was originally held jointly with that of the county of Antrim. But although it existed as a separate county long prior to the time of Elizabeth, the charter of the 11th of her reign is the earliest on record containing such incorporation. Its boundaries are described in this charter and in one of the 7th of James I., with a reservation of the castle and its precincts, of the ancient liberties and royalties appertaining to the castle, and of sites for a sessions-house and prison for the county of Antrim; the latter charter also excluded from the county of the town certain lands which had been granted and confirmed to the corporation by charter of the 44th of Elizabeth. The franchise now acknowledged is stated to differ from both, and to be in conformity with a riding of the franchises made by the corporation in 1785. In 1810 it was decided, on an issue tried at the assizes, that the lands of Straid and Little Ballymena, described by the charter of Elizabeth as being within the boundary, but by the charter of James as being without, were, though belonging to the corporation, not within the franchise. This is probably a borough by prescription: the earliest notice of the existence of a CORPORATION is in the record of a commission dated 1274, in which year the Scots landed on the neighbouring coast to assist the O'Neills against the English. Henry IV., in 1402, on the petition of the mayor and three burgesses, released them, for one year, from the payment of the annual rent of 100s. for the customs; to aid them in rebuilding the town, which had been burned by his enemies. Queen Elizabeth, in the 11th of her reign (1569), on a representation of the inhabitants that they had lost their letters-patent in the disturbances and persecutions of rebels and enemies, by which they were deprived of the enjoyment of their franchises, granted a charter of incorporation, conferring on them, besides several special immunities, all such other privileges and jurisdictions as the corporation of Drogheda possessed. It also ordained that they should hold the borough of the queen, as of her castle of Knockfergus, at an annual rent of 10s. payable half-yearly, until the fortifications should be repaired and a grant of lands made, and then at a rent of £40 per annum. The grant of lands was conferred by charter of the 44th of Elizabeth, founded on an inquisition issued to ascertain the quantity which had previously belonged to the corporation. James I., in addition to the charter of the 7th of his reign, before noticed, granted others in the 10th and 20th, the former of which became the governing charter, and the latter created fourteen persons and their successors a corporation, by the style of the "Mayor, Constables, and Society of the Merchants of the Staple." In the "new rules" of the 25th of Charles II., for regulating corporations in Ireland, it was ordained that the appointment of the mayor, recorder, sheriffs, and town-clerk, should be subject to the approbation of the lord-lieutenant and privy council.

The corporation, previously to its late dissolution, was styled "the Mayor, Sheriffs, Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town of Carrickfergus." It consisted of the mayor (who was an alderman), 16 other aldermen, two sheriffs (who were burgesses), 23 other burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen; assisted by a recorder and town-clerk (who was also clerk of the peace), two coroners, three town-serjeants, a water-bailiff, sword-bearer, and other officers. The charter of the 10th of James I. granted a guild-merchant within the town, and ordained that all the merchants should be a corporation, by the name of the "Two Masters and Fellows of the Guild-Merchant of the Town of Knockfergus," the masters to be elected annually from and by the merchants of the guild, on the Monday after the feast of St. Michael, with power to make by-laws and impose fines. The guilds latterly remaining were those of the Hammermen, Weavers, Carters, Taylors and Glovers, Butchers, Trawlers and Dredgers, Hookers, and Shoemakers or Cordwainers, incorporated at different periods; but their restrictive privileges in trade had been abandoned as impolitic or useless, and they were kept up only in form. The mayor was elected annually from among the aldermen, at an assembly of the corporation at large, on the 24th of June, and by the charter was ordered to be sworn before the constable of the castle, or, in his absence, before the vice-constable, and in the presence of the mayor for the preceding year, on Michaelmas-day; he had power, with the assent of a majority of the aldermen, to depute one of that body to be vice-mayor in his absence. The aldermen, who might be from eight to sixteen in number, were chosen, on vacancies occurring, from the 24 burgesses by the remaining aldermen, and were removable for misbehaviour by a majority of the body. The sheriffs were by charter to be elected from the free burgesses by the mayor, sheriffs, burgesses, and commonalty, annually on the 24th of June; and were to be sworn on the feast of St. Michael, before the mayor and burgesses. The burgesses, who are not mentioned by any of the charters as a definite class in the corporation, and who were originally unlimited in number, were latterly restricted to 24, and, according to practice, were elected in an assembly of the mayor, sheriffs, and remaining burgesses, neither freedom nor residence being requisite as a qualification; they were supposed, like the aldermen, to hold during good behaviour. The freemen were admissible, in courts of the whole corporation held before the mayor, by the right of birth extending to all the sons of freemen, also by marriage, apprenticeship to a freeman within the county of the town, and by gift of the corporation: among other privileges granted by charter to the freemen, but most of which had been disused long before the dissolution of the corporation, it was ordained that no person should be attached or arrested in the house of a freeman, except for treason or felony. The recorder was by charter to be chosen by the mayor, sheriffs, burgesses, and commonalty, to hold his office either for life, for a term of years, or at the will of the corporation, as might be deemed expedient, but was usually elected for life: he might, with the consent of the mayor and a majority of the aldermen, appoint a deputy to execute the office. The town-clerk was elected by the whole body, and held his office during pleasure. The coroners, by the charter, were to be chosen by the mayor, sheriffs, burgesses, and commonalty, from the inhabitants, annually on the same day with the mayor and sheriffs, or any other deemed more expedient; but in practice it was considered that they ought to be elected from the freemen, and they appear to have held office for life or good behaviour. A treasurer, who was originally the mayor for the time being, was latterly appointed by the assembly, and was usually an alderman. The "assembly" was composed of the mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and burgesses, who managed all the affairs of the corporation; they assumed the power of making by-laws, and of demising the property of the corporation. This body continued to exercise all its rights, privileges, and immunities, until the passing of the act for Regulating Municipal Corporations, 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108, when it was dissolved; and all the property it possessed was vested in a board of commissioners, until such time as the Lighting act, 9th George IV., shall come into operation, or until a new charter shall be granted. A sheriff is still appointed, by the Lord Lieutenant.

The charters of Elizabeth and James confirmed to this borough the right of sending two representatives to the Irish parliament, which it continued to exercise till the Union, since which period it has returned one to the Imperial parliament. The elective franchise was formerly vested in the mayor, aldermen, burgesses, and freemen of the town, and in the freeholders to the amount of 40s. per annum and upwards in the county of the town; amounting, in Jan., 1832, to about 850: but by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 88, the non-resident freemen, except within seven miles, were disfranchised, and the privilege was extended to the £10 householders and the £20 and £10 leaseholders for the respective terms of 14 and 20 years; the 40s. freeholders were allowed to retain the franchise for life only. The number of voters registered in 1843 was 1053, of whom 26 were freeholders, 167 householders, and 560 freemen.

The mayor (as also his deputy or vice-mayor) was a justice of the peace within the town, and was further (without mention of the vice-mayor) constituted a justice of the peace throughout the county of the town, being empowered, with the recorder, to hold courts of session and gaol delivery. He was admiral of the liberties, which extended northward to Fair Head and southward to Beerlooms, about 40 miles in each direction, with the exception only of Bangor and the Pool of Garmoyle; and might issue attachments against ships and cargoes, or against persons on board, for the recovery of debts wherever contracted. He was also a magistrate for the county of Antrim, and he or his deputy was judge of the tholsel court: he was appointed custos rotulorum of the county of the town, and was escheator, master of the assays, and clerk of the market; and the charter empowered him to grant licences for ships coming to the port, upon entering, to buy or forestall merchandise, and also for the salting of hides, fish, &c. The recorder was a justice of the peace within the county and county of the town; he was the assessor of the mayor in the tholsel court, and he or his deputy was judge of the court leet and view of frank-pledge to be held in the town twice a year, within a month after Easter and Michaelmas. In 1828, on the petition of the inhabitants, two additional justices were appointed by the Lord-Lieutenant, under the powers of the act of the 7th of George IV., cap. 61. The corporation had not any exclusive jurisdiction over matters arising within the borough, except that which resulted from its forming a county of itself: the courts were those of assize, and quarter and petty sessions; also a tholsel court, a sheriffs' or county court, a court leet with view of frank-pledge, and a court of pie-poudre. The assizes for the county of the town were held at the usual periods before the mayor, with whom the other judges of assize were associated in commission; since 1817 they had been held in the county of Antrim court-house, under the act of the 28th of George III., cap. 38, confirmed by several succeeding statutes. The quarter-sessions were held before the mayor, recorder, and the two additional justices, in the market-house, which had been appropriated for that purpose on the building called the Tholsel being taken down: the court had jurisdiction over all felonies and minor offences committed within the county of the town, with power to inflict capital punishment, which, however, was not exercised, offences of a serious kind being referred to the judges of assize. The tholsel court, which was a court of record having jurisdiction over the county of the town to an unlimited amount of pleas in personal actions, was by the charter to be held every Monday and Friday, but was latterly held only on the former day; it was empowered to proceed by summons, attachment (which was the usual form), distingas, or any other process, on affidavit before the mayor, whose presence was only deemed necessary in the event of a trial, which seldom took place. Petty-sessions are held once a week. The assistant barrister for the county of Antrim holds his courts here for trying causes by civil bill; and the assizes, and two of the quarter-sessions, for the county of Antrim, are held here. The local police consists of one constable and three sub-constables, appointed and paid by the grand jury of assize; and of twelve unpaid constables appointed at the court leet.

The charter granted one-third part of the customs' dues of the port to the corporation, who enjoyed great advantages under this privilege, which, in the year 1637, they surrendered to the crown in consideration of a sum of £3000, to be paid to trustees and invested in land: from its non-investment, however, the town has been deprived of any permanent benefit accruing from this grant. The charter of the 10th of James I. also bestowed the right of fishery in the river, and a ferry over it, with various fines, waifs, wrecks of the sea, forfeitures, &c., arising within the liberties. The revenue of the corporation, at their dissolution, appears notwithstanding to have arisen exclusively from rents reserved out of their property in lands, amounting to about £359 late currency. The corporation court-house and gaol were at "Castle Worraigh" previously to 1776, in which year the county of Antrim grand jury exchanged their gaol and court-house in the vicinity of the castle of Carrickfergus for "Castle Worraigh," on the site of which, part of the present court-house for that county was built. The corporation continued to use the old gaol of the county of Antrim until 1827, when prisoners under criminal charges were removed from it to the new gaol; and after the passing of an act for regulating prisons, the old Tholsel having become ruinous, a new arrangement was entered into between the respective grand juries of Carrickfergus and Antrim, by which the former pay, in lieu of all charges, "£13 for every 365 days of a prisoner confined in the county of Antrim gaol." The court-house for the county of Antrim is a neat building fronted with hewn stone, situated at the east end of the main street; and adjoining it, on the north side, is the gaol, which contains 50 cells, six day-rooms, and six yards, for an average of 250 prisoners.

The county of the town extends about five statute miles along the shore, and its mean length and breadth are nearly equal; it comprises 16,700a. 1r. 34p., including Lough Morne, which comprises 89a. 3r. 22p. Lough Morne, or More, about three miles north of the town, is said to be the largest in Ireland at the same elevation, which is 556 feet above the level of the sea; it has a powerful spring near the centre, and is well stored with eels and pike. The principal streams, all of which take a nearly direct course into the bay, are, the Woodburn, which is formed by the union of two rivulets about two miles above the town (each having a picturesque cascade), and supplies two large cotton-mills, a flour and corn mill, and a large mill for spinning linen-yarn near the town; the Orland Water, which descends from Lough Morne, and falls into the bay at the eastern suburb; the Sulla-Tober, which falls into the bay near the same place; the Copeland Water, which forms the eastern boundary of the county; the Silver Stream, which bounds it on the south-west; and the Red River. In all of these are found black and white trout, eels, and stickleback. The surface of the district is studded with the villages of Eden or Edengreun, Clippertown, Woodburn, and Bonnybefore; with several hamlets; numerous gentlemen's seats scattered along the shore, and surrounded with ornamental plantations; and several farmhouses of comfortable appearance interspersed throughout.

The parish is co-extensive with the county of the town. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, united, by charter of the 7th of James I., with the rectories of Island-Magee and Ralloo, the vicarage of Inver, and the grange of Moylusk or Moblusk, the whole till lately constituting the corps of the deanery of Connor, in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £300; and the gross annual income of the deanery, tithe and glebe inclusive, before the passing of the rent-charge act was £1004. 7. The income was much reduced by that act, and by the recent formation of Island-Magee, Ralloo, and Inver, into separate benefices. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is an ancient cruciform structure, with a tower surmounted by a lofty spire; it is said to have been erected on the site of a pagan temple, and appears to have been attached to the Franciscan monastery formerly existing here. The chancel is embellished with a representation of the Baptism of Christ, in painted glass. The north aisle was the property and burial-place of the family of Chichester; having fallen into a ruinous condition, it was parted by a wall from the rest of the church, but in 1830 it was given to the parishioners by the Marquess of Dougal, the head of that family, and fitted up as free sittings for the poor. It contains a large mural monument, with effigies of several of the Chichesters; and round the walls were formerly armorial bearings and trophies, of which only a few fragments are remaining. The subterraneous passage under the altar, which communicated with the ancient monastery, may still be traced. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £141 for the repair of this church. There is no deanery-house: the glebe lands are let for £32. 7. per annum. In the Roman Catholic division the parish forms part of the district of Larne and Carrickfergus; the chapel, in the western suburbs, was erected in 1826. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly (a large and handsome edifice), Wesleyan Methodists, Independents, and a small congregation of Covenanters; also one lately built for Unitarians.

The Diocesan free grammar school, founded here by Queen Elizabeth, was discontinued about 45 years since. A free school for boys and girls is supported by a bequest of £42 per annum by the late E. D. Wilson, Esq., arising from lands in the borough: by the testator's will, the children are required to attend every Sunday in the Established Church. There are several other day schools in the town and parish. In 1811 a Sunday school was opened in the town, which for several years was the only one, and was attended by 400 children and 30 gratuitous teachers; but it has partially declined, from the institution of other schools in the neighbourhood, in connexion with the Established Church and the several dissenting congregations. In 1761, Henry Gill, Esq., bequeathed £10 per annum each, arising from property in the borough, "to fourteen aged men decayed in their circumstances;" and also houses and gardens to such of them as might not have residences. This sum, by an increase in the value of the property, has been augmented to £14 each late Irish currency, or £12. 18. 6. sterling, which is annually received by fourteen aged men, ten of whom have also houses. In 1782, William Adair, Esq., of Westminster, gave £2000 three per cent. stock, in trust to the Adairs, proprietors of the Ballymena estate, the interest to be distributed among the poorer freemen, nineteen of whom received annually £3. 3. each; but at present the sum distributed to each vary in proportion to the necessities of the several families. There are also several minor charitable bequests. In 1826 a mendicity association was established, which is supported by subscription; and there are societies for the distribution of clothing among the poor, and for other benevolent purposes.

The Franciscan monastery above noticed as connected with the parish church, was founded in 1232, and became of so much importance, that in 1282 a general chapter of the whole order was convoked here: it stood within the walls of the town, and its site is at present occupied by the gaol for the county of Antrim. Immediately to the west of the town was the Pramonstratensian priory of Goodburn or Woodburn, on the western bank of that stream; it was dedicated to the Holy Cross, and its foundation is attributed to a member of the family of Bisset, who had quitted Scotland about the year 1242, in consequence of the murder of the Duke of Athol. Adjoining the eastern suburb was the hospital of St. Bridget, said to have been founded for the reception of lepers; the lands adjoining the site are still called the Spital parks. To the north of the town a well, now called Bride-well, marks the site of another hospital dedicated to St. Bridget. Several silver coins, of the reign of Henry II., have been found about the castle. There are numerous barrows or tumuli scattered over the face of the county of the town, some of which have been opened, and found to contain rude urns, ashes, and human bones; the largest of these, which are chiefly sepulchral, is called Duncree, or the "fortress of blood." At Slieve-True is a cairn, 77 yards in circumference and 20 feet high; a little towards the west of the same mountain is another, of nearly equal dimensions; and about a mile to the north-east is a third, exactly similar.

In several places are artificial caves, probably intended as places of concealment. At a place called the Friar's Rock are traces of small circular buildings, supposed to have been friars' cells; and about two miles north-west of the town are the ruins of two churches, called respectively Killyan, or Anue's Church, and Carrnaway. The mineral springs, though not very numerous, are of various qualities; one of these, in the bed of a stream, in the eastern part of the town, is a nitrous purgative water; another, about a mile to the east of it, is a fine saline spring; and the waters of another, near the western bank of Lough Morue, are sulphureous and chalybeate, and were once in great repute for their efficacy. Among the distinguished persons born here may be noticed Bishop Tension, and Richard Kane, a general in the army of William III. The women of the Scottish quarter and the county adjacent commonly retain their maiden surnames after marriage.

CARRICK-McQUIGLEY, a village, in the parish of UPPER MOVILLE, union and barony of ENNISHOWEN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Moville: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated near Lough Foyle, on the road from Derry to Moville. A grant of a market and four fairs was made to the inhabitants in the reign of Charles I.; the market has long been discontinued, and the fairs are very indifferently attended. Near the village are several handsome gentlemen's seats.

CARRICKMACROSS, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of FARNEY, county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER, 20 miles (S.E. by S.) from Monaghan, and 40 (N.W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 13,444 inhabitants, of whom 1997 are in the town. This place derives its name from its situation on a rock and from one of its early proprietors, and is the only town in the barony. The barony was granted by Queen Elizabeth to the Earl of Essex, who resided in the castle here, part of the walls of which are still standing: the lands were leased by the earl to Mr. Barton, whose wife and children were burnt, with the castle, by the insurgents of 1641, while he was attending his parliamentary duties in Dublin, as representative of the county of Monaghan. The town is situated on the coach-road from Duhlin to Londonderry, and consists of one principal street, with some smaller streets or lanes branching from it; it contains 371 houses, many of which are of respectable appearance. A good retail trade is carried on with the surrounding country; and soap, candles, hrogues, and coarse hats, are manufactured in the town, in which there are also a tanyard and two large distilleries. Distillation was carried on here to a considerable extent before the Union, for 20 years; after which it very much declined; but, in 1823, a large distillery was erected, and subsequently another distillery was commenced in the premises of a brewery, which had been discontinued. The general market is held on Thursday, and one for corn on Wednesday and Saturday: the number of pigs exposed for sale at the market, during the season, is very great; they are principally purchased by dealers from Dandalk, Newry, and Belfast, for exportation. Fairs are held on May 27th, July 10th, Sept. 27th, Nov. 9th, and Dec. 10th; those in May and December, the latter of which is for fat-cattle, are the largest. The market-house stands in the centre of the main street, and was built out of the ruins of the castle. Quarter-sessions are held twice a year in a newly-built sessions-house; and petty-sessions weekly, on Friday: here are a constabulary police station, and a county bridewell on a small scale, but containing the necessary accommodation for the separation of prisoners.

The parish, which is also called Magheross, comprises 16,702½ statute acres, including 299 of water; 13,068 acres are allotted under the Tithe act, and there is a great quantity of bog. In the vicinity of the town are several lime-kilns, and the land has been much improved by the extensive use of lime as a manure: Mr. Shirley supplies his tenants at about half the usual price from his kilns, in which about 8000 barrels were burnt in a recent year. The principal lakes are, Loch Mac-na-ree, Lisdronturk, Corvalley, and Chantinee Loch, only part of which last, however, is in this parish. Coal exists, but is not worked at present; good limestone and freestone are quarried for building. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Lord Primate and the Archbishop of Dublin, who must present a fellow or ex-fellow of Trinity College; the rectory is inappropriate in John B. Kiernan, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £726, 18. 6., of which one-third is payable to the impropriator, and two-thirds to the vicar. The church, situated in the town, was built by parochial assessment in 1779, and is a neat stone edifice with a tower and spire, having a good clock with four dials. The remains of the old church are still standing: it was built in 1682, to replace one that had been destroyed by fire in 1641. The glebe-house was erected at the same time as the present church, at a cost of £850; the glebe consists of 112 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is the benefice of the Bishop of Clogher, who resides in the town: there are three chapels, situated at Corduff mountain, Corcreagh, and Carrickmacross, the last a handsome building erected in 1783. Here is also a Presbyterian meeting-house. A free grammar school was founded by Lord Weymouth in 1711, and endowed with £70 per annum: it had been disused for some years, but the school-house has been rebuilt by the Marquess of Bath, a descendant of the founder; and the school is now in a flourishing state, having 70 boarders. There are various other schools. A dispensary was established in 1823; and a handsome fever hospital, having 36 beds, was opened in 1842: here is also a mendicity society. A savings' bank was instituted in 1831 by the Marquess of Bath, and Mr. Shirley: the amount of deposits, in November, 1835, was £1503. 14. belonging to 61 depositors, the number of whom has since increased. The union workhouse, on a site of 5½ statute acres purchased for £622, was completed in 1841, at an expense of £5000, and is constructed for the reception of 500 paupers.

CARRICKMINES.—See TULLY.

CARRICKNAGLAMP, an island, in the parish of KILGAVOWER, union of WESTPORT, barony of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It is situated on the western coast.

CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, a market and post town, the head of a union, and formerly a parliamentary borough, partly in the parish of KILLUKEN, barony of

BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, but chiefly in the parish of KILTUGHART, barony and county of LEITRIM, and in the province of CONNAUGHT, 27 miles (S.E. by S.) from Sligo, and 77 (W.N.W.) from Dublin; containing 1984 inhabitants. This town is situated on the coach-road from Dublin to Sligo, and principally on the north-eastern bank of the Shannon, over which is a bridge to a small suburb in the county of Roscommon. The tolls of this bridge were granted in 1684, to Sir George St. George, on condition of his keeping it in repair: the present structure, consisting of eleven arches, was built in 1718. The town contains 286 houses; it is badly paved, and not lighted. A small trade is carried on in coarse linen, druggets, frieze, and coarse flannel; and Carrick is the chief market for grain and provisions in Leitrim, but is principally supplied from Roscommon. Great quantities of butter are sent to the Dublin and Newry markets, and a considerable quantity of yarn is sold. The market is on Thursday; fairs are held on Jan. 18th, March 20th, May 12th, June 6th, Aug. 11th, Sept. 14th, Oct. 22nd, Nov. 21st, and Dec. 16th, and are the principal fairs in Leitrim for cattle. An inclosed market-place, with considerable accommodation, was lately erected by Mr. St. George, who is the owner in fee of the site of the town; but it is not much frequented. Great facilities for trade are afforded by the Shannon, which has been rendered navigable up to Longh Allen, thus placing Carrick on one of the most important lines of communication in the island. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Athlone. A constabulary police force has been stationed here; and there are infantry barracks, which are unoccupied, although this is the only military station in the county.

This place was incorporated by James I., in 1613, under the title of "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Carrigdrumruske;" and the corporation, now extinct, was composed of a provost, 12 free burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen. The provost was elected on the 24th of June by the provost and burgesses, and was sworn in on the 29th of September. The free burgesses were elected by the provost and burgesses; no freemen have existed for a very long period, and the only officer latterly appointed by the corporation was the weighmaster, who received a compensation under the Butter act, 10th of George IV., c. 41. The borough sent two members to the Irish parliament, elected under the charter by the provost and free burgesses: on the abolition of its franchise, at the time of the Union, the £15,000 awarded as compensation were given to the Earl of Leitrim. No provost has been elected since 1826, and the corporation is virtually extinct. Under the charter a court of record was established, but it has not been held for many years; and there is no manor court within the borough; but a petty-session is held every alternate Monday. This town being the capital of the county of Leitrim, the assizes are held here; as also the quarter-sessions for the southern division of the county, in January and July. The county court-house, bridewell, and gaol, are situated in the town: the gaol is built in a polygonal form, having 10 wards, with separate sleeping-cells for each prisoner, and a good tread-mill; the prisoners are taught reading and writing by the master and matron. The parish church of Kiltoghart, which, prior to 1698, was at a distance, was removed in that year by act of parliament into the town, and erected on a plot of ground given by Sir George St. George, Bart. It was rebuilt in 1839, by a loan of £2000 from the Board of First Fruits, and is a handsome structure with a spire and a clock, which latter was given by C. Manners St. George, Esq.; this gentleman also presented, in 1837, a fine painting of the Nativity, by Plagemann. The Roman Catholic chapel occupies a site given, with a plot of ground in the rear, in 1807, by Mr. St. George, who expended a considerable sum in finishing the interior, and built a gallery at his own expense. There are also places of worship for Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists, and parochial schools. The county infirmary, situated here, is a good building, erected in 1800; attached to it is a dispensary: the number of infirmary patients is about 300, and of dispensary patients about 4000, annually. A loan fund has also been established, with a capital amounting to £2000. The workhouse of the union, on a site of 6½ acres held at a rent of £21, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £7050, and is sufficient to admit 800 paupers.—See KILLUKEN and KILTOGHART.

CARRICK-ON-SUIR, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of IFFA and OFFA EAST, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 13 miles (W.N.W.) from Waterford, and 78½ (S.W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 9165 inhabitants, of whom 8369 are in the town. This place formed part of the possessions of Theobald Butler, to whom were granted also the lands of Carrig-mac-Griffin, now Carrick-Beg, and whose grandson, Edmund, founded a castle here about the year 1309. The castle was in 1336 bestowed by his son, James Butler, created Earl of Ormonde in 1328, upon the Franciscan friary of Carrick-Beg, which he had founded; and it continued to form part of the endowment of that house till about the year 1445, when, the brethren having suffered it to fall into ruin, it was purchased from them by Sir Edmund Butler Mac Richard, grandson of James, third Earl of Ormonde, who rebuilt both the castle and the bridge of Carrick. A priory, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, was founded here at the end of the 12th or beginning of the 13th century, for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, by William de Cantell and Dionisia his wife, daughter of Thomas Fitz-Anthony; it was afterwards subject to the hospital of St. John de Acon, at London, and after the Dissolution was granted to Thomas, Earl of Ormonde, in 1557, which grant was confirmed in 1563 by Queen Elizabeth, who also remitted the reserved rent. A castle was erected on the site of the priory by Thomas Duff, called Black Thomas, Earl of Ormonde. Here was also a nunnery for poor Clares, of which nothing has been recorded. In 1500, the Earl of Ormonde granted a charter to the burgesses of the town, dated at Waterford.

The town is pleasantly situated on the north bank of the river Suir, which here forms a boundary between the counties of Tipperary and Waterford; and is connected by an ancient stone bridge with the suburb of Carrick-Beg, on the opposite side, in the county of Waterford. It consists partly of one long street extending in a direction from east to west, from which three smaller streets diverge on the north to the fair-green, a spacious area surrounded by houses, and one on the south side to the river: the total number of houses is 1334. The inhabitants adopted the act 9th George IV., cap. 82, for lighting, watching, and cleansing, in 1836. There are cavalry barracks for 8 officers and 148 non-commissioned officers and privates, with stabling for 52 horses; but they are now occupied by infantry. In 1670, the great Duke of Ormonde established the woollen manufacture here, which flourished till towards the close of the last century, but has since declined: at present there is only a very limited trade in rattens, which are made in the town and vicinity. This latter branch of manufacture at one time also flourished here, and there were four ratteen fairs in the year in the neighbouring town of Kilkenny, attended by buyers from Dublin and England; but about fifty years ago the pieces were so deteriorated by overstretching on the tenners, that the buyers gave up the market; in the beginning of the French war the weavers enlisted, and the market has never been recovered. There are some tanneries and breweries, in a thriving state; but the chief trade is the sale of agricultural produce and of provisions, which are sent to Waterford for exportation, and to Clonmel for the supply of that town. The trade in corn and butter, the produce of the surrounding district, is stated in a petition to parliament, presented by the inhabitants in 1832, and praying for the privilege of sending a representative to the Imperial parliament, to have amounted at that time to £340,000, and previously to have exceeded £360,000 per annum. The river is not navigable for vessels of very considerable burthen farther than Fiddown, a few miles below the town; but a canal has been made opposite the castle, by which ships of 150 tons can come up, bringing coal, salt, slates, iron, &c. The railroad from Waterford to Limerick will pass through the town. In 1835 a branch of the National Bank was established here. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on the first Thursday in every month, for cattle and pigs. A constabulary police force is stationed in the town; and petty-sessions are held here every alternate week: the manor court formerly held in the castle is discontinued. The bridewell is a new, but inferior building.

The parish is exempt from county rates, by grant of William III.; it comprises 2426 statute acres, which, with the exception of about 32 acres of common called Carrick green, where the fairs are held, are chiefly arable. The surrounding country is peculiarly beautiful, being part of the district or plain which, for its singular fertility, is called the "Golden Vale," and which is throughout enlivened by the river Suir, whose banks are embellished with the richest variety of scenery. The chief seats within the parish are, Tinivane, Deerpark Lodge, and Mount Richard; and within a range of three or four miles are Curraghmore, the seat of the Marquess of Waterford, and Besborough, of the Earl of Besborough. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Ormonde; the rectory is inappropriate in W. H. Bradshaw, Esq. The tithes rent-charge is £145. 8. 9., of which £96. 18. 6. are payable to the improprorator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church was lately erected at a cost of £936, of which £642 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £294 were raised by subscription; it accommodates 300 persons, and has an organ. The glebe-house was built in 1816, by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £370 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe contains but 27. 20p. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of St. Nicholas in Carrick-on-Suir, and Newtown-Lennan, in each of which there is a chapel. The chapel of this parish is a spacious and handsome building; the interior is well arranged, and the altar is embellished with a painting of the Crucifixion by a native artist. There are a monastery of the order of the Christian Brotherhood, and a convent of sisters of the order of the Presentation; also a fever hospital, and a dispensary. A poor-house for destitute persons of the Roman Catholic religion is supported by a bequest of £3000 by Thomas and Richard Wadden, augmented with £30 per annum by James Sause, Esq., and a bequest of £400 by Mr. Kennedy: a few acres of land have also been left to it. A rent-charge of £10 was bequeathed to the Protestant poor by Mrs. Cook, about a century since. The work-house of the union, on a site of 6½ acres held at a rent of £47. 14., was completed in 1841, at a cost of £5168, and is capable of accommodating 500 paupers. The castle erected by Black Thomas is still a stately building, though much of it is in ruins; it was for many years the residence of the Ormonde family, and part of it has been converted into a private residence. There are some small remains of the ancient town walls. In Carrick-Beg is an inverted tower, standing on its apex, a single stone, part of the friary wall; it is a unique building, and rises 60 feet from the ground. Carrick gives the title of Earl to a branch of the Butler family.—See CARRICK-BEG.

CARRIG, or CARRIGLEAMLEARY, a parish, in the union of MALLOW, barony of FRAMORY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2½ miles (N. E.) from Mallow; containing 1256 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the north bank of the river Blackwater, and on the north road from Mallow to Fermoy; it comprises 3320 statute acres. The land is under an improved system of tillage, with the exception of Mount Nagle, which affords good pasturage; there is no bog. Limestone abounds, and is quarried for agricultural and other uses. Carrig Park is beautifully situated on the banks of the Blackwater, which are here richly wooded: the ruins of Carrig Castle, on the summit of a rock overhanging the river, form an interesting and picturesque object as seen from the opposite bank; and the whole demesne, in which are the vestiges of an ancient burial-ground, abounds with varied scenery. This parish was formerly united to that of Rahau, and on its separation about 40 years since, part of it was added to Rahau, to make the divisions more equal. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge is £202. 10., equally divided between the vicars-choral and the vicar. A neat small church, in the later English style, but without a tower, has been lately built on the site of the old parish church, part of the walls of that edifice being incorporated in the new building; the estimated expense was £222. 10., towards defraying which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners granted £192. 10. There is some glebe land, but no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is in the district of Killavullaue, at which place, and also at Annakissy, is a chapel.

CARRIGAHOLT, a small port and village, in the parish and barony of MOYARTA, union of KILRUSK, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 11½ miles (W.) from Kilrush; containing 426 inhabitants. It is situated on the harbour and roundstead of the same name, within the estuary of the river Shannon. The castle, now in ruins, was the fortified residence of the Mac Mahons, the chiefs of that part of this country which forms the peninsula once called the "Western Corkavaskin" and still denominated "the West." The last siege to which it was exposed was in 1649, when it was taken by General Ludlow. Teigue Keigh was the last of the Mac Mahons to whom it belonged. On his attainer it passed, by grant from Queen Elizabeth, to Henry O'Brien, brother to the Earl of Thomond, whose unfortunate grandson, Lord Clare, resided in it when he raised a regiment of horse called the "Yellow Dragons," which in 1689 was the flower of King James's army. The town now belongs to Lady Burton, whose ancestor was an officer in the army of King William. The ruins of the castle occupy a bold situation on the verge of a cliff overhanging the sea, and are inclosed by a courtyard and high walls on one side, and by rocks and the bay on the other. A small quay or pier was constructed partly by the late Fishery Board and partly by grand jury presentations: it is of considerable service to agriculture and the fisheries, and is frequented by six hookers, of seven tons each, and upwards of 500 corchs; which together give employment to about 400 persons, particularly in the herring-fishery, which commences in July. This is the principal place in the neighbourhood for the shipment of agricultural produce; 900 tons of grain, 700 firkins of butter, and 3000 pigs, having lately been shipped here in one year, by three individuals: it also exports hides to Limerick. The bay of Carrigaholt lies opposite that part of the Kerry shore, within the mouth of the Shannon, which is called the Bale bar. It has good and secure anchorage with the wind to the northward of west; but being entirely exposed to the ocean swell, the sea, which sets in with southerly or westerly winds, renders it unsafe to lie there. The inner harbour is better protected from those winds, but is shallow, having no more than 2½ or 3 fathoms of water within the line from Carrigaholt Castle to the opposite side of the bay. Captain Manby, who was employed by the Irish government to survey the Shannon, recommended that a small pier should be extended from the spot called Lord Clare's pier, at nearly a right angle to the shore, sufficiently to afford shelter to the one that already exists; and that this should be carried out farther, so as to permit boats to sail from it till almost low water. Lord Clare's pier was formed in 1608, but has gone to decay. The roads in the immediate vicinity of the village are in bad condition, and must be repaired before the port can be easily accessible by land. The valley on the north side of Kilkadrane Hill having been often mistaken by night for the proper channel for entering the Shannon, a light has been placed on the top of the hill, red to seaward, and a fixed bright light as seen descending the river. In the village is a public dispensary; and near it is the Roman Catholic chapel.—See MOYARTA.

CARRIGALINE, a parish, partly in the barony of KINNALEA, partly in that of CORK, but chiefly in that of KERRICURRIHY, union and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (S. E.) from Cork; containing 7489 inhabitants. This place was in early times called Beavor or Behhor, and derived its name from the abrupt rocky cliff on which are the remains of the ancient castle, built by Milo de Cogan in the reign of King John, and for nearly two centuries occupied by the earls of Desmond, by whom it was forfeited in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The castle, together with the lands of Carrigaline and Ballinrea, was then granted by the queen to Sir Anthony St. Leger, who demised them to Stephen Golding, from whom they were purchased by Sir Richard Boyle, afterwards Earl of Cork: from him they have descended to the present proprietor, the Earl of Shannon. In 1568, the Lord-Deputy Sidney, after relieving the Lady St. Leger in Cork, advanced against this fortress, which he took from James Fitzmaurice after an obstinate resistance; and from this time, during the entire reign of Elizabeth, it had the reputation of being impregnable. In 1589, Sir Francis Drake, with a squadron of five ships, being chased by a Spanish fleet of superior force, ran into Cork harbour; and, sailing up Crosshaven, moored his squadron in a safe basin sheltered by Corribury Hill, close under Coolmore. The Spaniards pursued, but, being unacquainted with the harbour, sailed round the shores without discovering the English fleet, and giving up the search, left it here in perfect security. The basin in which Sir Francis lay has since been called Drake's pool.

The PARISH is situated on the road from Cork to Tracton, and contains 14,498 statute acres: the surface is pleasantly undulated, and the soil fertile; a considerable part is under an improved system of tillage, and the remainder in demesne, meadow, or pasture land. There is neither waste nor bog; coal, which is landed at several small quays here, constitutes the chief fuel. A light-brown and purplish clay-slate is found; and limestone of very superior quality is raised at Shanbally, in large blocks, and, after being hewn into columns, tombstones, &c., is shipped to Cork and other places. The views from the high grounds are extensive and picturesque, embracing the course of the Awenhwy, with the spacious estuary called Crosshaven, and numerous gentlemen's seats. The principal is Coolmore, the residence of the Wth Newenham family, situated in a beautiful demesne of 545 acres; a lofty square tower, a little to the east of the house, commands a magnificent prospect of the town and harbour of Cove. The village has a very pleasing appearance; it consists of several good houses and a number of decent cottages, extending into the parish of Kilmonony on the south side of the river, over which a handsome bridge of one arch has been erected. There are three large bolting-mills, capable of grinding 20,000 sacks of flour annually; the greater part of the produce is shipped for England from Cork. The trade consists chiefly in the export of corn, flour, and potatoes, and the import of coal and culm. The channel of the river has been deepened six feet, principally at the expense of Mr. Roberts, and vessels can now deliver their cargoes at the bridge. A creek runs up to Shanbally, and another forms the channel of Douglas; both are navigable for vessels of 40 tons' burthen, which bring up lime, sand, and manure, and take away limestone and bricks, the latter made near Douglas. The opening of several new lines of road has been of great advantage to the district. The Awenhwy, winding through a rich corn country, is well situated for commerce; and salmon and trout are caught in abundance. Fairs are held in Carrigaline on Easter-Monday, Whit-Monday, Aug. 12th, and Nov. 8th, for cattle, sheep, and pigs. There is a receiving-house for letters under Cork; and a constabulary police force has been stationed here: petty-sessions are held in the courthouse every Tuesday, and a manorial court once in three weeks.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Earl of Shannon: the tithe rent-charge is £810. The church is a very handsome edifice of hewn limestone, in the later English style of architecture, with a massive square tower crowned with pinnacles and surmounted by an elegant and lofty octagonal spire pierced with lights. It was erected in 1693, at a cost of £2000, near the site of the former church, and was enlarged in 1835, by the addition of a north transept; the windows are very chaste and beautiful, particularly the eastern one, the upper part of which is ornamented with stained glass. Near the west front is a lofty arch, beneath which is an altar-tomb of grey marble, with a recumbent leaden figure, now much mutilated, of Lady Susanna Newenham, who died in 1754. A chapel of ease has been built at the village of Douglas, in the northern division of the parish. There is no glebe-house, but a glebe of six acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish partly forms the head of a district comprising the four ploughlands called Carrigaline and the parishes of Templebreedy and Kilmonony, and is partly in the union of Douglas or Ballygervin, and partly in that of Passage: the chapel is in that portion of the village of Carrigaline which is on the south side of the river. The male and female parochial schools are supported by subscription; the school-rooms were built in 1834. At Rahens are schools for boys and girls, the former supported by a donation of £50 per annum from W. H. W. Newenham, Esq., and the latter by Mrs. Newenham; and there are other schools in the parish; also a dispensary. At Ballinrea is a mineral spring, which is considered to be of the same kind as that of Tunbridge Wells, and which has been found efficacious in cases of debility; near it is a holy well, dedicated to St. Renogue, and resorted to by the country people on the 24th of June.

CARRIGALLEN, or CLINCORICK, a parish, in the union of MOHILL, barony of CARRIGALLEN, county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Killesandra, on the road to Drumsna; containing 8100 inhabitants, of whom 473 are in the village. The parish contains 18,104½ statute acres, including a great quantity of bog: the cultivation is principally by spade labour; limestone of the best kind is quarried at Newtown-Gore. The village comprises 88 houses: it has a market for grain and provisions on Monday; and fairs are held on April 4th, May 7th, Aug. 9th, Oct. 8th, and the last Friday in December. Fairs are also held, at Longfield, on May 17th, Oct. 10th, and Dec. 29th. There is a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Killesandra and Ballinamore; and a constabulary police force has been stationed here. Petty-sessions are held every alternate Saturday, but the manor court has been discontinued since the institution of the assistant barrister's court. Among the principal seats is Killigar, situated in a richly wooded demesne embellished with three fine sheets of water. Cloncorrick Castle, now a modernised seat, was built by the O'Rourkes; and John O'Rourke, son of Thady, the last of the family who lived in any degree of splendour, resided here until, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, at a court of claims held at Carrigallen, he was deprived of his estate and declared illegitimate, on the evidence of Abbot Macaward. The castle has received such additions and alterations as scarcely to leave a feature of its original character. Woodford House, which is half a mile north of Newtown-Gore, is built on the ruins of another of the O'Rourkes' castles: the estate was formerly well wooded, and remarkable for its oaks, and there are still two fine walled gardens of considerable extent. It was a place of great grandeur, and belonged to the ancestors of W. Ormsby Gore, Esq., of Porkington, Shropshire.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop, to whom the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £337. 10., of which £113. 6. are payable to the bishop, and the remainder to the incumbent. The parish church, a good building with a square tower, and in excellent repair, was erected in 1812, by aid of a loan of £1500 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £100, and a loan of £1350, from the same Board, in 1819: the glebe comprises 590 acres. There is also a church at Killigar, with a small parsonage-house adjoining, built and endowed by John Godley, Esq., at an expense of £1100. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains two chapels, one at Mullinadaragh, and the other, called the Lower Chapel, at Aughal: there is also a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, at Newtown-Gore.

CARRIGANS, a village, in the parish of KILLEA, union of LONDONDERRY, barony of RAFFOE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Londonderry; containing 235 inhabitants. It is seated near the river Foyle, and has some large corn-mills.

CARRIGDOWNANE, or CARRIGDOWNIG, a parish, in the union and barony of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S. W.) from Mitchelstown; containing 245 inhabitants. This small parish, which is situated on the river Funcheon, and on the road from Kildorrery to Fermoy, comprises 797 statute acres. The land is in general of good quality, and chiefly under tillage; but the system of agriculture is in a backward state. Limestone is plentiful, and is quarried for burning into lime, which is the principal manure. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and the tithe rent-charge is £67. 10.; but the benefice is now suppressed, and the proceeds are paid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church is in ruins; the Protestant parishioners attend the church of Nathlash, a mile distant. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises $10\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Kildorrery.

CARRIGEENGLASS, an island, in the parish of KILMINA, union of WESTPORT, barony of BURRISHOOLE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It lies in Clew bay.

CARRIGG, a parish, in the poor-law union of WEXFORD, barony of SHELMALIER WEST, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (W.) from Wexford; containing 1251 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road to New Ross, and on the river Slaney, at its influx into the haven at Wexford. In the townland of Ferry-Carrigg, and near the bridge over the Slaney, Robert Fitz-Stephen, in 1171, built a strong castle, in which he was soon afterwards besieged by the Irish under Donald of Limerick, natural son of Dermot Mac Murrough, the last king of Leinster. Donald, finding himself unable to reduce it by force, had recourse to stratagem; and by a feigned account that Stronghow and his friends in Dublin had been put to the sword by the victorious army, who were on their march to this place, he prevailed upon Fitz-Stephen, by the promise of a safe passport into Wales, to surrender himself and the garrison into his hands. Many of the men were instantly put to death; and Fitz-Stephen and the remainder were conveyed in chains to a small island called Beg Erin, in the north part of Wexford haven, where they were confined till the landing of Henry II. at Waterford, when, being removed to that town, they were placed in Ragnal's or Reginald's Tower, from which they were soon afterwards liberated by the English monarch.

Seal.

The PARISH is bounded on the north by the river Slaney, over which is a handsome bridge of American oak, built by the architect of the old Wexford bridge, under an act passed in 1794. This act empowered subscribers to raise £7000 for that purpose; and on payment of one-fifth of the sum, they were to be constituted a corporate body, under the designation of the "Commissioners of Carrigg Bridge," and to have a common seal. The northern part of the parish is intersected by the coach-road from Wexford to Dublin, and the road from Wexford to New Ross also passes through it. It comprises 3009 statute acres, of which the greater portion is in pasture, and the remainder under tillage; the system of agriculture is progressively improving. Here are some quarries of good building-stone, from which the works lately in progress at St. Peter's College, Wexford, were supplied. The scenery is pleasingly varied; including the richly wooded banks of the Slaney, and the conspicuous range of the Forth mountains, by which the parish is bounded on the west. The residence of Belmont is finely situated on a commanding eminence near the Slaney, and embraces some beautiful views of that river above Wexford bridge, and especially of that side of it which is ornamented by the elegant mansions and richly wooded demesnes of Saunders Court, Artramount, and other gentlemen's seats. The Slaney affords every facility of water conveyance for the supply of the neighbourhood.

This is one of the 16 parishes that constitute the union of St. Patrick's, Wexford. The living is an inappropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. The tithe rent-charge is £138. 16, of which £46. 12. 8. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the curate. There are some remains of the old parish church, below Belmont; and in the churchyard, under an altar-tomb, are deposited the remains of Lieutenant-Colonel Jones Watson, who fell on the 30th of May, 1798, while leading the yeomanry of this county to attack the insurgents, who had encamped at the Three Rocks on the mountain of Forth. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Glynn; the chapel is at Barntown. The remains of the castle of Ferry-Carrigg, in the parish of Tickillen, are romantically situated on a pinnacle of rock commanding the pass of the river, and consist principally of a lofty square tower. On the opposite side of the river, and in the parish of Carrigg, was a castle called Shan-a-Court, or John's Court, supposed to have been built in the reign of John, and in which that monarch is said to have held a court. The remains consist only of the trenches; many of the stones were used in building the more ancient part of Belmont House. In this parish is also Barntown Castle, which appears to have been erected about the same time as that of Ferry-Carrigg, and by some writers is attributed to the same founder; it consists of a lofty square tower still nearly entire. Barntown formed a portion of the lands granted by Cromwell to Colonel Le Hunt, whose descendants still reside at Artramont, in the neighbourhood.

CARRIGILLIHY, a village, in the parish of MYROSS, poor-law union of SKIBBEREEN, East division of the barony of WEST CABBRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Ross-carbery; containing 35 houses, and 168 inhabitants. It is situated near the coast.

CARRIGLEAMLEARY.—See CARRIG, CORK.

CARRIGNAVAR, a village, in the parish of DUNBOLLOGE, barony of BARRYMORE, union and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N.) from Cork; containing 179 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Cork to Mallow, in a fine fertile country, and has lately been much improved by its proprietors, of whom Lord Middleton is one. The castle, of which little more than a square tower remains, is said to have been the last fortress in Munster that came into Cromwell's possession. It stood on the bank of the river Glanmire; was built by Daniel, second son of Lord Muskerry, who died in 1616; and was one of the dependencies of the manor of Blarney. The village contains a neat Roman Catholic chapel and a school.—See DUNBOLLOGE.

CARRIGPARSON, or WILLESTOWN, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (S. E.) from Limerick; containing 568 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Limerick to Cashel, and contains 1449 statute acres, about one-half of which is in tillage, producing good crops of wheat, oats, and potatoes; the other half is mostly meadow. Basalt and limestone are found here, the former principally in a state of decomposition; and between the north-western extremity of the parish and Cahirmurry is an extensive and valuable bog. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, and is part of the union of Cahirconlish: the tithe rent-charge is £71. 9. 3. There is a glebe of four acres near the remains of the old church. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Ballybricken; the chapel is at Bohernora.

CARRIGROHANBEG, or KILGROHANBEG, a parish, in the barony of MUSKERRY EAST, union and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (W.) from Cork; containing 641 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in a very fertile district adjoining the western boundary of the ancient county of the city of Cork, is bounded on the south by the river Lee, and on the east by the Awenbeg or Shawmogh, a small river which flows from Blarney and falls into the Lee opposite to the beautiful ruins of Carrigrohane Castle. It contains 2061 statute acres; the surface is pleasingly diversified, and the soil, resting on a substratum of clay-slate, is extremely fertile. The land is chiefly in pasture, and the farmers attend almost exclusively to the dairy, for supplying the city of Cork with milk and butter. The vale of Awenbeg is beautifully romantic, and on the banks of that river were formerly some mills for manufacturing paper, and some iron-forges; the vale of the Lee is exceedingly fertile, and the meadows are occasionally irrigated by the overflowing of the river. The gentlemen's seats are, Woodside, commanding a fine view, with an excellent farm adjoining it belonging to the proprietor of the estate, who has done much towards improving the agriculture of the surrounding district; Rock Lodge; Beechmount; and Temple Hill. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £117. 9. There is now no church, but divine service is regularly performed by the rector in his own house; the ruins of the church, covered with ivy, and presenting a very picturesque appearance, are situated between the high road and the river Lee, near the junction of that stream with the Awenbeg. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Inniscarra.

CARRIGROHANE, or KILGROHANMORE, a parish, partly in the barony of CORK, but chiefly in the barony of MUSKERRY EAST, union and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Cork; containing, with the town of Ballincollig, 2979 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the south bank of the river Lee, over which is a stone bridge connecting it with the parish of Inniscarra; and on the new line of road through Magourney to Macroom. The whole comprises 2658 acres. The land is of good quality; and the farms, being in the occupation of persons of capital, are in an excellent state of cultivation. From the low price of grain, the produce of the dairy and the grazing of cattle have been found more profitable than growing corn; the lands are therefore being converted into dairy-farms. The parish forms part of the limestone district that extends from near the source of the river Bride, along its southern bank, across the vale to the west of the city of Cork, and, passing through its southern suburbs, terminates at Blackrock. The quarrying of limestone and manufacture of gunpowder at Ballincollig, encourage that industry among the people of which the fruits are seen in their comfortable appearance and the improved state of their habitations. On the river Lee are some extensive mills, capable of manufacturing from 350 to 400 sacks of flour weekly. About a mile and a half from the church are several very handsome houses, occupied by the officers connected with the garrison of Ballincollig.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, united from time immemorial to the rectories of Carriguppane and Corbally, and to one-fourth of the rectory of Kinneagh: the four parishes constitute the corps of the precentorship of the cathedral of St. Finbarr, Cork. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £247. 10., and of the whole union £707. 5. The church is a small plain edifice situated near the river Lee, built in 1628, and to the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately made a grant of £143. There is no glebe-house, but there are two glebes in the union, consisting of 17 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish, together with the parishes of Kilnaglogh and Inniskenny, and a small part of that of Ballinaboy, form the district of Ballincollig, where there is a chapel. Behind the church are considerable remains of the ancient castle, and the fine ruins of a more modern house, of great strength, of which nearly the whole of the outer walls are remaining. The turrets (pierced with loopholes) which project from the upper story of the latter building, indicate that it was erected about the reign of Queen Elizabeth; but the castle is evidently much older: both were ruined in the war of 1641. At Ballincollig, also, are the ruins of an extensive castle, situated on an isolated rock which rises in the midst of a fertile plain. This castle was built by the Barrett family, in the reign of Edward III.: William Barrett joined in the insurrection of the Earl of Desmond against Elizabeth, but was pardoned by her Majesty and received into favor. In the war of 1641 it was in the possession of the insurgents, who were dispossessed by Cromwell in 1645: it was garrisoned for James II. in 1689, but after his flight fell into decay, and is now a stately ruin, with a very strong and lofty square tower still nearly perfect.

CARRIGTOHILL, a parish, in the union of MIDDLETON, barony of BARRYMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (W.) from Middleton; containing 3976 inhabitants, of whom 699 are in the village. This parish is situated on the road from Cork to Waterford, and comprises 10,319 statute acres: about 500 acres are woodland, nearly 500 waste; and of the remainder, 6600 are arable and 2430 pasture. The soil is in some places very light, and in others deep and rich, producing excellent crops: the system of agriculture was extensively improved by the example and encouragement of the late J. Smith Barry, Esq. Great quantities of limestone are quarried, and burnt into lime for manure. The scenery in almost every part is exceedingly interesting, particularly near Foaty, around which the rich woods and thriving plantations are beautifully diversified with water. Several extensive plantations have also been made in other parts of the parish, which in a few years will add greatly to the appearance of the country. Among the principal seats is Foaty, the elegant residence of the late Mr. Smith Barry. The village consists principally of one long irregular street, and contains 124 houses indifferently built. It is a constabulary police station: fairs are held on the 12th of March and May, Aug. 26th, Sept. 19th, and Nov. 8th, chiefly for horses, cattle, pigs, and pedlery; and, from the central situation of the place, they are in general well attended. A new line of road from Carrigtohill to Cove has been opened through Foaty, and a very handsome bridge has been erected over the arm of the sea.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, united by act of council from a very early period to the parishes of Kilcurnin, and in the alternate patronage of the Bishop and the representatives of the late John Anderson, Esq.; the rectory is inappropriate in the representatives of George Lankester, of Middleton, Esq. The whole tithe rent-charge is £776. 8., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriators, and one-third to the vicar. The church, a small venerable structure, was repaired and much improved in 1835, by a grant of £144. 8. from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built in 1845, by aid of a gift of £300 and a loan of £450 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 15 acres, of which 5 are a rock of limestone. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Carrigtohill and Mogeeshy; the chapel is situated on the site of an old abbey not far from the churchyard, and near it is a parochial house for the priest. There is a school at Foaty for boys and girls, founded by the late Mr. Smith Barry; the boys are under the superintendence of the Protestant curate, and the girls under the direction of Mrs. Barry: adjoining the schoolrooms are houses for the master and mistress. Near the village are the ruins of a Franciscan abbey, founded and endowed by the Barry family: one of its towers serves as a steeple for the present parish church, which, and the Roman Catholic chapel, are erected on its site; there are several detached portions of the buildings remaining, but they are rapidly falling to decay. In the northern part of the parish are the ruins of the ancient church of Kilcurnin. Near the old entrance to Foaty are the remains of Castle Cloydubh, now called Barry's Court, from which the Barrymore family takes the title of baron; it derives its name from Philip de Barry, whose uncle Fitz-Stephen granted him three cantreds here, where he built the castle in the beginning of the 13th century. During the insurrection of the great Earl of Desmond, in 1580, Captain, afterwards Sir Walter, Raleigh received a commission to seize this castle; but Lord Barry, the proprietor, having gained intelligence of his design, previously set fire to it. It was an extensive and very strong pile, and one of the earliest erected in this part of the kingdom. In various parts of the parish are caverns which penetrate for a considerable distance into the limestone rocks, and in some of them are large and beautiful stalactites.

CARRIGUE, or CARRIG, an island, in the parish of AGHAVALLIN, union of LISTOWEL, barony of INAGHTICONNOR, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (N.W.) from Ballylongford: the population is included in the return for the parish. This small island is situated in the river Shannon, nearly opposite to the island of Inniscattery, but on the Kerry side; and is about a mile and a half in circumference, containing 120 statute acres, of which 100 are arable. The island belongs to Trinity College, Dublin, and is in a high state of cultivation: it is pleasantly situated for bathing, and abounds with a variety of water-fowl. There are a battery, and a bomb-proof barrack for 20 men; and the Island is a station of the coast-guard. The north shore is the only place where ships of heavy burthen can ride in safety; the south, west, and east being very shallow at low water: and about a mile from the northern part of the island is a shoal, which has only a boat passage at ebb tide. Here is an extensive ruin, which was formerly a monastery subject to the O'Connors, from whom the barony is named, and who owned the castle of Carigafoyle, known as "the impregnable castle," from its long resistance to the attacks of Cromwell; it was one of the last taken by him, and the twelve people found in it were hanged. Off the island is an excellent oyster-bed; also a good place and mullet fishery.

CARROGH.—See CARAGH.

CARROWDORE, a district parish, in the parish of DONAGHADEE, union of NEWTOWN-ARDES, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Donaghadee. This district is in the southern part of Donaghadee parish, and comprises 3378 statute acres, the soil of which is various, some being loam, some clay, some slaty, and some alluvial; the surface presents few distinguishing features, and is bare of trees. The chief employment of the females is embroidery, long known as Donaghadee needle-work, done for traders in Scotland; a little weaving is carried on by the male population. The village contains 108 houses, and 432 inhabitants: in its vicinity is Carrowdore Castle, the seat of the Crommelin family. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Down, formed in 1841, and in the patronage of the Primate, and the Incumbent of Donaghadee. The Primate, as rector of the parish of Donaghadee, was possessed of two-thirds of the tithes, amounting to £360; the remaining third, £180, constituting the income of that vicarage; but his grace, in 1841, relinquished altogether for himself and his successors in the primacy, the whole rectorial rent-charge, applying the amount to increase the income of the vicarage, and endow the newly-formed perpetual curacy of this district parish. The incumbent of Carrowdore receives the rent-charge both rectorial and vicarial of his district, £205. 7. 1½; the entire rent-charge of the rest of Donaghadee, £334. 12. 10½, being appropriated to the incumbent of that parish. The Primate built at his own expense the church and glebe-house of Carrowdore; the former on land granted by Nicholas Delacheriois Crommelin, Esq., of Carrowdore Castle; the latter on eight acres of land leased for ever as glebe by J. G. Dunbar, Esq., at £3. 3. per acre. The cost of the church, a handsome stone structure capable of accommodating 300 persons, was about £1000, and the cost of the glebe-house £750. In the village is a place of worship for Presbyterians.

CARROWMORE, a village, in the parish of KILMAINMORE, union of BALLINROBE, barony of KILMAIN, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2½ miles (E.) from Ballinrobe; containing 149 inhabitants. It is on the road from Ballinrobe to Hollymount.

CARRUNE, CARRON, or CARNE, a parish, in the union of ENNISTYMON, barony of BURREN, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (N.N.W.) from Curofin; containing 1144 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Ennis and Curofin to Murticough and New Quay, and comprises 14,460½ statute acres, chiefly rocky pasture well adapted for sheep, of which the farmers' stock principally consists; a very small proportion is under tillage. Limestone abounds; and some copper-mines were formerly worked, but are now discontinued. The living is a rectory and suppressed vicarage, in the diocese of Killeenora: the rectory constitutes part of the sinecure union of Killelough, in the patronage of the Marquess of Thomond; the vicarage was part of the union of Noughaval, and the corps of the precentorship of the cathedral of St. Fachnan, Killeenora, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £52. 10., one-half payable to the rector, and the other to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to whom the benefice has lapsed. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Carrune, Noughaval, and Kilmorney; there are two chapels, one at Crughville in this parish, and one in the village of Noughaval. The parochial church is in ruins, and there are the remains of two other old churches at Crunane and Glanculmilk; the burial-ground of each is still used. St. Columb is said to have founded an abbey at Glanculmilk, which subsequently became the parish church; the bed of the saint, formed of stones, is yet preserved as a relic. Some brass coins have been dug up here. Near St. Columb's bed is one of the finest springs in the county, but the water possesses no medicinal properties.

CARYSFORT, county of DUBLIN.—See BLACKROCK.

CARYSFORT, MOYCREDDIN, or MOYCREDYNE, an ancient borough, in the parish and poor-law union of RATHDRUM, barony of BALLINACOR, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S.W.) from Rathdrum: the population is returned with the parish. This place, which is situated on the road from Rathdrum to Carnew, was formerly appropriated to the priory of All Saints, Dublin; and in the reign of Henry VIII. was granted to the mayor, bailiffs, and commons of that city. During the lieutenancy of Lord Falkland, between the years 1625 and 1629, a castle was erected here in order to check the turbulent steps of O'Toole and O'Byrne: but in 1641, the garrison being withdrawn to Dublin on a case of emergency, and the castle being left in the custody of a few unarm'd English, it was surprised and taken by the O'Byrnes, who had intercepted a supply of arms and ammunition sent for its defence. By a charter of Charles I., in 1628, this place was erected into a small military dépôt, and constituted a borough, under the control of a sovereign and twelve free burgesses. The corporation was endowed with lands not only for their own support, but also for maintaining the garrison of the castle; and the sovereign was made a justice of the peace, and for a year after the expiration of his office presided in a court for the recovery of debts not exceeding £20. The same charter conferred upon the sovereign and free burgesses the privilege of returning two representatives to the Irish parliament, which they continued to exercise till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised, and the £15,000 granted as compensation were awarded to John, Earl of Carysfort.

This town has dwindled into a small village, consisting only of a few houses of the humblest class, situated in a mountainous district. The corporation appear to have exercised scarcely any of their rights, except that of returning members to parliament; and at present it is totally extinct as a borough. Fairs are held on Whit-Monday, Nov. 12th, and Dec. 26th. In the village of Sheanna, part of the ancient borough, is a chapel, which was endowed by the charter of Charles I. with 130 acres of land, for the maintenance of a chaplain, whose appointment was vested in the sovereign and burgesses; or, on their failing to appoint, the income from the endowment was to be paid to any minister officiating in the town. From the extinction of the corporation, the endowment is lost; but the service of the chapel is performed by the perpetual curate of Ballinaclesh, in whose district parish it is situated. There is a Roman Catholic chapel, which is the parochial chapel of Rathdrum. The Royal chartered school was founded by Charles I., who granted to the sovereign and burgesses 200 acres of arable land and 97 acres of mountain and bog, for the sole use of such schoolmaster as the deputy or other chief governor of Ireland should appoint to reside and teach in the borough. This endowment had been for many years comparatively unavailing; a school had been kept only in a miserable cabin, and under an inefficient teacher; but a large and commodious school-house, with comfortable apartments for the master and his family, was recently built by the Board of Education, and there are now more than 100 children in the school. The income arising from the endowment, about £160 per annum, is received by the Board, who pay the master's salary, provide all school requisites, and keep the buildings in repair. Carysfort gives the titles of Earl and Baron to the family of Proby.—See RATHDRUM.

CASHCARRIGAN, a village, in the parish of KILTURRIG, union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony and county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6½ miles (N. E.) from Carrick-on-Shannon, on the road to Ballinamore; containing 21 houses and 132 inhabitants. It is a constabulary police station, and has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Ballinamore and Carrick-on-Shannon. Fairs are held on Feb. 1st, March 17th, May 1st and 28th, June 29th, Aug. 1st, Sept. 21st, Oct. 8th, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 21st.—See KILTURRIG.

CASHEL, a parish, in the barony of RATHCLINE, union and county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (S.) from Lanesborough; containing 5559 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Shannon, and on the road from Lanesborough to Ballymahon; and comprises 32,150½ statute acres, whereof 6291 are in Lough Ree: the land is principally under tillage, but there is some marsh land, with several thousand acres of bog, in the northern and eastern parts of the parish. The substratum is limestone, of which there are good quarries. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is inappropriate in Messrs. Armstrong, lessees of Lord Fauconberg. The tithes rent-charge is £498. 10. 6., of which about two-thirds are payable to the improprators, and one-third to the incumbent. The church is a plain structure with a square tower, built in 1816 by aid of a gift of £800 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was erected in 1816, by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £400 from the same Board; the glebe consists of 34 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel, at Newtown, is a handsome cruciform building, ornamented with minarets, and of recent erection. Near the church are the ruins of an abbey, said to have been a dependency of the Augustinian abbey on Quaker Island; they are covered with ivy, and a low arched doorway and lancet-shaped window still remain.

At Cashel nearly the whole extent of LOUGH REE is visible. This lake, the name of which signifies "the king of lakes," extends from Lanesborough to Athlone, and is nearly 20 miles in length, and in some parts 9 in breadth. A regatta generally takes place on it in August, which is attended by many pleasure-boats from Limerick. Its shores are studded with handsome residences, and it contains many picturesque islands; the largest of the latter are, Hare Island (still thickly covered with its original woods, and on which Lord Castlemaiae has a fishing-lodge), Inchmore, Inchturk, Inchhoffin, All Saints' Island, Inisclobrann or Quaker Island, and Inehyana. Killenure, or the Inner lake, is a portion of Lough Ree, branching eastward into the county of Westmeath, and containing Temple and Friars' Islands. In Inisclobrann, which is also called Seven Church Island, are the remains of seven churches. An abbey was founded here in 540, by St. Diarmuid Naomh, or "the Just," which was pillaged by the men of Munster, in 1010, 1016, 1050, and 1087; in 1155 it was burnt, and in 1193 plundered by Gilbert de Nangle. The abbey of Inchhoffin, founded about 530, by St. Riach, nephew of St. Patrick; and the abbey founded on the island of All Saints, by St. Kieran, in 544, were also ravaged by the men of Munster on the same four occasions; and in 1089 all three monasteries were plundered and destroyed by Muircheartach O'Brien, aided by a large fleet of Danes. It is said that a descendant of Sir Henry Dillon, of Drumrany, who came into Ireland with John, Earl of Morton, erected an abbey on the island of All Saints, probably on the site of the ancient abbey of St. Kieran: the buildings were granted at the suppression to Sir Patrick Barnwall. Augustin Mac Graidin, who was a canon and died here in 1405, wrote the lives of the Irish Saints, and continued the annals of this abbey to his own time; the work is still preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford.

CASHEL, a city, borough, and market and post town, the head of a union, and till lately the seat of an archbishopric, in the barony of MIDDLETHERD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 12 miles (N. W.) from Clonmel, and 75 (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 8027 inhabitants, of whom 7036 are in the city. This place was the residence of the kings of Munster; and a synod was held in it by St. Patrick, St. Ailbe, and St. Deelan, in the reign of Ængus, who, after his conversion to the Christian faith by St. Patrick, is said to have founded a church here. It is uncertain at what period Cashel first became the head of a bishopric; indeed, its early history, both civil and ecclesiastical, is involved in much obscurity, and has been a fertile source of hypothetical inquiry. Some writers assert that Cormac Mac-Culainn, King and Bishop of Cashel, who was killed in his retreat from battle in 908, had either founded or restored the cathedral, by building on the Rock of Cashel an edifice now called Cormac's chapel, one of the most interesting architectural remains in the kingdom; but its erection is, with greater probability, ascribed by others to Cormac Mac Carthy, the pious king of Desmond. In 990, the place was fortified by Brian Boru, who rebuilt thirteen royal houses and palaces in Munster, one of which is still pointed out at the corner of Old Chapel-lane, in this town. Until the year 1101, the buildings on the Rock of Cashel were merely such as composed the Dun or royal residence, or the Carsoil or habitation on the rock, of the kings of Munster; the cathedral probably occupied some other site. In that year, according to the Annals of Innisfallen, Murtogh O'Brien convened a great Assembly of the clergy and people of Cashel, in which he assigned over to the bishops that "hitherto royal seat" of the kings of Munster, and dedicated it to God, St. Patrick, and St. Alb. The same annals record that, in 1127, Cormac Mac Carthy, King of Desmond, erected a church here (the chapel above noticed), called from him Teampul Chormaic, and which in 1134 was consecrated by the archbishop and bishops of Munster, in the presence of the nobility and clergy. A new church was built in 1169, on the site of the present cathedral, by Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, who endowed it with lands, and converted the church founded by Cormac into a chapel or chapter-house on the south side of the choir of the new edifice.

HENRY II., on landing at Waterford in 1172, marched to Cashel, where he received the homage of the above-named Donald O'Brien; and in November of that year he summoned a general synod of the Irish clergy, which was also attended by those Irish lords who submitted to his sway, and at which Christian, Bishop of Lismore, the pope's legate, presided. This assembly acknowledged the sovereignty of Henry; and of the ordinances enacted by it, one exempted the persons of the clergy from the jurisdiction of civil courts in criminal cases, and their lands from all secular taxes; while another enjoined a perfect conformity of the Church of Ireland with that of England. Henry, during his stay here, bestowed on the archbishop and chapter the city of Cashel, with a large tract of the adjoining country. After his departure, Richard Strongbow led an army to this place against the native princes of the west, and encamped here, awaiting the arrival of certain reinforcements from Dublin, which being defeated at Thurles, he was compelled to retreat precipitately to Waterford. In 1179 the town was burnt; after its restoration, Donat or Donchad O'Lonargan, who succeeded to the see in 1216, erected it into a borough. Henry III., in 1228, remitted to Archbishop Marian and his successors the new town of Cashel, to be held of him and his heirs in free, pure, and perpetual alms, discharged from all exactions and secular services. Sir David le Latimer, seneschal to Marian, founded an hospital for sick and infirm poor, in honour of St. Nicholas, which was afterwards given to a society of Cistercians introduced by Archbishop David Mac Carvill. In 1343 a Dominican friary was founded by Archbishop David Mac Kelly, which, being destroyed by an accidental fire, was rebuilt by Archbishop Cantwell, who was constituted both patron and founder by an instrument dated at Limerick about the year 1480; in 1250 Archbishop Hacket founded the Franciscan friary. Hore Abbey, called also "St. Mary's Abbey of the Rock of Cashel," was originally for Benedictines; but Archbishop Mac Carvill, having dreamed that the monks had made an attempt to cut off his head, forcibly dispossessed them of their house and lands, and gave the whole of their possessions to a body of Cistercian monks whom he had brought from the abbey of Mellifont, in the county of Louth.

In 1316, on Palm-Sunday, Edward Bruce came hither with his army from Limerick, and proceeded to Nenagh; in 1372 a parliament was held at this place. In 1495, during the haronial feuds, Gerald, Earl of Kildare, influenced by hostile feelings towards David Creaghe, then archbishop, set fire to the cathedral, and in the presence of the king subsequently defended this outrage, in answer to the accusations of his adversaries, on the ground that he would not have destroyed the building had he not thought that the archbishop was in it at the time. On the termination of the insurrection headed by the Earl of Tyrone, this place, with others, surrendered at discretion, in 1603, to the Lord-Deputy Mountjoy. Lord Inchiquin advanced against it from the siege of Cahir, in 1647: the inhabitants took refuge in their church on the Rock, which was well fortified and garrisoned. Inchiquin proposed to leave them unmolested, on condition of their contributing £3000 and a month's pay for his army: this offer being rejected, he took the place by storm, with great slaughter both of the soldiery and citizens, among whom 20 of the Roman Catholic clergy were involved; and after securing the immense booty of which he had obtained possession, he dispersed his forces into garrison. In 1690 the adherents of King William who had been wounded in the attack on Limerick were hospitably received by the inhabitants of Cashel, whose humane attention induced the king, on the bridge of Golden, about four miles distant, to renew their charter by letter, which is still in the possession of the corporation.

The town is situated on the coach-road from Dublin to Cork, about two miles from the river Suir, in a fine open country; it consists of one principal street, from which several others diverge irregularly, and contains 1190 houses. Since 1840 the town has been under the provisions of the act 9th George IV., for Paving and Cleansing. The inhabitants are still, however, very inadequately supplied with water, partly by pumps which in summer afford only a scanty quantity of hard water unfit for many culinary and domestic purposes, and partly by pipes conveying soft water from a distance of two miles. A small stream from the same source was brought into the town some years since, through the exertions of Archdeacon Cotton, at an expense of above £200, which was defrayed by subscription and an annual grant of £50 from the grand jury of the county, under the authority of an act of parliament called Lee's act; but in a very short time it proved useless. Subsequently, W. B. Upton, Esq., an inhabitant, suggested a plan for bringing such a supply from a distance of 17 miles as would admit of the passage of boats also, by which turf from the Bog of Allen, about $\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant, and coal from the Killenaule collieries, about 14 miles distant, might be conveyed to the town. The estimated cost was £9000, to advance which sum an application was made to government; but the plan failed in obtaining the sanction of government, and no steps have been since taken towards accomplishing so desirable an object. The archbishop's palace was originally situated at Cammas, about two miles distant: the palace occupied by the later archbishops, and which is now the Deanery, stands within the city; it was erected about the middle of the last century, and is a large and well-built mansion, with extensive gardens attached, from which the ruins of the cathedral on the Rock appear strikingly grand and conspicuous. Attached is a building in which is deposited a library of nearly 9000 volumes, chiefly bequeathed by Archbishop Bolton in 1741, for the use of the clergy of the diocese; some of the clergy have of late contributed to its augmentation, by subscriptions for the purchase of a few valuable modern works. The infantry barracks at Cashel are a handsome range of building, occupying three sides of a quadrangle, and are adapted to the accommodation of one field officer, six other officers, and 146 non-commissioned officers and privates, with stabling for three horses, and an hospital for 21 patients. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday: the market-house, situated in the centre of the Main-street, is not now open for the use of the public, except for the purpose of weighing butter and other articles. Fairs have long been held on March 26th and Aug. 7th; and in 1826 a grant of a fair on the third Tuesday in every month was made to Richard Pennefather, Esq., with a court of piepoudre. In 1835 a branch of the National Bank was opened. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Clonmel; it is the residence of the chief magistrate of police, and a chief constabulary police station for the district.

As previously noticed, the town was erected into a borough about 1216, by Archbishop Donat, who gave burgage tenements to the burgesses, and is said to have conferred on them the same privileges as were enjoyed by the burgesses of Bristol, reserving to the see a yearly rent of 12d. out of each burgage. Archbishop Marian, in 1430, granted the town to the provost and twelve burgesses, except only the shambles, then situated behind the present shambles, and the great bakehouse in John-street, subsequently called Cunningham's Hall: he also granted them free pasture in all his lands (except meadows, corn, and manors), and empowered them to hold a hundred court and a court baron for hearing and determining pleas; reserving out of these grants only small chief-rents. Richard II., in 1378, confirmed all the privileges of the corporation; and other charters, chiefly confirmatory, were bestowed by Archbishop Roland in 1557, and by Queen Elizabeth, in reward of dutiful conduct, in 1584. Charles I., in 1637, granted a new charter, ordaining that the town or borough should be called the "City of Cashel;" and two years after, another, which became the governing charter. James II. seized the franchises into his own hands, pursuant to a decree of the exchequer, and subsequently granted a charter which is now considered void: their ancient rights and privileges were restored to the corporation by King William, as before stated. In the "New Rules" of the 25th of Charles II., for regulating corporations in Ireland, it was ordained that the appointment of the mayor, recorder, and town-clerk should be subject to the approbation of the lord-lieutenant and privy council.

of a mayor, aldermen (limited by the charter to 17 in number), two bailiffs, and an unlimited number of commons, aided by a recorder, town-clerk, two sergeants-at-mace, a sword-bearer, and a crier; a treasurer was also appointed. The mayor was elected annually on June 29th, by the court of common hall, and was one of three persons nominated by the aldermen from among themselves, but the choice might be extended to the citizens and commons, at the discretion of the aldermen; he was sworn into office on Sept. 29th, and, with the concurrence of three aldermen, had power to appoint a deputy during illness or absence. The aldermen, on vacancies occurring, were chosen from among the freemen by the remaining aldermen, and held office for life. The recorder, according to practice, was elected by the mayor and aldermen, but the charter had given the power to the entire body; he held his office during good behaviour, and might appoint a deputy. The bailiffs, by the charter, were eligible from among the citizens, one to be chosen by the mayor and aldermen and one by the corporation at large; according to practice they were elected annually on June 29th in the common hall from among the freemen, on the recommendation of the aldermen. The town-clerk was elected annually with the mayor and bailiffs; the sword-bearer was elected by the whole body, and held his office during good behaviour; the serjeant-at-mace and the crier were appointed by the mayor. The freedom was obtained only by gift of the mayor and aldermen, who were the ruling body of the corporation, and had the entire management of its affairs. By the act 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108, the corporation was dissolved; the estates and property it possessed became vested in the twenty-one commissioners for lighting and paving, and the proceeds have been found amply sufficient for the purposes of the town. Cashel returned two members to the Irish parliament until the Union, since which it has sent one to the Imperial parliament. The right of election was formerly vested solely in the corporation, but by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 88, was extended to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, comprising an area of 3974 acres, which was constituted the new electoral borough: the number of electors registered in 1843 was 250.

The mayor, deputy-mayor, and recorder were justices of the peace for the city of Cashel and the county of Tipperary, and also judges of the tithes court, the attachments and other process of which were executed by the bailiffs. This court, which by the charter was to be held weekly, and of which Thursday was the court day, had jurisdiction (but not exclusive) in causes not exceeding the amount of £20 late currency, arising within the ancient bounds of the city and its liberties; and suits might be commenced in it either by action or attachment, on affidavit made before the mayor, or his deputy, of the amount and cause of action. Very few causes, however, were latterly tried in this court, attributable to the expense of the proceedings, and to the facility for recovering debts afforded by the assistant-barrister's court. In addition to this jurisdiction, the charter gave it a farther jurisdiction to the extent of 40s. in causes arising without the city and liberties; but this power was in some degree limited by the 36th of George III., cap. 39, which required that the cause of action should have arisen, or that the defendant should be resident, within the city and liberties. The charter also granted a court baron to be held before the mayor every three weeks; and a court leet with view of frankpledge, to be held within a month after Easter and Michaelmas, before the mayor and recorder, or before one of them and the deputy of the other. Quarter-sessions for the county are held here in January and July, and generally continue ten days; petty-sessions for the division are held every Wednesday by the county magistrates; and similar sessions were formerly held for the city, at which both the county and city magistrates presided. The county court-house and prison, erected in 1818, on the south side of the town, fronting the green, form a neat and substantial pile of building of stone: the former is sufficiently adapted to the transaction of business; and the latter, to which the city magistrates also used to commit prisoners, contains eight cells, three day-rooms, and two airing-yards. The late corporation estates comprise 2024 Irish acres, let on lease for 99 years to various tenants, and producing an income of about £220 per annum.

The first bishop of Cashel of whom any authentic notice occurs is Cormac Mac-Cutinan, King of Munster, who, as was not uncommon at that period, exercised also spiritual jurisdiction over his subjects. He was descended from Ængus, and succeeded to the throne of Munster and to the see of Cashel, in 901; but was killed on his retreat from battle in 908, and interred in the abbey of Castledermot, where he had been educated. From this period till 1152 only four of his successors are noticed, who, with the exception of one, are all styled archbishops of Cashel. Donat O'Lonargan, who then succeeded to the bishopric, received from Cardinal Paparo, the legate of Pope Eugene III., one of the four palli which had been sent by him to Ireland, and of which the other three were conferred on Gelasius of Armagh, Gregory of Dublin, and Edan of Tuam. During the prelacy of Donald O'Hullucan, who succeeded in 1158, a synod was held here by command of Henry II., at which all the archbishops and bishops of Ireland, except the archbishop of Armagh, assisted, and at which Christian O'Conarchy, the pope's legate, and who was also bishop of Lismore, presided. At this synod Henry received from the archbishops and bishops, charters, with their seals appended, by which they confirmed the kingdom of Ireland to him and his heirs, and constituted them kings and lords of Ireland for ever; transcripts of these charters were sent by the king to Pope Alexander, who by his apostolical authority gave his confirmation to them. Pope Innocent III., in 1210, confirmed to Donat O'Lonargan II., who had been promoted to the see in 1206, all the revenues and possessions of the archbishopric, and subjected to his metropolitan jurisdiction the cathedrals of the suffragan bishoprics of Limerick, Killaloe, Fennaboe, Waterford, Ardmore, Lismore, Cloyne, Cork, Ross, Ardfert, and Emly. Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, about the time of the English invasion built a new cathedral church, and converted the structure previously existing into a chapel or chapter-house: he also made large grants of land to the see, which was further endowed by his son Donat, surnamed Carbrac, with some land in Thomond, and with the islands of Sulleith and Kismacayl; all which grants were confirmed by King John in 1215. The see of Emly was united with the archbishopric of Cashel by act of parliament in 1568, during the prelacy of James Mac Caghwell, who had succeeded to the dignity in 1567 and was the first archbishop of the united sees of Cashel and Emly. Miler Magrath, who was elevated to the united sees in 1570, was in high favour with Queen Elizabeth, from whom he held in commendam the sees of Lismore and Waterford, on his resignation of which he obtained the two bishoprics of Killala and Achonry, in Connaught, which he held till his decease. The grant of these sees appears to have been made to him and his successors for ever, in the way of union to the see of Cashel and Emly; but the arrangement terminated at Magrath's death. After the death of Archbishop Thomas Price, in 1684, the see remained vacant for a long period, during which the revenues were received by collectors chosen by the crown, and were distributed by James II. among the Roman Catholic bishops, no successor being appointed till 1690, when Narcissus Marsh became archbishop. By the Church Temporalities act (3rd of William IV.) it was specially provided that the see of Waterford and Lismore, vacant by the death of Dr. Bourke, should be annexed to Cashel and Emly, which accordingly took place on the passing of that act, when the temporalities of both of the dioceses then merged became vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

The late Archbishop, or Ecclesiastical Province, of Cashel comprehended the eleven dioceses of Cashel, Emly, Limerick, Ardfert and Aghadoe, Waterford, Lismore, Cork, Ross, Cloyne, Killaloe, and Kilfenora. It contained a superficies of 3,439,750 acres, and comprised within its limits the whole of the civil province of Munster; parts of the county of Kilkenny, and King's county, in the province of Leinster; and part of the county of Galway, in the province of Connaught. The archbishop was primate and metropolitan of Munster; he presided over the whole province, and exercised all episcopal jurisdiction within the united dioceses of Cashel, Emly, Waterford, and Lismore. In consequence, however, of the union of the see of Limerick with the consolidated see of Ardfert and Aghadoe; also of the sees of Cork, Ross, and Cloyne; and of those of Killaloe and Kilfenora, which were united to the sees of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh in the ancient province of Tuam; three bishops only presided over the other seven dioceses of the province and were suffragan to the archbishop of Cashel. Under the provisions of the Church Temporalities act, all archiepiscopal jurisdiction ceased on the death of Dr. Laurence, the last archbishop; and Cashel, with the united dioceses of Emly, Waterford, and Lismore, became a bishopric suffragan, with the other sees of the province, to the archbishop of Dublin.

The Diocese of Cashel comprehends the greater part of the county of Tipperary, and small portions of the counties of Kilkenny and Limerick; it is 35 British miles in length and 29 in breadth, comprehending an estimated superficies of 278,000 acres, of which 600 are in Kilkenny, 850 in Limerick, and the remainder in the county of Tipperary. There belonged to the late arch-episcopal see, or united dioceses of Cashel and Emly, 20,046½ statute acres; and the gross amount of its yearly revenue, including the prebends of Glankeen and Isertlaurence, on an average of three years ending December 1831, was by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners returned at £7354. The present bishop of Cashel, who resides at Waterford, has an income of £5000. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, and archdeacon, and the five prebendaries of Glankeen, Killaldriffe or Killaltry, Fennor, Newchapel, and Kilhragh. The vicars-choral are a separate corporate body, anciently consisting of eight, but now of five only; they are endowed with various lands and tithes, the former comprising 644 statute acres. The economy estate of the cathedral consists of the rectorial tithes of the parish of St. Patrick's Rock, and the interest of £1000 in the new three and a half per cent. stock, together with a small sum in the old 3½ per cents.; amounting, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, to £399. 9. per annum. The diocese comprises 49 benefices, of which 22 are unions, and the remainder single parishes or portions of parishes; three are in the gift of the crown, three in lay patronage, and the remainder in the patronage of the archbishop. The total number of parishes or districts is 103, of which 92 are rectories and vicarages, and the remainder perpetual or impropriate curacies, or parishes without provision for the cure of souls. There are 31 churches, and two other buildings in which divine service is performed; and 27 glebe-houses.

In the Roman Catholic divisions the archbishop of Cashel is primate and metropolitan of Munster; his dioceses are Cashel and Emly, to which the six bishoprics of Cloyne and Ross, Cork, Kerry, Killaloe, Limerick, and Waterford and Lismore, are suffragan. The diocese of Kilfenora, which is united to Kilmacduagh in the province of Connaught, is alternately suffragan to the archbishoprics of Cashel and Tuam. The united Roman Catholic dioceses of Cashel and Emly comprise 47 parochial unions or districts, containing 88 chapels served by 46 parish priests and 63 coadjutors or curates. The parochial benefices of Thurles and Moykarky are held by the archbishop: the cathedral, situated in the town of Thurles, is a very fine structure. There are one Presbyterian and four other dissenting places of worship in Cashel and Emly dioceses.

The city is comprised within the parishes of St. John the Baptist and St. Patrick's Rock; the former containing 5207, and the latter 9454, statute acres. The living of St. John's is a rectory entire, united time immemorially to the entire rectory of Ballyclerihan and the rectory and vicarage of Coleman, together constituting the corps of the deanery of Cashel, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £256, and of the whole union £362. 12. Besides several tenements, the lands belonging to the dean comprise 203½ acres, let on lease at a rent of £58 and annual renewal fines of £40; the gross annual revenue of the deanery, including tithe, as returned by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £625. The church, erected on the site of a former edifice, and completed in the year 1783, is a handsome and spacious structure of stone, with a lofty spire of good proportions; and serves both for the cathedral and the parochial church: the result of a survey made by Archbishop Agar having proved the old cathedral church to be incapable of restoration, the two were consolidated by act of council in 1749, and a portion of the economy fund of the cathedral was appropriated to the erection of this church, and lately towards keeping it in repair. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners, also, recently made a grant of £138. 18. for repairing it. The living of St. Patrick's Rock is a rectory and vicarage, the rectory appropriate to the economy fund of the cathedral church, and the vicarage to that of the vicars-choral; the tithe rent-charge is £525. 19. 4., of which £271. 14. 3. are payable to the former, and the remainder to the latter. In the Roman Catholic divisions the two parishes form the district called Cashel, which is the union or parish of the dean. The chapel of St. John, situated in Friar-street, is a spacious and elegant structure, which lately underwent extensive alteration and repair, including the erection of a spire; it is faced with hewn stone, and is very ornamental to the city. Behind it is a convent of nuns of the order of the Presentation; and there is another chapel at Rosegreen, in the parish of St. Patrick's Rock. Cashel also contains a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, a neat building situated in the Main-street, and erected by subscription on a site granted at a nominal rent by W. Pennefather, Esq.: in this edifice part of the old prison built by Edward I. was incorporated; it was opened for divine service on the 2nd of July, 1833. At the entrance to the city from Dublin are the buildings of the Charter school, founded in 1751, and towards the support of which Archbishop Price contributed £50 per annum during his lifetime, and at his death bequeathed £300; it was also endowed with £600 by Archbishop Palliser, and, in 1746, with a lease for 99 years of 27 acres of land by the corporation. For many years 83 boys were supported and educated in this establishment; but since the withdrawal of parliamentary aid from the society at Dublin, the school has been discontinued. A parochial school is supported by annual grants of £21 from the archbishop and £10 late currency from the dean, in addition to which the dean and chapter provide a school-house and the books. A national school was established by the late Rev. Dr. Wright, parish priest, which is aided by £25 per annum from the Board of Education, and by collections at the Roman Catholic chapel: the school-house is a good slated building erected by Dr. Wright at an expense of £332. A female school is conducted by the Presentation nuns, and is aided by an annual grant of £32 from the Board, and a donation of £60 per annum from the parish priest: there is also, among other schools, a Sunday school well attended. The county infirmary is a handsome and commodious building, situated on the green; it originally contained but 40 beds, but has been since enlarged for the reception of a greater number of patients. In 1835, before the enlargement, the number admitted into the house was 325, and of out-patients 4386; the total expenditure for that year amounted to £1043. 14. A charitable loan society has been established for advancing sums of money on security to necessitous tradesmen, who repay it by weekly instalments in the proportion of one shilling in the guinea. The union workhouse, on a site of 6½ acres subject to a rent of £34 per annum, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £5500, and is constructed to contain 600 paupers.

THE ROCK OF CASHEL is an extraordinary mass rising on every side with a precipitous and rugged elevation, and consisting of concentric strata of limestone; the remains of the ancient structures by which it is crowned have an imposing and highly romantic appearance. Among these, Cormac's Chapel, standing in a line parallel with the south side of the choir of the cathedral, is one of the best-preserved buildings of that age in the kingdom; the walls and roof are of stone, the latter finely groined. The entrance doorway is a Norman arch, richly moulded and embellished with zig-zag and bead-work; above it is a device in bas-relief of a centaur shooting at an animal with a bow and arrow. The groining of the roof of the edifice springs from low pillars with capitals variously ornamented. At the eastern end is a large recess, separated from the western part by a circular arch highly enriched and adorned with grotesque heads of men and animals; within this recess is another of smaller dimensions, probably intended for the altar. The walls of each portion of the building are relieved with blank arches, and the pilasters from which they spring have been richly ornamented with various devices. A window has been opened by the Ven. Archdeacon Cotton, which has rendered visible some very ancient painting in fresco, in the recesses of the walls; fourteen stone figures, representing the Twelve Apostles and others, have also been discovered. The exterior walls of the chapel are, on the south side, ornamented with blank arches supported by pillars with grotesque heads; and attached to the building is a square tower, strengthened with bands of masonry and similarly ornamented. The Ancient Cathedral, now in ruins, was a spacious cruciform structure, with a central tower supported on pointed arches, and generally in the early English style of architecture; it is in several parts embattled, and, with other features of a military character, presents a venerable and singularly picturesque appearance. But it is more striking as a grand and well broken mass, than remarkable either for the elegance or richness of its details. The only monument worthy of notice is that of Archbishop Magrath, who is represented in a recumbent posture; it bears the date 1621, and was erected by himself about one year before his death. On the south side of the cathedral is the Vicars' Hall; and at the eastern angle of the north transept is an ancient round tower, in a very perfect state of preservation, its stone roof being still entire: the several stages were lighted by windows, the ledges of which are still remaining; the original doorway has been walled up, and another opened leading into the cathedral. The Dominican Friary, situated in Moor-lane, was, after its dissolution, granted in perpetuity by Henry VIII. to Walter Fleming, in capite, at the annual rent of 2s. 6d.: this was one of the noblest buildings of the order in Ireland, and considerable remains of its spacious cruciform church may yet be seen between the Rock and the Main-street. At a short distance from the town are the remains of Hore Abbey, which are noticed in the description of the parish of that name. At the back of Friar-street formerly were the remains of the Franciscan monastery, the site of which is partly occupied by the Roman Catholic chapel; after its dissolution it was granted, in the 31st of Henry VIII., to Edmund Butler, Archbishop of Cashel, to be held by him in capite at an annual rent of 2s. 10d. On the ascent to the cathedral is a stone, on which, according to tradition, the kings of Munster were annually inaugurated. Cashel gives the titles of Viscount and Earl to the family of Moore, earls of Mountcashel.

CASTLANE.—See WHITECHURCH.

CASTLEBAR, a market and post town, a parish, the head of a union, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the barony of CARRA, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 44 miles (S.W.) from Sligo, and 125½ (W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 10,464 inhabitants, of whom 5137 are in the town. This place owes its rise and importance to Sir John Bingham, the ancestor of its present proprietor, who, in 1609, obtained for it the grant of a market and fair. In 1613, James I. granted the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, under which the government of the town was vested in a portreeve, fifteen free burgesses and a commonalty, with power to hold a court of record every Monday for the recovery of debts not exceeding five marks. The charter also conferred upon the portreeve and free burgesses the right of returning two members to the Irish parliament; and in 1620, the inhabitants received a grant of a second annual fair. After the quelling of the disturbances of 1798, in the autumn of that year the French, under the command of General Humbert, having landed in the bay of Kilcummin on the 22nd of August, made themselves masters of that place, and proceeded to Ballina, of which they took possession on the 24th. On the following day, General Hutchinson arrived at Castlebar from Galway, and being joined on the evening of the 26th by Lieut.-General Lake, every disposition was made for the reception of the invaders, who, nevertheless, after an obstinate contest, effected an entrance into the town, of which they kept possession for some days; but learning that the Marquess Cornwallis was approaching with his army, General Humbert abandoned the place, and retreated with his forces towards Sligo.

THE TOWN is situated near the eastern extremity of Lough Lannach, and on a river having its source therein and called Castlebar, which divides the place into two nearly equal parts; it is also on the mail-coach road from Ballinasloe to Westport, and consists of one principal street nearly a mile in length, from which diverge several smaller streets and lanes. It contains 831 houses, some of the best of which are built round the green, a pleasant promenade; the streets are paved and kept in repair at the expense of the county. The barracks, a fine range of building recently erected, and commodiously adapted for artillery and infantry, are arranged for 60 men of the former, and for 24 officers and 565 non-commissioned officers and privates of the latter. The linen manufacture, which was formerly much more extensive, is still carried on here; and a considerable quantity of linen and linen-yarn is sold in the linen-hall, a neat building at the entrance of the town from Ballina. There are a tobacco and snuff and a soap and candle manufactory, a brewery, and a tannery; and the general trade of the town, with the exception only of the linen trade, is gradually improving. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on May 11th, July 9th, Sept. 16th. and Nov. 18th. A branch of the National Bank was established in 1836. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Foxford; and it is a chief constabulary and a revenue police station.

Under the charter of James I., the corporation continued to return two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised, and the sum of £15,000 awarded as compensation was paid to Richard, Earl of Lucan. From that period till 1834, the corporation occasionally elected officers, but exercised little or no magisterial jurisdiction; for the last twenty years it has been virtually extinct; and the court of record has been consequently discontinued. The assizes for the county are held here, and also the quarter-sessions in January and October; petty-sessions are held every Saturday. The court-house is extensive and well arranged. The new county gaol, situated at the southern extremity of the town, is a spacious and handsome building with a castellated front, erected in 1834, at an expense of £23,000; the arrangement is on the radiating principle, with the governor's house in the centre. It is well adapted for classification and contains 140 cells, with day and work rooms and airing-yards, in one of which is a treadmill applied to the raising of water; in the upper part of the governor's house is the chapel, accessible to the prisoners by corridors communicating with it by neat iron bridges. The female prisoners are divided into two classes, under the care of a matron and assistant, and an excellent school has been established; the average number of prisoners (which in 1841 was 143) will allow a separate cell to each at night, and during the day the men are employed chiefly in breaking stones.

The PARISH, which is also called Aghish, comprises 14,794 statute acres; about 1400 are hog and waste, and the remainder arable and pasture. The lands are principally under tillage; the soil is good, and the system of agriculture much improved. The surrounding scenery is beautifully picturesque and finely varied, terminating in a distant view of the mountains by which the landscape is nearly surrounded. Castlebar, the seat of the Earl of Lucan, is romantically situated on the brow of a steep eminence overhanging the river, and attached to it is an extensive and well-wooded demesne, affording a pleasant promenade to the inhabitants of the town. Many of the inhabitants are employed in quarrying excellent limestone, used for building; and turf is carried by water for several miles, to the town, through the lake and the Castlebar river. A manorial court at which debts to any amount were recoverable, was formerly held by a senechal appointed by Lord Lucan; it has been discontinued for some years. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage in the diocese of Tuam, united by act of parliament, in 1711, to the rectories and vicarages of Breehy, Turlough, and Kildacamoge, and the vicarage of Islandedin, forming the union of Castlebar, in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, a handsome structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, was erected in 1825, at a cost of £2500, of which £2000 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits; there is also a church in the parish of Turlough. There is no glebe-house: the glebe of the union comprises 24 acres; and the title rent-charge of the parish is £142. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, including also Ballyhane and Breehy, and comprising two chapels, at Castlebar and Ballyhane; the former is a spacious slated edifice. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The county infirmary, a large building, is situated at the south end of the town; here are also a dispensary for the barony of Carra, and one for the town. The union workhouse, on a site of seven acres purchased for £341, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £6300, and is constructed to contain 600 paupers. At the head of Lough Lanach, near the town, is an ancient burial-place, commanding a fine view of the distant mountains; and on the other side of the lake are the ruins of a fortified residence. The Earl of Lucan enjoys the inferior title of Baron Lucan, of Castlebar.

CASTLE-BELLINGHAM, a post-town, in the parish of GERONSTOWN, union and barony of ARDEE, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Dundalk, and 34 (N. by W.) from Dublin; containing 665 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the river Glyde, and on the coach-road from Dublin to Belfast, takes its name from a castle belonging to the Bellingham family, which was burnt by the forces of James II. in their retreat before the army of King William, previously to the battle of the Boyne. The neighbourhood is embellished with several handsome seats. An extensive brewery, in which the celebrated Castle-Bellingham ale is made, and a large malt-house, give employment to about 70 persons: fairs are held on Easter-Tuesday and Oct. 10th, for cattle, linen, &c.; and here is a constabulary police station. The parish church, remarkable for its neatness, is situated in the town, and contains a fine font and some handsome monuments. Here is also a dispensary. Near the church, and at the entrance to the Castle demesne, some neat cottages in the Elizabethan style were erected for four widows, and endowed with £64 per annum, in 1826, by Sir W. Bellingham, Bart. There are some remains of the ancient castle near the river; and in a small bog adjoining, several perfect heads, with part of the horns, of the elk or moose deer have been found.—See GERONSTOWN and GREENMOUNT.

CASTLE-BLAKENEY, GALLAGH, or KILLASOLAN, a post-town and parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, partly in the barony of KILCONNELL, but chiefly in that of TYAQUIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 25 miles (E. N. E.) from Galway, and 86 (W.) from Dublin; containing 4496 inhabitants, of whom 233 are in the town or village. This parish is situated on the road from Ballinasloe to Tuam, and comprises 11,482½ statute acres: the principal seat is Castle Ffrench, that of Lord Ffrench. Here are two mills for grinding oatmeal. Limestone is abundant. There is a constabulary police station; and fairs are held in the town on Jan. 2nd, March 17th, Whit-Tuesday, July 26th, and Oct. 2nd; fairs are also held at Caltra, in this parish, q. v. see. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Elphin, and in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Bishop: the title rent-charge is £225. The church is a neat building, erected in 1832, by aid of a grant of £300 from the Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe-house, built in 1771, at a cost of about £400; with a glebe of 80 acres, and two detached glebes of four acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is sometimes called Caltra, from the chapel being situated there.

CASTLE-BLAYNEY, a market and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of MUCKNOE, barony of CREMORNE, county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER, 11 miles (S.E. by E.) from Monaghan, and 49 (N.N.W.) from Dublin; containing 2134 inhabitants. It derives its name and origin from Sir Edward Blayney, governor of the county in the reign of James I., and who, in consideration of the dependence of his garrisons at Monaghan and Newry for a supply of provisions, which was rendered precarious by the hostility of the intervening country, received a grant of two bally-betags of land here, on condition of his erecting a fort between Monaghan and Newry. Castle-Blayney was accordingly erected, as a secure halting-place for the royal troops, and Sir Edward received this extensive estate, which his descendants still enjoy. The collection of habitations formed in the vicinity never, however, assumed the appearance of a town until the establishment of the linen-market, and the rebuilding of the houses with stone, in the latter part of the last century, by the late noble proprietor. It is situated on the coach-road from Dublin to Londonderry, and consists of 339 houses; is lighted by subscription; and has a respectable appearance. It is formed of three streets meeting in the market-place, which is of a triangular form; and in the centre, on an elevated spot commanding every avenue, is the market-house, a very neat and ornamental building, with a spacious room on the second story, and a neat bell turret above the roof. Near the market-house are convenient shambles. The manufacture of linen, though not so extensive as formerly, furnishes employment to many persons in the surrounding districts; and there are three tanyards in the town. The principal market is on Wednesday, when considerable quantities of yarn and flax are sold: there are likewise markets for corn and butter, on Tuesday and Friday; and fairs for live stock are held on the first Wednesday in every month. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Dundalk. Here is a constabulary police station; also a neat sessions'-house, in which the quarter-sessions for the county are held four times in the year, and petty-sessions every alternate week; and a county bridewell, containing two day-rooms, seven cells, and two yards. The mansion of Castle-Blayney, the seat of Lord Blayney, is closely adjoining, and is encompassed by a demesne of great extent and beauty, which includes the Lake of Mucknoe and some fine woodland scenery; it is a handsome modern edifice, built near the site of the old castle. The ruins of an ancient fortress in Cornero wood, on the shore of the lake, are also within the demesne. The parish church of Mucknoe is in the town; it is very neat, with a handsome spire, and the interior has been comfortably fitted up by Lord Blayney, who has also planted the churchyard with trees and evergreens. There are likewise places of worship for Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, and Wesleyan Methodists; and a fever hospital. The union workhouse, on a site of 8½ acres, was completed in 1842, at an expense of £6150, and is constructed to admit 800 paupers.

CASTLEBRACK, a parish, in the union of ABBEY-LEIX, barony of TINNEHINCH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (W.N.W.) from Portarlington; containing 1924 inhabitants. This parish comprises 927½ statute acres: it is situated in the northeast angle of the county, where it joins King's county and on the river Oweness; and derives its name from the castle, now in ruins, which was built by the Dunne family. The seats are, Kilkavan, that of the late Rt. Rev. Dr. Sandes, Bishop of Killaloe; and Cappalaugh. Fairs are held on May 15th, Aug. 12th, and Nov. 15th. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and is part of the union of Rosinallis or Oregon; the rectory is inappropriate in General Dunne. The tithe rent-charge is £157. 12., of which £105. 1. 3. are payable to the impropricator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the unions or districts of Mountmellick and Rosinallis; the chapel is at Clonahadoc.

CASTLEBRIDGE, a village, partly in the parish of TICKILLEN, partly in ARDCOLME, but chiefly in ARDCAVAN, union of WEXFORD, barony of SHELMAIER EAST, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N.) from Wexford; containing 439 inhabitants. This place, which derives its name from the ancient castle that formerly stood here, is situated on the north side of Wexford harbour, at the confluence of the Castlebridge river with the river Sow, and on the road from Wexford to Oulart, at the junction of the parishes of Ardavan, Ardcorme, and the detached part of Tickillen. It consists of 88 houses, many of them neat dwellings, on both sides of the Castlebridge river; and is chiefly remarkable for its extensive trade in corn, for which its situation, commanding the whole extent of county to the south of Arklow, and its proximity to Wexford, are peculiarly favourable. Nearly the whole produce of that district is, in order to avoid the tolls at Wexford bridge, deposited in this village, where are very extensive stores, mills, and malt-houses, from which a canal was cut in 1810, opening a communication with the river Slaney. The stores are capable of containing 40,000 barrels of corn; and about 65,000 barrels are exported annually. The produce is sent by boats of 15 or 20 tons' burthen to Wexford harbour, where it is shipped, without any extra charge, on board vessels that convey it to the various channel ports between Glasgow and London. About 3000 barrels of malt are made here annually. Fairs have been long held on April 11th and Dec. 26th; and two others, lately established, are held on June 10th and Sept. 25th. A constabulary police force is stationed here. The parish church of Ardcorme, built on the site of the ancient castle, is in that part of the village which is in the parish of Ardavan: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £310. 18. for its repair. The Roman Catholic chapel for the district of Castlebridge, which includes the parishes of Ardavan, Ardcorme, St. Margaret, St. Nicholas, Skreen, and part of Killeek, is also in the village. A branch of the Skreen and Ardcorme dispensary has been established here.

CASTLEBUOY, or ST. JOHNSTOWN, an extra-parochial liberty, in the poor-law union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of ARDES, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N.E.) from Portaferry; containing 775 inhabitants. This place is situated on Cloghy bay, and comprises 1358½ statute acres. A commandery of St. John the Baptist of Jerusalem, dependent on the priory of Kilmainham, was founded here by Hugh de Lacy, in 1189, and continued till the commencement of the fifteenth century; the building is now in ruins.

The family of Echlin possess several townlands in freehold which have always enjoyed exemption from tithe and church cess, and also a manor that belonged to the commandery, the court of which is now held once in three weeks. The manor is called Cloghy; the court has jurisdiction over the liberty of Castlebuoy, the parishes of Slanes and Ballytrustin, and part of Witter, and any sum not exceeding £5 is recoverable in it, either by attachment or civil bill process. The lofty tower of the castle, and the ruins of the church, are situated in one of the most secluded and fertile vales in the Ardes. On a chain of rock in the channel, three miles east from the shore, is the South Rock or Kilwarlin light-house.

CASTLE-CARBERRY.—See CARBERRY.

CASTLE-CAULFIELD, a village, in the parish of DONAGHMORE, union and barony of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (W.) from Dungannon; containing 167 inhabitants. This town was founded by Sir Toby Caulfield, afterwards Lord Charlemont, to whom James I. had granted the lands called Ballydonnell, or the town of O'Donnell, in 1610. Sir Toby, in 1614, began building a mansion-house in the Elizabethan style, which afterwards acquired the name of Castle-Caulfield, and around which he located 41 British families, and mustered 30 men-at-arms. The second lord Charlemont added a large gate-house with towers, and a keep or donjon. In Pynnar's Survey the building is described as "the fairest house in all these parts;" it is now a stately ruin, the gables and clustered chimneys producing a fine effect. The village is situated in a fertile valley, on the road from Dungannon to Ballygawley, and consists of one small street containing 37 houses; the inhabitants are generally engaged in agriculture and the weaving of linen. A receiving-house for letters in connexion with Dungannon has been established. Limestone and coal are found in the neighbourhood; and fairs, held on the second Monday in every month, for the sale of live stock, are numerous attended. A court for the manor of Castle-Caulfield is held by the seneschal; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Saturday. Besides Castle-Caulfield, the seat of the Earl of Charlemont, here are several elegant houses.

The parish church, in this village, was built in 1685: it is a large and handsome edifice, in the Grecian style of architecture, except the south windows, which are in the later English style, and were brought from the old church of Donaghmore, destroyed in the war of 1641. A neat mural monument, in memory of the Rev. George Walker, was erected on the south side of the altar, by his widow, in 1703. This distinguished man, while residing here in 1688, raised a regiment of infantry at his own expense, to act against the adherents of James II., and proceeded to Londonderry, in the defence of which he had the principal share, and of which he eventually, on the death of Major Baker, became sole governor. After the siege was raised, he resigned the command of the garrison; came to England, where he was most graciously received by their Majesties; and in November, 1689, received the thanks of the house of commons, having just before published an account of the siege. A letter written by Archbishop Tillotson is extant, in which he says, "the king, besides his first bounty to Mr. Walker, hath made him bishop of Londonderry."

donderry, that so he may receive the reward of that great service in the place where he did it." He returned to Ireland with King William, and having resolved to serve a campaign before he took possession of his bishopric, was killed at the head of his regiment at the battle of the Boyne, on the 1st of July, 1690. In the village is also a chapel belonging to the General Assembly. Near the church is the male and female parochial school, capable of accommodating 300 children, and endowed with two acres of land and £5 per annum from the rector; it was built in 1823 at an expense of £253, with apartments for the master and mistress. The ruins of the castle, and a very large and perfect fort near Parkanour, are the only vestiges of antiquity; tradition points out the site of a friary, near the latter, but no remains are visible.

CASTLECOMER, a market and post town, and a parish, in the barony of FASSADINING, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Kilkenny, and 46 (S.W.) from Dublin; containing 13,535 inhabitants, of whom 1765 are in the town. This town is situated on the river Deen, and on the road from Kilkenny, by Athy, to Dublin. It suffered greatly, in the disturbances of 1798, from the violence of a party of the insurgents, by whom a considerable portion of the town was destroyed. It was, however, soon restored; and at present consists of one wide main street and several smaller, containing 275 houses, chiefly inhabited by persons engaged in the extensive collieries in the parish and neighbourhood. The infantry barracks, a neat range of buildings, are adapted for eight officers and 126 non-commissioned officers and privates, with suitable offices. The market is chiefly for provisions, and some neat shambles have been erected: fairs are held on March 27th, May 3rd, June 21st, Aug. 10th, Sept. 14th, Oct. 28th, and Dec. 14th. In the excise arrangements, the town is within the district of Kilkenny. A constabulary police force is stationed here: the quarter-sessions for the county once in the year (in June), and petty-sessions every alternate Tuesday, are held in the town; and a court for the recovery of small debts is held by the seneschal of the manor.

The PARISH comprises 21,592 statute acres, and contains the principal portion of the extensive coal-field of the district. The coal is of the kind commonly called Kilkenny coal, which, containing no bitumen, burns without blaze or smoke; the larger pieces alone are applied to domestic purposes, the culm being chiefly used for burning lime. The collieries have been worked more than a century. The regular strata were first discovered in digging for iron-ore in that part of the territory of Ida which belonged to the Brenans, and which was purchased from that sept, in the reign of Charles I., by Sir Christopher Wandesford, and erected into a lordship by charter of the same monarch. The extent of the coal-field at that time was estimated at 13,400 plantation acres; the father of the last lord Wandesford was the first who worked the pits to any advantage. The principal workings are all between the small river Deen, which flows by the town, and the hills to the east and north-east, extending towards Donane. The substratum on which the coal rests is remarkable for withstanding the agency of fire, and has been used with great success in the making of fire-bricks; the depth of the pits varies from 31 to 39 yards. The chief property in the mines was vested in the Wandesford family, to whom this place gave the title of Earl, now extinct: their representative, the Hon. Charles Butler Wandesford, uncle of the present Marquess of Ormonde, inherited in right of his mother, the sister of the late Lord Wandesford; and has a handsome modern residence adjoining the town. A great portion of the coal is conveyed through the southern counties by the rivers Suir and Barrow, and by the Grand Canal to Dublin. There are also some collieries at Pheroadagh, or Firoda, about a mile and a half to the north-west of Castlecomer, from which fine black glossy coal and culm are raised with greater facility than from the mines here. The parish contains a bleach-green and a grist-mill.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £726. 18. 6. The church, situated in the town, is a neat edifice with a tower, built in 1757, and enlarged in 1818 by aid of a loan of £600 from the Board of First Fruits; there is a chapel of ease at Mooneenroe, built in 1828, by subscription aided by a grant of £900 from the same Board. Lectures on religious subjects are delivered, also, in the schoolrooms adjoining the church and chapel of ease. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £1500 from the Board, in 1819; the glebe consists of 12 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the three several unions or districts of Castlecomer, Clough, and Muckalee, the first of which comprises about one-half of it: there are four chapels belonging to these unions, one of them in the town. Here is also a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Near the Roman Catholic chapel is a convent, and adjoining it a school under the care of the nuns. The schools adjoining the parish church and chapel of ease are supported by an annual donation of £100 from the Hon. C. B. Wandesford, and £34 from the rector. A dispensary was erected by the Countess of Ormonde, and an excellent fever hospital by Mr. Wandesford; an auxiliary branch of the Hibernian Bible Society, also, has been established in the town.

CASTLE-CONNEL, or STRADBALLY, a post-town and parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, union and county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E.) from Limerick, and 88 (S.W. by W.) from Dublin; containing 5433 inhabitants, of whom 1106 are in the town. This place, which was once called Carrig-Cuail, derives its name from an ancient fortress, originally a seat of the O'Briens, kings of Thomond, and in which a grandson of Brian Boroihme is said to have been treacherously murdered by the reigning prince. At the period of the English invasion this was a fortress of some eminence. In 1199 King John granted to William de Burgh, a baron of the family of Fitz-Aldelm, five knights' fees, in which was included this parish, with a condition that he should erect a castle therein. This and the adjoining parishes were the first places in Limerick of which the English obtained possession. In 1578 Queen Elizabeth wrote letters of condolence to William de Burgh for the loss of his eldest son, who had been slain in a skirmish with the Earl of Desmond; and in the same year she created him Baron of Castle-Connell, and gave him a yearly pension of 100 marks. In the war of 1641 Lord Castle-Connell forfeited his estate and title, which were, however, restored on the accession of James II.; the title became extinct in 1691, but the estate continues in the De Burgh family. In 1651 a strong garrison was placed in the castle by General Ireton, while on his march to blockade Limerick. It was also strongly garrisoned by the troops of James II. in 1690, but on the 12th of August, in that year, was surrendered at discretion by Captain Barnwell to Brigadier Steuart. On the retreat of the English army, it was again garrisoned by James's troops, who in the following year demanded it for two days against the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt: after its surrender it was blown up by order of General De Ginkell.

The TOWN is pleasantly situated on the eastern bank of the Shannon, which separates Limerick from Clare; it lies a mile and a half west of the Dublin road, and contains 199 houses, many of which are handsome villas and cottages of modern erection. It is resorted to during the summer, for the benefit of its spa, whose waters resemble those of Spa in Germany. The soil around the spring is of a calcareous nature, and the sediment of the water has been successfully applied for the cure of ulcers, while the waters themselves have proved very efficacious in scorbutic affections, bilious complaints, obstructions in the liver, jaundice, and worms; they are a strong chalybeate, having a mixture of absorbent earth and marine salt. Treatises have been written on their nature, and many persons are stated to have been cured by them, after ineffectually trying the continental spas. The waters rise from between limestone and basalt, filtering through a thin layer of blue nectunous earth, and yielding a constant supply. The spring is inclosed in a mean building; the surplus water flows into the Shannon. There are two good hotels, and a number of commodious lodging-houses, in the town; a coach runs regularly to Limerick, and there is a daily post. A constabulary police force has been stationed here, and petty-sessions are held every alternate Monday. There is a patent for fairs on Easter-Monday, June 1st, July 16th, and Oct. 4th; only the first, however, is now held.

The PARISH comprises 6678 statute acres, about three-fourths of which are arable and pasture land, and the remainder common pasture and reclaimable bog on the bank of the Shannon. The lands are principally under tillage; the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture rapidly improving by the introduction of green crops; limestone is abundant. The bulk of the inhabitants are agriculturists, or dependent on the visitors to the spa. But many obtain employment in cutting turf, and conveying it to Limerick, particularly for the large distillery there; River Lawn, a mile below the town, is an extensive bleach green and mill; and at Annacotty, near Mount Shannon, one of the first paper-mills established in Ireland was erected by Mr. Joseph Sexton. The parish is connected with the county of Clare by an ancient structure called O'Brien's Bridge, originally built by one of the royal line of Thomond, and in later times often strongly contested by the various parties who strove to obtain possession either of the important fortress of Castle-Connell, or the wealthy city of Limerick. It was partially destroyed by the Earl of Ormonde, in 1556, but was soon afterwards restored. The Shannon is not navigable here until within about a mile of the bridge, where the subsidiary canal from the Clare side joins the river; there being many shoals and rocks in its channel. It abounds with trout and salmon, of which latter there is a valuable fishery at the waterfall called the Leap. The falls are numerous, a descent of 50 feet occurring in less than three miles; and they add greatly to the beauty of the scenery, which is further embellished with the mansions and parks of the neighbouring gentry, and with the ruins of three ancient castles, that of Castle-Connell being in the parish, and those of Newcastle and Castle-Troy being distinctly visible from its higher parts: the Keeper mountains form a noble background on the north-east. The climate is good, the air remarkably pure, and great improvements have recently been made by reclaiming bog, particularly by the proprietors of the Limerick distillery. Among the seats, the most distinguished is Mount Shannon, the residence of the Earl of Clare, and one of the finest mansions in the south of Ireland: the ball and library are particularly entitled to notice, and the grounds are laid out with great taste. Not far distant are, Hermitage, the beautiful seat of Lord Massy; Caherline; New Garden; Shannon View; Belmont; Stormont; and Doonass, the seat of Sir Hugh Dillon Massy, Bart. A handsome range of well-built houses, called the Tontine, three stories high, with projecting roofs, was erected here in 1812, by the late W. Gabbett, Esq., from a fund raised by subscription; but not answering the expectation of the subscribers, they have been sold. Opposite these buildings is an island of about four acres, connected with the main land by a causeway 23 feet wide. About two miles north of Castle-Connell is the small but pretty village of Montpelier, which has a sulphureous spa of great virtue in ulcerous and cutaneous diseases; but in consequence of other water being allowed to mingle with it, its efficacy has been diminished, and few resort to it.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, episcopally united, in 1803, to the rectory and vicarage of Kilinegariff, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £168. 9., and of the whole benefice £387. 5. The church, repaired in 1809 by aid of a grant of £250 from the Board of First Fruits, was greatly enlarged in 1830, and is now a handsome cruciform edifice with a lofty octagonal spire. There is no glebe-house, but a glebe of 2½ acres. The Roman Catholic union is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a large plain edifice. A dispensary was established in 1819. The only remains of the strong fortress of Castle-Connell are, part of the tower, and fragments of some other parts, situated on an isolated limestone rock having an area of 42 yards by 27½. The only other vestige of antiquity is on the island opposite the Tontine, which was formerly called Inis-cluan; it consists of the remains of a friary founded in 1291 by Renald de Burgh, for Franciscans, and has lately been converted into out-houses to a handsome newly-erected cottage.

CASTLE-CONNOR, a parish, in the barony of TYRERRAGH, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Ballina; containing 5136 inhabitants. This place derives its name from an ancient castle, the ruins of which are still visible; and is situated on the river Moy, and on the road from Ballina to Sligo. The parish comprises 16,677½ statute acres: the greater portion is under an improving system of tillage, and here are some large stock farms; there is a considerable extent of bog, and abundance of limestone is quarried for agricultural and other purposes. The principal seats are, Scurmorc, Moyview, and Knockroe House. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, united by act of council, in 1806, to the vicarage of Kilglass; the rectory, formerly appropriate to the see, is now sequestered in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £357. 4. 6., one-half of which is payable to the commissioners, and the other to the vicar. There is a church in each of the parishes; that in Castle-Connor was built in 1818, by aid of a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built in 1810, by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £675 from the same Board: the glebes of the union comprise 50 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; a new and large chapel has been lately built near Corbally, on the road leading from Ballina to Sligo. Here is a dispensary. There are some remains of the castle, as already observed, on the bank of the Moy, and of the old church of Kilvanley with a burial-ground. There are also some Danish rats: one of these, on the lands of Moyview, is supposed to be the finest in Ireland. In it are two underground apartments, of oval form, sixteen feet long, eight wide, and in height seven feet, and connected by a long low passage, through which it is necessary to creep; they are approached in the same way. From the second of these rooms, a similar passage proceeds northward for some yards, and, by an abrupt turn to the right, reaches into the area of the fort, now a fine level and fertile meadow. The Irish name of this place is Ra-wil-cough, "the fort of the son of battle."

CASTLE-CONWAY, KERRY.—See KILLORGLIN.

CASTLECORR.—See KILBRIDE.

CASTLE-DAWSON, or DAWSON'S-BRIDGE, a market and post town, in the parish and union of MAGHERAFELT, barony of LOUGHINSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 28 miles (N. W.) from Belfast, and 97 (N.) from Dublin; containing 575 inhabitants. This place derives its name from its proprietors, the Dawson family. On the plantation of Ulster, the eight townlands of Mayola were granted by James I. to Sir Thomas Phillips, whose sons sold them, in 1633, to Thomas Dawson, Esq., from whom they have descended to the Right Hon. G. R. Dawson. The town appears to have assumed its present form and name in the year 1710, during the proprietorship of Joshua Dawson, Esq., chief secretary for Ireland, and for many years member of parliament for the borough of Wicklow. It is delightfully situated on the Mayola, over which is a handsome stone arch, erected by the Dawson family, from which circumstance the town derived its former name of Dawson's-Bridge: it consists of two principal and some smaller streets, containing 118 houses, many of them large and well built. Here were some extensive cotton-twist mills, built in 1803, and furnishing employment to about 100 persons in the buildings and about 800 in the adjoining parishes; but they have been discontinued. Near the town are large flour and oatmeal mills; and in several places in the neighbourhood are manufactories of coarse earthenware, bricks, &c., and a bleach-green in which 800 pieces of linen are annually prepared for the London houses. The market, on Saturday, is well supplied with every kind of provisions; and in the season great quantities of grain, pork, and butter are purchased here, principally for the Belfast merchants: the market-house and grain stores are extensive and well built. Fairs are held on the last Saturday in each month, for the sale of linen-cloth, yarn, cattle, pigs, sheep, and pedlery. The eight townlands of Mayola were, by letters-patent, in 1712, erected into the manor of Castle-Dawson, with extensive privileges; and a manorial court is held monthly by the senechal, in which debts to the amount of £20 are recoverable. There is a constabulary police station.

The soil in every part of the neighbourhood is fertile, and under an excellent system of cultivation: coal is found, but no attempt has been made to work it, the seams being too thin to pay the expense, while turf is abundant. Nearly adjoining the town is The House, the residence of the Right Hon. G. R. Dawson, situated in a beautiful demesne, in which is an ancient avenue opening to a magnificent view of Lough Neagh. On an eminence close to the town stood till lately a lofty obelisk, erected by the Earl of Bristol to commemorate the virtues and benevolence of the Dawson family; but, in building a Methodist chapel, it was thrown down. There are several other handsome houses in the neighbourhood. The church of Castle-Dawson is small, but very neat; it is a private endowment of the Dawson family, and serves as a chapel of ease to the parish of Ballyscullion, the building being on the western side of the Mayola, in that parish. The former edifice was built in 1710, by Joshua Dawson, Esq., and having fallen into ruin some years since, the present structure was erected by the Right Hon. G. R. Dawson, by whom it has been beautifully ornamented; on a brass tablet in an ancient carved oak frame, is inscribed the genealogy of the family. The chaplain has a portion of the rectorial tithe rent-charge of the parish of Rasharkin, purchased by the Board of First Fruits in 1789, and amounting to £34. 12. 4. per annum. There is a large meeting-house for Presbyterians.

Of the castle built by Thomas Dawson, deputy-commissary in the reign of Charles I., and which stood in the demesne, near the church, little now remains; only the foundations of the walls and terraces are traceable. A castle built by Joshua Dawson, Esq., in the year 1713, is also in ruins; and The House, built in 1768 by Arthur Dawson, who was member of parliament for the county of Londonderry, and chief baron of the exchequer, is now the family mansion. The present proprietor has made some extensive plantations around it and on other parts of his estate, which flourish luxuriantly, and greatly embellish the surrounding scenery: Shillgray wood is very ancient, and contains some remarkably fine oak and beech trees. Old arms, ornaments of gold, spears, celts, and other relics have been found here. In the neighbourhood are some bogs, 30 feet deep, in which four separate layers of timber are imbedded: the lowest is principally oak, in a very sound and perfect state; the next chiefly yew, the third fir, and the uppermost birch, hazel, hawthorn, &c. Nuts, acorns, and the cones of fir, are frequently found in these bogs, in very good condition.—See BALLYSCULLION and MAGHERAFELT.

CASTLEDERG, or DERG-BRIDGE, a market-town, and the head of a union, in the parish of SKIRTS, barony of OMAH, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 8 miles (S.) from Strabane, and 107½ (N.) from Dublin; containing 476 inhabitants. The town is indebted for its origin to Sir John Davis, attorney-general for Ireland to James I., to whom a grant of 2000 acres of land, then called Garerteragh, was made in 1609, and who, prior to 1619, built a castle and established 16 British families; he also erected a stone bridge over the river Derg, adjoining the castle, and this bridge, being the first built over that river, gave the town the name of Derg-Bridge, by which it is still frequently called. Sir John had another grant of land at Claraghmore, upon which he built a castle called Kerlis, and constructed a causeway, seven miles long and eight feet wide, in a straight line over mountains and through bogs, from one castle to the other. Several parts of this road are still traceable, but others have been broken up to make the road from this town to Drumquin. In the war of 1641, Sir Phelim O'Neil besieged the castle of Derg; and although he was driven away with disgrace and a considerable loss of men, horses, and ammunition, yet he so greatly injured it that it was never afterwards repaired: it remains a noble pile of ruins on the northern bank of the river. The bridge erected by Sir John Davis was superseded by one built by Hugh Edwards, Esq., which remained till 1835, when it was taken down, and a handsome bridge of hewn stone, of four arches, erected.

The town, which is also called Castle-Derrick and Churchtown, is situated on the road from Newtown-Stewart to Pettigo, and on the new line of road from Londonderry to Enniskillen, between which places two coaches running daily pass through it. It consists of one principal and two smaller streets, containing 81 houses, many of which are large and well built; and has much improved under the patronage of Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart., its proprietor, who lately built a very handsome inn. A sub-post-office here is in connexion with Strabane. The market is on Friday, and is large and well attended; a fair is held on the first Friday in every month. A constabulary police force has been stationed here: petty-sessions are held on alternate Saturdays; a court for the manor of Hastings every third Saturday, in which debts under 40s. are recoverable; and a monthly court for the manor of Ardstraw, for debts to a similar amount. There was anciently a church at Castlederg, which was in ruins in 1619, when it was rebuilt by Sir John Davis; but being destroyed by Sir Phelim O'Neil in 1641, there was no church till 1731, when the present neat edifice was built by Hugh Edwards, Esq., of Castle-Gore: it was much improved in 1828. Here is a dispensary. Hugh Edwards, in 1735, bequeathed an acre of land on which to build a school-house, and £24 annually for the support of a master, to teach eight poor boys; but the school was not built: a handsome house, however, has been lately erected for the purpose, having apartments for a master and mistress. The union workhouse, built on a site of 3½ acres purchased for £15, was completed in 1840, at a cost of £2100, and is constructed to receive 200 paupers. Not far from the town are the ruins of Castle-Gore, formerly the residence of the proprietors of the Manor-Hastings estate.—See SKIRTS.

CASTLE-DERMOT, a post-town and parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of ATHY, barony of KILKEA and MOONE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 7½ miles (S.E. by E.) from Athy, and 34 (S. W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 3090 inhabitants, of whom 1416 are in the town. This place, called anciently Discart-Diarmuda, and afterwards Tristledermot, appears to have derived its origin from an abbey founded here for Canons Regular, about the year 500, by St. Diernit, and which was plundered by the Danes in 843, and again in 1040. Cormac Mac-Culinan, the celebrated Archbishop of Cashel and King of Munster, was educated in this abbey under the abbot Snedgus, and at his death, in 907 or 908, was interred here. It was the chief residence of the O'Tooles, and on the English invasion was, with other territories of that sept, given to Walter de Riddlesford, who here erected a castle, and founded a priory for Crouched Friars, which, with its possessions, was granted at the Dissolution to Sir Henry Harrington, Knt. In 1264 a conference was held in the town, and was attended by Richard de Rupella, lord chief justice, to deliberate on the sanguinary feuds between the Geraldines and the De Burghs, when the governor and several other persons of distinction were seized by Maurice Fitzgerald and his party, and carried prisoners to the castle of Ley. In 1302 a Franciscan monastery was founded here by Thomas, Lord Offaly, which, in 1316, was plundered by the Scots under Edward Bruce, who also destroyed the town, but were soon afterwards defeated by Lord Edmund Butler, in a battle fought in the immediate vicinity. In the reign of Henry IV. a parliament was held here to deliberate upon the best means of repressing the Ulster insurgents and expelling the Scottish invaders; in 1499 another parliament was held in the town, and some curious sumptuary laws were passed. During the time of a fair, in 1532, the place was attacked by the insurgents under the Earl of Kildare; and it appears to have been finally ruined in the war which broke out in 1641. It was taken for Cromwell by Colonels Hewson and Reynolds, in 1650, since which time its extensive ecclesiastical buildings have been in ruins, and its former prosperity has never revived. In the disturbances of 1798, it was attacked by a party of the Kildare and Wicklow insurgents, on their march to assault the town of Carlow; but the assailants were vigorously repulsed by a body of regular infantry, and pursued in their retreat by the yeomanry.

The town is situated on the small river Lyrr, or Lane, and on the road from Dublin, by Carlow, to Cork, in the centre of an extensive plain scarcely relieved by a single tree; it presents a striking contrast of venerable towers and stately ruins intermingled with humble cabins and houses generally of the poorest character. Large masses of detached rock are scattered on the banks and in the channel of the river, obstructing the current of an otherwise peaceful stream; and every thing around wears an appearance of continued decay. There is neither trade nor manufacture; the place is wholly dependent upon agriculture, and on the traffic resulting from its situation on a public thoroughfare, several coaches to and from Dublin passing daily through the town. Even these coaches will cease to run, after the opening of the Carlow branch of the Dublin and Cork railway. The market has been long discontinued; but fairs are still held on Feb. 24th, Tuesday after Easter, May 24th, Aug. 4th and 5th, Sept. 29th, and Dec. 19th, chiefly for horses, cattle, and sheep, but also for general merchandise: the principal horse fair is in August. A constabulary force

The parish comprises 7497½ statute acres; the soil is good, and the system of agriculture improving. There is no bog; the nearest place from which turf can be obtained is 13 miles distant. Coal is brought from Carlow or Athy, where is the nearest communication by canal; large quantities of grey granite are quarried in the parish. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, episcopally united from time immemorial to the vicarages of Graney, Grangerosnolvin, and Kilkea, to the rectory of Ballaghmoon, and to the rectory and vicarage of Monnohenock or Dunmanogue, together constituting the union of Castledermot, and the corps of the prebend of Monnohenock or Dunmanogue in the cathedral of St. Patrick, Dublin, in the patronage of the Archbishop; the rectory is appropriate to the sec. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £415. 9. 9., of which £276. 18. 6. are payable to the archbishop, and the remainder to the vicar; the whole union produces to the vicar a rent-charge of £706. 9. The church, a remarkably neat edifice, was repaired and enlarged in 1832, by aid of a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, and a donation from the Bishop of Kildare. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Castledermot, Moore, Timolin, Kilkea, Killelan, Dunmanogue, Grangerosnolvin, Kinneagh, and part of Graney; there are three chapels in the union, one of them in this parish, a spacious edifice combining various styles of architecture, and one each at Moore and Levinstown. A school-house was built by the Earl of Kildare, who endowed it with £500, and bequeathed to it the same sum at his decease; the school was opened in 1734, and further endowed with 20 acres of land by his son James, Marquess of Kildare: it has, however, been discontinued since 1832. A parochial school is supported by the incumbent, and there are other schools in the parish; also a dispensary.

The REMAINS OF ANTIQUITY, though rapidly passing away, are yet highly interesting. In the churchyard, and still used as a belfry, is an ancient slender circular tower, not so high as the round towers of Kildare and other places; at a small distance from its base it is covered with ivy, and it has a very picturesque appearance. There are also two crosses, sculptured with several curious emblematical figures and groups, and with certain characters, of which translations were published in the Irish Magazine for 1814. These crosses, apparently of the same date, are traditionally said to have been erected in the 9th century by Abbot Carpreus, to whom is also attributed the erection of the round tower; and they are supposed to point out the burial-places of different saints. They are divided into compartments, each embellished with a group of figures illustrating probably some scriptural subject; and of that which is still standing erect, the central compartment contains a rudely sculptured representation of the Crucifixion: on one of the arms is a figure in a sitting posture, playing upon a stringed instrument; and on the other are two figures, one of which is seemingly in the act of paying homage to the other. Near the crosses is a fine Norman arch decorated with the toothed ornament, the only remains of a church built by the first English settlers, most probably to replace that to which the round tower and the crosses were appendages. In another part of the town are the extensive and beautiful remains of the Franciscan convent, consisting at present chiefly of the abbey church and the chapel of St. Mary. The former is a long building, lighted at the west end by two lofty lancet-shaped windows, and at the east end by a window which, though now greatly mutilated, appears to have been of elegant design; on the south side, and attached to the church, is a low square tower with a circular staircase turret. On the north side, opening into the church by a lofty pointed arch, was the chapel of the Blessed Virgin, distinguished for the elegance and richness of its windows, the principal of which was a very magnificent window of four lights, with a large cinquefoiled circle in the crown of the arch, having the spandrels ornamented in trefoil. Of the monastery of the Crouched Friars, nothing remains but a single tower; the foundations of the conventual buildings have disappeared, and the ground has been ploughed to their very base.

CASTLE-DILLON, a parish, in the poor-law union of CELBRIDGE, barony of SOUTH SALT, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Celbridge, and on the river Liffey; containing 147 inhabitants. It comprises 1133 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres; and is a rectory, in the diocese of Dublin, and one of the seven denominations that constitute the union of Kildrington. In the Roman Catholic divisions it forms part of the district of Celbridge.

CASTLE-DURROW, QUEEN'S county and county of KILKENNY.—See DURROW.

CASTLE-ELLIS, a parish, in the union of ENNIS-CORTHY, barony of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (S.) from Oulart; containing 1871 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Wexford to Gorey, and comprises 5603 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, principally under tillage, with some good pasture land: the soil is in general fertile, the only poor land being a sandy tract; and the system of agriculture is improving. The parish abounds with limestone-gravel containing a large proportion of marine shells, and with white and blue marl; at Ballyhuic, or Ballyboy, are some quarries of good granite used for building. The living is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, to which the vicarage of Kilmalog and the impropriate curacies of Killeak and Killy were united by act of council in 1798, forming the union of Castle-Ellis, or Kilmalog, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish, £216. 4. 9., is impropriate in Captain Villiers Hatton, who allows a stipend for the performance of the clerical duties; the entire rent-charge of the benefice, payable to the incumbent, is £147. 19. The church was built by aid of a loan of £600 granted in 1816, by the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £100 from the same Board, in 1810; the glebe consists of four detached portions, one in each parish, comprising in all 73 acres, and lying near the sites of the old churches. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is in the districts of Oulart and Blackwater, where the two parochial chapels are respectively situated. A commodious school-house was erected at Ballyboy, a few years since, by Mrs. Jessop, of Doory Hall, who endowed it with £40 per annum and about 2 acres of land. Elks' horns have been found.

CASTLEFINN, a post town or village, in the parish of DONAGHMORE, union of STRABANE, barony of RA-PHOE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Lifford, and 111 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 567 inhabitants. This place, which was anciently called Castle-Fynyn, belonged about the close of Elizabeth's reign to Sir Neill Garbh O'Donnell. It is situated on the river Finn, which is navigable to the Foyle for vessels of 14 tons' burthen, and is on the road from Strabane to Stranorlar: it consists of 97 houses. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel.—See DONAGHMORE.

CASTLE-GREGORY, a village or town, in the parish of KILLEINY, union of TRALEE, barony of CORKAGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 12 miles (W.) from Tralee; containing 504 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the Connor Hill road from Tralee to Dingle, and on the southern coast of Tralee bay, derives its name from an ancient castle founded by Gregory Hussey, and which, in the war of 1641, was garrisoned for the king by its then proprietor, Walter Hussey. After sustaining a protracted assault from Cromwell's forces, the garrison, with their commander, escaped by night to Minard Castle, in the neighbourhood, in which they were besieged by Colonels Le Hunt and Sadler, and blown up by gunpowder laid under the vaults of the castle; there are no remains of this fortress. The town contains 83 houses, the greater number of them only thatched. A patron fair is held on Aug. 15th, which is also a fair for cattle. A constabulary police force and a coast-guard have been stationed here; the latter has a detachment at Magharee, and is one of the five stations that constitute the district of Tralee. Petty-sessions are held irregularly. The Roman Catholic chapel, a substantial cruciform structure, was erected in 1831; and a school-room was more lately built, the Rev. T. Fitzgerald, P.P. having bequeathed £30 per annum for educating poor children of the parish.—See KILLEINY.

CASTLEHAVEN, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, East Division of the barony of WEST CARBERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Skibbereen; containing 6056 inhabitants. This parish, anciently called Glenbarrahane, derived that name from a deep rocky glen dedicated to St. Barrahane, and received its modern appellation from the castle that protected the haven. In the war of 1601, Castlehaven was a place of great importance. It was here that six Spanish ships landed about 2000 men, with stores, ordnance, and ammunition, in consequence of which the disaffected septa cast off the mask of submission; all the country from Kiusale westward declared for the invaders; and O'Driscoll, lord of a fort at Castlehaven, which commanded the harbour, delivered it to his foreign friends. The forts at Baltimore, Innisharkin, and Dunboy, were also placed in the hands of Don Juan d'Aquila, the Spanish commander, who immediately garrisoned them: he lavished gold upon their former proprietors, to whom he gave Spanish commissions, and took their followers into his pay. Admiral Leveson, who was sent here with a fleet, after sinking and destroying some of the Spanish vessels in the haven, was, by contrary winds, exposed to a battery erected by the enemy on shore, which was principally directed against his ship and did considerable execution; so that he was obliged to return to Kinsale in a very shattered condition. The army of Tyrone and O'Donnell, however, having been completely routed by the Lord-Deputy Mountjoy, the Spanish general agreed to evacuate Castlebaven; and in Feb. 1602, it was surrendered to Captain Harvey for Queen Elizabeth, under the capitulation of Kinsale, after some unavailing opposition on the part of O'Driscoll, its proprietor. In 1645, the castle, well supplied with ordnance, was held for the parliament by William Salmon.

This PARISH is situated on the harbour of the same name, on the southern coast, and contains 10,542 statute acres, about two-thirds of which are cultivated; the remainder is waste, consisting of high barren rocky ridges, or bog. Cultivation is principally performed by the spade, or by the heavy old wooden plough. The harbour is more than half a mile in width, and is very secure and well sheltered; it is adapted for vessels drawing 10 feet of water, which can lie about a quarter of a mile above Reen Head, with the rocks called the Stage in sight. The coast here is bold and picturesque, with several small islands lying off it, the principal of which are Horse Island and one called Blackrock. The Stags are three very conspicuous rocks lying four miles (S. W. & W.) from the entrance of the harbour; Toe head is a broad promontory, between which and Gocann point is a small but well sheltered bay. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, and in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £450. The church is a large and very handsome edifice, with a lofty square tower supported by buttresses and crowned with pinnacles; it stands in the demesne of Castle-Townsend, and was built in 1827, of hewn fawn-coloured freestone from the quarries on Horse Island, at an expense of £1500, of which £1250 were granted by the Board of First Fruits, and £250 contributed by Colonel Townsend. There is an elegant glebe-house, standing on a glebe of 13 acres, and built in 1826, by aid of a loan of £900 from the same Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Castlebaven and Myross: the chapel is a commodious edifice, erected by subscription in 1834, on the lands of Raheens, about a mile from Castle-Townsend. A savings' bank and a loan fund have been established. The ancient castle, the walls of which are still visible, near the mouth of the harbour, was built by the O'Driscolls, and subsequently belonged to the family of Touchet, of which George Touchet, Lord Audley, who had been governor of Utrecht, and was wounded at Kinsale in 1603, was created Earl of Castlebaven, in 1616: this title was enjoyed through five generations, but became extinct in 1777. Not far distant from the castle are the remains of the old church of Glanbarrahane; near which is a well dedicated to St. Barrahane, still frequented.

CASTLEHYDE, county CORK.—See LITTER.

CASTLE-INCH.—See INCHOLAGHAN.

CASTLE-ISLAND, an island, in the parish of SKULL, union of SKIBBEREEN, Western Division of the barony of WEST CARBERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Skull. This island, which is situated in Roaring Water bay on the southern coast, comprises 141 statute acres of land, which is mostly under tillage and cultivated by the spade, yielding good crops of wheat, oats, and potatoes: the surface is gently undulating, and the substratum a compact schistus. Though tolerably fertile, the island produces no plant higher than the creeping furze. It is about a mile and a quarter distant from the main land, between Long Island and Horse Island, and contains 15 small cabins indifferently built. On the coast of a small bay near its eastern extremity are the ruins of a castle, erected by O'Donovan More, in the beginning of the 14th century.

CASTLE-ISLAND, a town and parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (S. E. by E.) from Tralee; containing 7967 inhabitants, of whom 1687 are in the town. This place derives its name from the "Castle of the Island of Kerry," erected by Geoffrey de Marisco in 1226, and which in 1345 was taken by Sir Ralph Ufford, lord-justiciary of Ireland, from Sir Eustace de la Poer and other knights, who held it for the Earl of Desmond, and who on being captured were immediately executed. In 1397, Gerald, the fourth earl of Desmond, commonly called "the poet," having gone out of his camp here, was privately assassinated. Queen Elizabeth granted the town and certain lands adjoining to the Herbert family, under the designation of "the manor of Mount Eagle Loyal;" and the manor, by a survey made by Hogan in 1729, was found to comprise 36,920 plantation acres, valued at £3169, 12. 10. per annum. In 1733 a fee-farm lease, subject to a reserved rent of £1900 per annum for ever, was made of this property to five of the principal gentlemen of the county, who subsequently admitted a sixth; hence it acquired the title of "the seignior of Castle-island." The proprietors afterwards made a division of the property, with the exception of the town and about 600 acres around it. The castle, of which there are still some remains, was destroyed by the Irish in 1600.

The TOWN is situated on the river Maine, and at the junction of the mail-coach roads from Tralee and Killarney to Limerick: since the completion of the new government road from King-William's-town, it has been also on the direct road from Tralee to Cork. It consists chiefly of one long and wide street extending nearly east and west with a market-house at the western extremity, from which the road to Tralee branches off on the north-west, and that to Killarney on the south-west: it contains 271 houses, several of them neatly built of limestone, and had formerly a market and daily post. The government road has opened a line for a new street, diverging at right angles from the south side of the main street towards King-William's-town. In 1825, an act was obtained for dividing the town and undivided lands, which was carried into effect; and under it various improvements were made in the town. The river rises suddenly from a well called Tubbermang, about three-quarters of a mile to the south-east of the town, and, flowing by the south side of it, is crossed by three bridges at a very small distance from each other. This was once the capital of the county, and the assizes were formerly held here; but since Tralee became the county town, the place has declined very much, and its market has been discontinued. Fairs, however, are still held on the first Monday in January and February, March 17th, April 20th, Easter-Monday, May 20th, June 24th, Aug. 1st (a great horse fair), and Oct. 1st; there are also two in November, and two in December. Here is a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Tralee, Newcastle, and Kilarney; a constabulary police force has been stationed here, and petty-sessions are held at the court-house every alternate Wednesday. A manor-court for the seignior was formerly held, in which small debts were recoverable; a weighmaster and other petty officers are still appointed by Lord Headley, one of the proprietors, to whom the tolls of the fairs are payable. The court-house is a substantial building at the western extremity of the main street; and there is a small but neat and well-regulated bridewell near the old barracks: it is one of the eight in the county, and contains, besides the rooms for the keeper, six cells, two day-rooms, and two airing-yards.

The PARISH comprises 29,633 statute acres; the soil is various. Part of it is within that portion of the seignior of Castle-island which belongs to Lord Headley, and consequently participates in the extensive and beneficial improvements which his lordship's grandfather commenced in 1823 in this previously barren and unprofitable district. Among these were branch roads constructed at the late peer's expense, from the new government road between Castle-island and Abbeale; extending nearly 10 miles, and affording a facility of communication with every farm. Great improvements were accomplished by a more efficient system of draining and fencing; upwards of fifty substantial farm-houses and cottages were erected, Lord Headley having made stipulated allowances for that purpose; plantations to the extent of 350 acres were formed, and the appearance of the country has now an air of cheerfulness and comparative fertility. Limestone abounds in the parish, and is extensively used for manure; there are considerable tracts of bog.

The LIVING is a rectory entire, in the diocese of Ardfer and Aghadoc, and in the patronage of Lord Headley, H. A. Herbert, Esq., Colonel Drummond, and W. Meredith, Esq., as proprietors of the seignior of Castle-island; also of Colonel Townsend and W. T. Crosbie, Esq., who sold their respective shares to Lord Ventry and F. Chute, Esq., but retained their right of advowson. The tithe rent-charge is £479. 4. Previously to the decease of the late incumbent, the parish was united with those of Ballincuslane, Dysert, and Killintierny; but in consequence of the proprietors of the seignior having omitted to nominate an incumbent within the limited time, the presentation for that turn lapsed to the bishop, who dissolved the union, and divided it into the three distinct benefices of Castle-island, Ballincuslane, and Dysert with Killintierny, which separation was confirmed by act of council dated Jan. 4th, 1836. The church consists of the nave of a former structure, with the belfry thickly covered with ivy; there is a neat mural monument to some of the Merediths, of Dicksgrove, and on the south side of the exterior is a small sculptured head supposed to represent that of St. Nicholas, probably the patron saint. The edifice has been thoroughly repaired, for which purpose the Ecclesiastical Commissioners granted £290. The glebe-house, at Kilbannegan, was built in 1818, by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £1200 from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises 32 acres.

In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish, for the greater part, is the head of a district comprising also the greater portion of the parish of Ballincuslane; the remaining portions of both are included in the district of Brosna. The chapel at Castle-island is a spacious cruciform structure, and has been repaired, and newly fronted with bawn limestone; adjoining it is a dwelling-house for the parish priest, recently erected. There is also a chapel at Knocknagashel, in the north part of the parish, attached to the Brosna district; it was erected in 1834, on a site given by the late Lord Headley, who also paid one-half of the expense of its erection, the other half being defrayed by his lordship's tenants in that district. A third chapel, at Scartaglin, in the south part of the parish, belongs to the district of Castle-island. A dispensary has been established at the court-house. Between the western and the central bridges, on the banks of the Maine, are the ruins of the castle, consisting of several detached masses, two of which are of lofty elevation, and the whole show the original structure to have been of considerable extent. At Kilbannegan, adjoining the glebe-house, are the remains of an old church, with a burial-ground; and there is still remaining a portion of the old court-house, in the rear of the present building.

CASTLE-JORDAN, or GUNGEDAH, a parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, partly in the barony of UPPER MOYFENRAGH, county of MEATH, and partly in the barony of COOLESTOWN, but chiefly in that of WARRENSTOWN, KINGS county, and province of LEINSTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Kinnegad; containing 4079 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Trim to Philipstown, and on the river Boyne, which separates it from the county of Kildare; it comprises 17,372½ statute acres. There is a very large extent of bog; and gritstone used for building is procured from some quarries in the parish. The living is an inappropriate cure, in the diocese of Meath, united by diocesan authority to that of Ballyboggan; the rectory is wholly inappropriate in the heirs of the late Sir Duke Gifford, to whom the tithe rent-charge of £285 is payable. The annual income of the curate is £100 late currency, of which £30 are paid by the impropriators, and £70 by the Trustees of Primate Boulter's Augmentation fund. The church, in the county of Meath, was built in 1824, at an expense of £1000, defrayed by aid of a loan from the Board of First Fruits. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, sometimes called Boughlnebracnay, comprising Castle-Jordan and Ballyboggan, and containing two chapels. Here are the ruins of a castle formerly occupied by the Giffords.

CASTLEKNOCK, a parish, in the NORTH DUBLIN union, barony of CASTLEKNOCK, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Dublin; containing 4063 inhabitants, of whom 156 are in the village. Tradition says that this was a royal residence of the Danes, and that, in 1167, Roderick O'Connor encamped here with his Connaught forces, when he led a numerous army to Dublin, where he was solemnly inaugurated king of Ireland, and engaged the Danish residents in his pay. The castle was given by Earl Strongbow to his friend, Hugh de Tyrrell, who was styled Baron of Castleknock: it was taken by Edward Bruce in 1316, and Hugh de Tyrrell and his wife were made prisoners, but released on the payment of a large ransom. In June 1642, the castle was taken for the parliament by Colonel Monk, afterwards Duke of Albemarle, who slew in the assault 80 of its defenders, and subsequently hanging many more; but in November 1647, Owen Roe O'Neil, and Sir Thomas Esmonde, Bart., at the head of a royalist force, retook it. The Marquess of Ormonde encamped here in 1649, when he threatened to besiege Dublin: and after the Restoration the castle fell into decay.

The PARISH is situated on the road from Dublin to Navan, and is intersected by the Royal Canal; it contains 7123½ statute acres, the whole of which is arable land. Here are extensive limestone quarries, in which fossil remains are frequently found. On the Liffey are three woollen-mills, where friezes, kerseys, lamhskins, and Petershams, are manufactured; they have been established nearly a century, and employ above 60 persons during the winter. A factory for worsted and worsted yarn has been established at Blanchardstown, which employs between 80 and 100 persons; there are also on the Liffey a paper-mill, a mustard-mill, two flour-mills, and an iron-foundry. A receiving-house for letters here is in connexion with the Dublin post-office. Along the line of the Royal Canal will run the railway from Dublin to Mullingar, now in progress, with stations at Cabra and Blanchardstown. Petty-sessions are held every alternate Monday at Blanchardstown, where there is a constabulary police station. The scenery on the banks of the Liffey, towards Lucan, is very beautiful, and the northern side of the valley is celebrated for strawberries. In addition to the viceregal lodge, and the chief and under secretaries' residences, the parish contains many seats commanding delightful views; the principal are, Sheep-hill, situated in a demesne of 500 acres, Farnley, Knockmaroon, Park View, Mountsackville, Airfield, Hybla, Scribblestown, Ashtown, Oatlands, Bellville, Ashfield, Abbotstown, and Huntstown. The Observatory of Trinity College, Dublin, is situated here; as are also the Mountjoy barracks, where the survey of Ireland is carried on; and St. Vincent's College, a preparatory school to Maynooth: in the grounds of this college, on the summit of a lofty hill, are the remains of the old castle from which the parish has its name.

Ecclesiastically the parish is divided into the northern and southern portions, each of which is subdivided into smaller parts: the prebendal or northern part furnishes an endowment for the two prebends of Mullahidart or "Castrum Knoc ex parte decani," and Castleknock or "Castrum Knoc ex parte precentoris," in the cathedral church of St. Patrick, Dublin. In 1219, the great tithes were appropriated by Archbishop Henry to the priory of Malvern, in Worcestershire, on condition that they should add five monks to their number; and in 1225 the prior and monks granted to the uses of the economy fund of St. Patrick's cathedral a moiety of the tithes of the manor of Castleknock, renouncing to the archbishop all right to the vicarage and its small tithes and oblations. During the prelate of Archbishop Luke, a new division of the tithes was made: of the four parts into which they were then divided, one was assigned to the prebendary of Mullahidart, one to the prebendary of Castleknock, one to the economy estate of St. Patrick's cathedral, and one to the priory of Malvern, which transferred its interest to the abbot and convent of St. Mary, near Dublin, in 1468. This last portion, having become inappropriate on the dissolution of the religious houses, and forfeited by the rebellion of the improprator, was granted as an augmentation of the vicar's income: and this division of the tithes still exists.

The LIVING is consequently a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, endowed with a portion of the great tithes, and united to the prebend of Castleknock and the rectory of Clonsillaigh and curacy of Mullahidart, with cure of souls: it is in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £420, of which £165 are payable to the economy estate, £105 to the prebendary of Mullahidart, and £150 to the prebendary of Castleknock. There are two churches in the vicarial union, one at Castleknock, the other at Clonsillaigh. The former was rebuilt in 1806, at a cost of £3000, of which £1000 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits, and the remainder was raised by assessment and subscription. On the site of the latter, which had become too ruinous for repair, a new and handsome church is now in course of erection, at the expense of the congregation. There is a glebe-house; and the glebe, in two parcels, comprises 19a. 1r. 5p., besides 8 acres which have been taken into the Phoenix Park, and for which, and also for the tithes of the park, the vicar receives £50. 15. per annum, late currency, from government. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Castleknock, Chapelizod, Clonsillaigh, Cloghranahidart, and Mullahidart; and containing three chapels, one at Blanchardstown, one at Porterstown in Clonsillaigh, and one at Chapelizod. At Cabra is a nunnery of the order of St. Dominick: the society removed hither from Clontarf about 1820, and consists of a chaplain, prioress, and nuns, besides lay-sisters; it is a respectable ladies' school, and the sisterhood also instruct from 150 to 200 poor children, who are partly clothed. The nunnery is surrounded with grounds tastefully laid out, and has a neat chapel, and dwelling-house for the chaplain. There is another nunnery at Blanchardstown, in which 50 poor children are taught. In addition to the parochial school, there are two schools by the side of the canal; one for boys, maintained by a bequest from the late Mr. Morgan; and the other supported out of the produce of lands, devised by a lady named Mercer, and yielding a rent of more than £750 per annum, vested in trustees, by whom 50 girls are maintained, clothed, and educated. At Blanchardstown is a national school for both sexes, besides other schools in the parish. The late Mr. Tisdal bequeathed a large sum to the parochial schools, which is to be paid after his widow's death. There are a savings' bank, and a dispensary. In Knockbrush Hill, which is situated near the Ashbourne road, are occasionally found bones of men and horses, military weapons, and coins: part of this hill is evidently artificial, and tradition says that it was raised over those who fell on this spot, in 1014, in the widely extended battle of Clontarf. Ancient horse-shoes, spurs, and other relics, have been dug up at Scripplestown. At Abbotstown are some remains of the abbey; and there is also a well dedicated to St. Bridget.

CASTLELOST, a parish, in the union of MULLINGAR, barony of FARTULLAGH, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER; containing, with the post town of Rochford-Bridge, 2058 inhabitants. This place was celebrated at a very early period for an extensive monastery, founded at Rathyne, or Rathenin, by St. Carthag or Mochuda, and in which he presided for more than 40 years over 867 monks, who supported themselves and the neighbouring poor by their labour. There was also a very eminent school under the direction of St. Carthag, in connexion with the monastery; but, in the Easter holidays of 630, he and his monks were driven from the abbey by King Blathmac, and the saint took refuge at Lismore, in the county of Waterford, where he died in 636. He is said to have been succeeded by St. Constantine, King of Britain, who had resigned his crown; and the names of succeeding abbots are preserved till the year 783, from which date there are no further records of the monastery. The PARISH is situated on the road from Dublin to Athlone, and is bounded on the south by part of the Bog of Allen: comprising 9467 statute acres. The surface is gently undulating, with a few hills of considerable elevation, the highest of which is Gnewbane; the lands are principally under tillage, and the system of agriculture is improving. In Gnewbane are some quarries of a species of marble, and also of black stone; at the foot of the hill is an extensive tract of bog separating this parish from King's county.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of Lord Kilmaine: the tithes rent-charge is £166. 3., besides which the rector receives a rent-charge from two townlands in the parish of Drumraney. The church, a neat edifice, was erected in 1815, at a cost of £1400, of which £800 were a grant from the Board of First Fruits, and £300 were raised by subscription. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £400 from the same Board, in 1807: the glebe comprises 93 acres, subject to a rent of £24 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms the district of Miden and Milltown. There are still remaining some ruins of the old castle, and of an ancient mansion-house, both which were for successive ages residences of the Tyrrell family, whose possessions were forfeited in the war of 1641. There are also, on the castle lands, the remains of the ancient parish church; it contains vestiges of various monuments to that family, among which is an altar-tomb with the recumbent figure of a knight in armour. After the decay of the old church, another was erected on the demesne of Gaulstown by one of the Rochford family; it was used for more than 100 years previously to the erection of the present church, and is now a venerable ruin, forming an interesting and picturesque feature in the scenery of Gaulstown, the seat of Lord Kilmaine, in the adjoining parish of Kilbride-Pilate. Of the several Danish forts, one of the largest is in the townland of Gortamlow, where some labourers, in 1836, discovered four perfect human skeletons.

CATTLE-LYONS, a market-town and parish, in the union of FERMOV, partly in the barony of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, but chiefly in the barony of BARRYMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (E. by N.) from Rathcormac; containing 5536 inhabitants, of whom 775 are in the town. It was originally called Castle Lebane, or Castle O'Lehan, from a castle belonging to the sept of Lehan being situated here; and it is stated that three cantreds in this part, which were unjustly detained from Robert Fitz-Stephen by his son Ralph, were subsequently granted by King John to William de Barry, who erected a castle in 1204, and whose descendants for some ages were called the Lords Barry of Castle Lebane. In 1307, John De Barry founded an abbey, which at the Dissolution was granted to Richard, first earl of Cork, who assigned it to his daughter, wife of David, first earl of Barrymore, "to bny her gloves and pins." Another of the De Barrys founded a monastery for Carmelites or White friars. In 1645, Lord Broghill, being posted here with some cavalry to cover the army under Lord Inchiquin, that was besieging Castlemartyr, drew the Irish cavalry under General Purcell into an action, commonly called the battle of Castle-Lyons, in which he gained a decisive victory. The castle, nevertheless, fell into Lord Castlehaven's hands soon afterwards.

The town is situated on the river Bride, and on the road from Dublin to Rathcormac; and contains 136 houses. Here are a woollen-manufactory and dye-house, a corn-store, and some flour-mills, the last built in 1808, worked by the river, and manufacturing 10,000 bags of flour annually. The market is on Thursday, and great quantities of poultry are sold: fairs are held on New Year's day, Easter and Whit Mondays, Aug. 28th, Sept. 29th, and Nov. 16th, for cattle and general merchandise. A receiving-house for letters, here, is in connexion with Rathcormac; and a constabulary police force has been stationed in the town. A manorial court is held once in every three weeks, for debts not exceeding 40s., by a seneschal, under S. Perrot, Esq., of Cork, who recently purchased the manor. The PARISH comprises 12,326 statute acres, three-fourths arable, and the rest pasture; considerable improvements have been made both in agricultural implements and the breed of cattle. There is no waste land, and very little bog, but abundance of limestone, which is used for building, repairing the roads, and burning. The river abounds with very fine trout.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in the Rev. J. B. Ryder. The tithe rent-charge is £1285. 3., of which £854. 5. 6. are payable to the proprietor, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is an old building, erected on the site of one more ancient: connected with it is a mausoleum of the Barry family, which contains a sumptuous marble monument, consisting of two Corinthian columns supporting a pediment surmounted by a coronet, and bearing a Latin inscription to the memory of James Barry, Earl of Barrymore, who died Jan. 5th, 1747. There is no glebe-house; the glebe consists of 9 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising Castle-Lyons, Coole, and Britway; the chapel is at Bride's bridge, a quarter of a mile from the town. A bequest of £500 late currency was made by the Rev. Mr. Harrison, formerly vicar, in trust to the dean and chapter of Cloyne; the interest now amounting to £27. 17. annually, to be distributed among the Protestant poor of the parish. Part of the abbey erected in 1307 is still standing, connected with the parochial church. Of the castle of the Lehan there are no remains; but on taking down some of the walls, to make room for the castle of the lords Barrymore, a stone was found with the inscription LEHAN O'CVLLANE ROC

FECIT MCIII. Nothing now remains of the castle of the De Barrys, except part of the arches on which it stood, and some of the partition walls: several coins of the Henrys, Mary, Elizabeth, James I., and William III., have been found among the ruins. Upon the banks of the river Bride is Bally-Roberts Castle, a high square tower, built by Robert De Barry as a defence against the Fitz-Geralds of Coshridge. On the confines of this parish and those of Fermoy and Rathcormac is the mountain Corran Tierna, or Caru hill, a remarkable eminence on the summit of which were discovered, after removing an immense heap of stones and a large flag-stone, two antique urns, containing ashes; one was broken by the workmen, to ascertain whether it contained money; the other is in the possession of the Rev. J. B. Ryder, and is nearly globular, neatly marked, and has apparently been haked.

CASTLEMACADAM, a parish, in the union of RATHRUM, barony of ARKLOW, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (N.W.) from Arklow; containing 5633 inhabitants. This place derives its name from an ancient castle, which was destroyed in the frequent incursions of the O'Byrnes, and rebuilt in 1308, by Piers Gaveston, during his lieutenancy of Ireland. The parish is situated on the coach-road from Dublin to Wexford, and on both sides of the Vale of Ovoca; it comprises 10,843 statute acres, and although abounding in mineral wealth, is poor for agricultural purposes. The scenery is unequalled for its variety of beautiful and sublime views, in which the most pleasingly picturesque is combined with the most strikingly romantic. The enchanting valley of Ovoca, which is the scene of Moore's exquisite ballad, The Meeting of the Waters, is principally within the limits of the parish, and contains an admirable mixture of mountain, forest, lawn, and river scenery. After the conflux of the Avonmore and Avonbeg, at "the Meeting of the Waters," near Castle-Howard, the united stream takes the name of the Ovoca: the banks are about a quarter of a mile distant from each other, and for nearly eight miles are thickly wooded. The coach-road from Dublin to Wexford, by way of Arklow, winds through this picturesque vale, which is adorned by the woods of Castle-Howard, Ballyarthur, Castlemacadam, Shelton Abbey, and Glenart, by the hills containing the copper-mines of Cronebane, Trigon, Ballymurtagh, and Ballygahan, and by the village of Newbridge.

The most splendid view of the valley is obtained from Ballyarthur: the mansion is plain, but the demesne, which contains above 1600 statute acres, is richly wooded, and extremely varied in surface. The avenue leading to the house, which commences at a turreted archway near the village of Newbridge, is about two British miles in length, and with a gentle ascent winds through a wood of luxuriant growth: it terminates at the lawn, which contains above 60 British acres of undulating ground, on the top of the hill. A path behind the house leads to a terrace on the uppermost ridge of the northern bank of the Ovoca, which commands a prospect of the union of the Ovoca and Aughrim rivers, called the "Second Meeting," and of Croghan-Kinsheila, which contains the Wicklow gold-mines. But the most delightful view is from the spot where stood an octagonal temple, about half a mile from the terrace, and the path to which is through a walk so thickly planted as to exclude the prospect of the surrounding country. This privation increases the gratification derived from the magnificent view which suddenly bursts on the eye. The demesne is open to all respectable persons, and during the summer is visited by very great numbers, being considered, from the exquisite beauty of its prospects, one of the most attractive spots in Wicklow. Near the head of the vale stands Castle-Howard, the magnificent seat of the late Colonel Robert Howard, which crowns an almost precipitous cliff rising from the east bank of the Ovoca and overlooking the confluence of the Avonmore and Avonbeg: the demesne is tastefully laid out, and ornamented with rustic buildings. Besides these seats, the parish contains Cherrymount and Nine View, from which latter there is an extensive prospect.

MINING operations were commenced here in 1787, by a company afterwards incorporated, in 1794, under the name of the Irish Mining Company. The aggregate produce of Cronebane, up to 1811, was 26,875 tons of ore, which produced 1717 tons of copper: £12,000 worth of copper had also been obtained from the waters of the mine, by keeping them in tanks with old iron, which caused the copper to precipitate itself. The mines of Ballymurtagh were worked with eminent success by Mr. Whaley, of Whaley Abbey, so early as 1755. From the low price of copper, the mines of the parish were in a languishing state for several years; but in 1834, the Board of Public Works advanced £1000 for the erection of machinery in Cronebane, and a similar sum for Ballymurtagh, both to be repaid by instalments, with interest. In 1835, four of the mines were in operation; of these, Cronebane and Tigrony, leased from the Irish Mining Company to the Cornish firm of Williams, Brothers, and Co., afford employment to above 600 persons. These two mines are entirely worked by water; there are 8 water wheels, one of which is 50 feet, and two are 40 feet, in diameter: they produce about 90 tons of ore weekly, which yield from $\frac{5}{8}$ to $\frac{7}{8}$ per cent. of pure copper. In the middle of the last century, Mr. Weaver, superintendent of the Irish Mining Company's mines, discovered a brown indurated oxide of iron, containing minute particles of silver to the amount of $\frac{6}{100}$ per cent.; the communion plate for the parish church is made of this silver. The Connaree mines, worked by Messrs. Kempston and Tilly, are said to produce the richest copper-ore at present known in Ireland, yielding an average from 9½ to 15 per cent., and in some instances even 35 per cent., of pure metal: 150 people are employed in these mines, raising about 1000 tons of ore annually. A steam-engine of 50-horse power has been erected to drain the mine, and is said to have been the first introduced into Wicklow. The Ballymurtagh mines are held by the Wicklow Copper Mining Company, on a lease which will expire about 1850, at a rent of one-tenth of the produce: 380 persons are employed, who raise about 400 tons of ore monthly, which yields $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. of copper. More than 20 veins have been discovered, extending nearly a mile and a half in length, and varying from a few perches to nearly half a mile in breadth. Four principal shafts have been sunk, the deepest of which is 120 fathoms; and a steam-engine of 50-horse power, and one of 45, are used for draining them. The working of Ballygahan mine, belonging to Viscount Powerscourt, was re-commenced by the Royal Irish Mining Company, in 1833, who raise from 40 to 50 tons per month. The shipping-place for all these mines is the port of Wicklow, to which their produce is conveyed by a difficult land carriage. There are some quarries of clay-slate in the parish, which is used for building; and also some detached masses of granite.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Dublin, united by act of council to part of the vicarage of Ballydonnell and the vicarage of Kilnacoo, forming the union of Castlemacadam, in the patronage of the Archbishop: a very small portion is inappropriate in Charles Cooper, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of the three parishes is £184. 15. 8., of which £172. 16. 7. are payable to the incumbent, and the remainder to Mr. Cooper. The church is a neat edifice, standing on an elevated ridge that projects into the western side of the vale, midway between the two "Meetings of the Waters;" it has been lately enlarged, at a cost of £363, of which £213 were paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. A portion of the ruins of the castle erected in the 14th century, is incorporated in the walls of this church, the erection of which was aided by a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1817. There is a glebe-house; the glebe comprises about 30 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is partly in the union or district of Danganstown, but chiefly forms the head of a union called Newbridge and Barrenisk, comprising also the parishes of Kilbride and Redcross and part of that of Templembael, and containing two chapels, one at Barrenisk and one at Newbridge. The interest of a bequest of £100 is divided among the poor; and a savings' bank was established here in 1834.

CASTLE-MAGNER, a parish, in the union of KANTURK, partly in the barony of ORRERY and KILMORE, but chiefly in that of DUHALLO, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Kanturk; containing 3007 inhabitants. It derives its name from the family of Magner, to whom this part of the country formerly belonged, and who erected a castle here, which was forfeited during the protectorate. This castle and the lands were granted to the family of Bretridge, from whom they passed to the Hartstonges; the remains now form part of a farmer's residence. Not far from Castle-Magner, but in the parish of Subulter, is Knockniness, where, on the 13th of November, 1647, a battle was fought between the English, under Lord Inebquin, and the Irish army commanded by Lord Taaffe, in which the English obtained a complete victory: a detailed account of the battle is given under the head of Subulter. During the same war, Lohort Castle, in this parish, was garrisoned with 150 men by Sir Philip Perceval, ancestor of Lord Arden, but was taken by the Irish, who held it till May, 1650, when Sir Hardress Waller, with a battery of cannon, captured it: in his letter to the parliament, Waller describes it as a place of great strength. This castle, which was built in the reign of John, remained in a state of ruin for many years after the protectorate, but was repaired in the early part of the 18th century by Lord Egmont. It is 80 feet high, with walls 10 feet thick at the base, but gradually diminishing to 6; and is encompassed with a deep moat or trench passed by a drawbridge. Here was formerly an armoury for 100 cavalry, well furnished with broad swords, bayonets, pistols, carbines, and other weapons, among which was the sword of Sir Alex. Mac Donald, who was trea-cherously killed by a soldier, after the battle of Knockniness: these arms have been deposited at Charlesfort for security.

The PARISH is situated on the new line of road from Mallow to Kanturk, is partly bounded on the south by the river Blackwater, and contains about 7880 statute acres, consisting of nearly equal portions of arable and pasture; there is some woodland, and a considerable quantity of wet rushy ground, but no bog or waste. The soil is generally fertile, producing excellent crops, and there are several large dairy-farms. On the lands of Coolnamagh are some pits of culm, forming part of the Dromagh vein, but not worked at present: limestone abounds in the parish, and is quarried for building, repairing roads, and making lime. The government line of road to King-William's-town passes through the extremity of the parish for about a mile and a half. Four fairs were formerly held at Ceciltown, at which is a constabulary police station, and petty-sessions are held there every Monday. The principal residence is Ballygiblin, the seat of Sir W. W. Beecher, Bart., an elegant mansion of some antiquity, recently modernised with great taste: in its beautiful demesne are the ivy-clad ruins of a church, which tradition states was intended to be the parish church, but was not completed.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is inappropriate in John Longfield, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £606. 19., half payable to the impropriator and half to the vicar. The church, which stands on an eminence, and is a plain neat structure, was erected in 1816, chiefly by aid of a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits; the spire was built at the expense of Lord Arden. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a loan of £300, and a gift of £500, in 1813, from the same Board: the glebe consists of only two roods of land. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district comprising Castle-Magner, Rosskeen, and Subulter, and has a small chapel. At Ceciltown is a national school, aided by Sir W. W. Beecher, who allows 20 guineas per annum; and a school for boys and girls is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's foundation, who allow £20 per annum to the master, with a contingent gratuity of £10, and £14 per annum to the mistress, with a like gratuity of £8. The school-house, which contains apartments for the teachers, is a neat building in the rustic style, erected by the late Hon. John Perceval, and kept in repair by Lord Arden.

CASTLEMAINE, formerly a market-town, in the parish of KILTALLAGH, union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. by E.) from Milltown; containing 150 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the harbour of Castlemaine, on the south-west coast, takes its appellation from a castle erected upon a bridge over the river Maine by McCarthy More and the Earl of Desmond, as a defence to their frontiers. Each of these chiefs was to garrison it alternately for their joint protection; but when the earl received possession from McCarthy, he retained it exclusively in his own power; and on the expiration of the term for which his garrison was to remain, he refused to admit McCarthy, keeping entire possession of the castle, which remained in his family till the reign of Elizabeth. The garrison, under Thomas Oge, defended it for a considerable time against the queen; but it was ultimately taken by the English forces. During the war in 1641, it was in the hands of the Irish, till it was demolished by Cromwell's troops under General Ludlow. After the Restoration, though the castle was in ruins, a constable continued to be regularly appointed, and the clerk of the crown was generally selected for that office. He had 10s. per day, and the fishery above the river; but on the death of the late constable the income was reduced, and the present constable receives £50 per annum for the ground rent, with the privileges of two fairs and the fishery. The royalty extends to high-water mark on the south side of the river; and the crown lands, which are on the north side, comprise about seven plantation acres, called the King's acres.

The town or village, which is situated on the north bank of the Maine, and on the road from Castle-island to Dingle, contains only 36 houses. The Maine flows into the harbour of Castlemaine, which is a continuation of the bay of Dingle; the bridge is supposed to be coeval with the old Thomond bridge at Limerick. The castle stood over it, and projected considerably on the east side; the buttresses of the arch by which the building was supported are remaining, and the stone socket on which the pivot of the castle gate turned is still to be seen. The trade consists principally in the exportation of corn, and the importation of coal, salt, and other necessities; but since the erection of a quay and warehouses at Callanaferry, between the mouths of the Maine and Laune, it has very much decreased. Vessels of 100 tons' burthen can come up to the bridge, though from the circuitous course of the river, they require two tides, which creates a delay very injurious to trade. On both sides of it are level tracts of ground, formerly swamps, but now wholly embanked and reclaimed. The late Mr. Nimmo reported, that, if cuts were made across the winding parts of the river, vessels drawing 12 feet of water might discharge their cargoes at the town, and barges navigate four miles above the bridge, to which distance the tide extends. The expense of this improvement, and of laying down proper marks to direct the navigation, would not exceed £1500; and the advantage derivable from it to the agriculture and the trade of the district would be very great. The erection of a pier would also be a great improvement, there being scarcely any portion of the old pier remaining. Fairs are held on September 3rd and November 21st, for cattle, and two others have been recently established. Three miles to the west of the town are the ruins of Castledrum, erected by the sept of Moriarty; on the lands of Farnass is a good chalybeate spa.—See KILTALLAGH.

CASTLEMARTYR, a post-town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parishes of ITERMORROUGH, BALLYVOUGHTERA, and MOGEELY, poor-law union of MIDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 19 miles (E. by N.) from Cork, and 127 (S.W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 1397 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Youghal to Middleton, and on the coach-road from Dublin, by Waterford, to Cork; it appears to have risen into importance at a very early period. At the time of the English invasion, the castle, then called the Castle of Imokilly, was resolutely defended by one of the Geraldines; but the English at length reduced it, and kept in it a powerful garrison till 1196, when Donald McCarthy besieged the fortress and destroyed it by fire, burying the garrison in its ruins, and putting to death all who escaped from the flames. The castle was afterwards rebuilt; it became a very important fortress, commanding the pass between Cork and Youghal, and was strongly fortified and garrisoned by the English. In 1575, the castle of Ballymartyr, as it was then called, was garrisoned by Fitzgerald, seneschal of Imokilly, but was attacked by the Lord-Deputy Sidney and his forces, aided by 200 of the citizens of Cork, who, after a protracted and vigorous defence, compelled the garrison to surrender, Fitzgerald narrowly escaping by flight. In 1645 it was besieged by Lord Inchiquin, to whom it was given up on honourable terms; and during the whole period of the parliamentary war, the town was the scene of violence and depredation, and was frequently plundered, and partially destroyed. In 1688 it was plundered by Lieut.-General McCarthy and the Irish forces, on their retreat from Cork; and in 1690, after the battle of the Boyne and the surrender of Youghal, a detachment of 36 dragoons and 42 infantry of King William's forces charged a body of 300 Irish at this place. The cavalry pursued them to the castle, in which they took refuge; and being joined by the infantry, they compelled the fortress to surrender, and the garrison to march out without either horses or arms: in this skirmish the Irish lost 60 men killed and 16 prisoners. In 1691, after the surrender of Limerick, the Irish under General McCarthy obtained possession of the town by stratagem, but were shortly after driven out by a party of the garrison from Youghal, since which time the castle has been in ruins.

The town consists of one wide street, at one end of which is the demesne of the Earl of Shannon, and at the other a bridge, beyond which a cross road leads on the right to the villages on the sea-coast, and on the left to Imogeely, Fermoy, and Tallow. On the right side of this cross road, which is lined with fine ash-trees, some neat houses have been recently built, forming a suburb to the town. The total number of houses is 212, most of which are large and well built; and the whole being whitewashed, the place has a very cheerful appearance. The approach from Middleton is by a magnificent avenue of lofty elms, one mile in length, and terminating at the eastern gate of Lord Shannon's demesne. About two miles from the town are the Ballyona flour-mills, propelled by a mountain stream, and producing about 12,000 bags of flour annually. Fairs are held on the 2nd of May and October; a constabulary police force is stationed here; and petty-sessions are held every alternate Wednesday.

The inhabitants were incorporated by charter of Charles II., dated July 28th, 1675, and granted to Roger, Earl of Orrery. The castle and lands forming his estate were then erected into a lordship, called the manor of Castlemartyr, with courts leet and baron, and a court of record with jurisdiction extending to £200, under a seneschal to be appointed by his lordship. The charter also granted that the castle, town, and lands of "Ballymartyr," part of the said manor, should be a free borough under the designation of the "Borough and Town of Castlemartyr," and that the borough should extend into the county in every direction from
